CRANE, Anne Moncreff (Seemüller), author, b. in Baltimore, 7 Jan., 1838; d. in Stuttgart, Germany, 10 Dec., 1872. In 1869 she married August Seemüller, of New York, and in 1871 went to Germany, hoping to derive benefit from the medicinal waters there, but did not live to return. Her first novel, "Emily Chester" (Boston, 1864), was anonymous. She subsequently published "Opportunity" (1867), and "Reginald Archer" (1871). She wrote for periodicals, and a collection of her miscellaneous essays was published in 1873.

CRANE, Bruce, painter, b. in New York in 1857. He studied under A. H. Wyant in New York, where he first exhibited in the National academy in 1879. His studio is at Summit, N. J. His principal works are "Old Mill-Pond on Long Island" (1879); "On Shrewsbury River," "After the Rain" (1880); "Moor in Nantucket," "Inlet on the Jersey Shore" (1881); "Suburban Road at Eastingham," "Blossom Time" (1889); "Winter" (1883); "The Waning Year," "Indian Summer" (1885); "Land Near the Sea," "November Woods," "Summer" (1886).

CRANE, Ichabod B., soldier, b. in New Jersey; d. in Port Richmond, Staten Island, N. Y., 5 Oct., 1857. He was appointed second lieutenant of marines in January, 1809; captain of 3d artillery in April, 1812; brevet major in November, 1813; major in the 4th artillery in September, 1823; lieutenant-colonel in 3d artillery, 3 Nov., 1833; colonel in 1st artillery, 27 June, 1843; and governor of the military asylum at Washington in May, 1851, in which latter capacity he acted till November, 1853. His son, Charles Henry, surgeon-general, U. S. A., b. in Newport, R. I., 19 July, 1833; d. in Washington, D. C., 10 Oct., 1888. He was graduated at Yale in 1844, and studied medicine at Harvard medical school. In 1847 he passed the examination as acting assistant surgeon, and was at once ordered to Mexico, and, after attaining the full grade of assistant surgeon, served with the army of invasion till July, 1848. During the ten years that followed he was stationed in almost every state and territory of the Union, and was repeatedly in the field with expeditionary forces against the Indians, notably that against the Rogue river tribe in 1856. He was promoted surgeon, 21 May, 1861, and in February, 1863, was assigned to duty as medical director, Department of Key West. On 30 June he was appointed medical director, Department of the South. In September, 1863, he was placed on duty in the surgeon-general's office in Washington, and became assistant surgeon-general, with the rank of colonel, 28 July, 1866. On the retirement of Surg.-Gen. Barnes, 3 July, 1882, he became surgeon-general of the U. S. army. He received brevets to include the rank of brigadier-general in the regular service at the close of the civil war. One of his most noteworthy characteristics was the facility with which he managed the complicated routine of his office, and the good judgment that he brought to bear in reconciling the often conflicting interests of the army medical corps when it was at its numerical maximum during the civil war.

CRANE, Jonathan Townley, clergyman, b. in Connecticut Farms, near Elizabeth, N. J., 18 June, 1819; d. in Port Jervis, N. Y., 16 Feb., 1890. He was graduated at Princeton in 1843, in 1844 was licensed to preach, and was admitted to the New Jersey annual conference of the Methodist Episcopal church in 1845. In 1846 he was stationed as pastor at Hope, Warren co., N. J., and in 1847 at Belvidere in the same state. In 1848-'9 he preached at Orange, N. J., and in June, 1849, was elected president of the Conference seminary at Pennington, N. J., which office he resigned in 1858 to assume the pastorate of Trinity church, Jersey City. In 1861-'72 he was presiding elder of the Newark, N. J., district. Dr. Crane was a delegate to the general conferences of 1860, 1864, 1868, and 1872. He was an able preacher, contributed largely to the periodical literature of his church, and published "Essay on Dancing" (1848); "The Right Way, or Practical Lectures on the Decalogue" (1853); "Popular Amusements" (1869); "Arts of Intoxication" (1870); "Holiness the Birthright of all God's Children" (1874); and "Methodism and its Methods" (1875).

CRANE, William, merchant, b. in Newark, N. J., 6 May, 1790; d. in Baltimore, Md., 28 Sept., 1866. In Richmond, Va., where he resided from 1811 till 1834, he was distinguished for his zeal in promoting the religious welfare of the colored people. He was the founder of the Richmond African Baptist missionary society which sent out Lott Cary to Liberia, and he taught the first school for blacks in Richmond, and was one of the originators of Richmond college, giving to it $1,000. His benefactions to other religious objects were large. —His son, William Carey, clergyman, b. in Richmond, Va., 17 March, 1816; d. in Independence, Texas, 27 Feb., 1885, was graduated at Columbia college and at Hamilton theological seminary. He was ordained in 1838 and was pastor of a Baptist church in Montgomery, Ala., from 1830 till 1842, and afterward pastor of various other churches in Mississippi and Texas. He has been president of Mississippi female college, of Semple Broadus college, of Mount Lebanon college, and of Baylor university, Independence, Texas, in which he was called in 1863, retaining the place till his death. Upon the removal, in 1888, of the names of Baylor university and Baylor female college to Waco and Belton, respectively, the property, buildings, etc., were left in Independence, and were therefore called "Crane college" in honor of Dr. Crane. He was regarded as one of the ablest and most scholarly divines of his denomination. He was the author of "Literary Discourses," a "Life of Sam Houston," and other works.

CRANE, William Montgomery, naval officer, b. in Elizabethtown, N. J., 1 Feb., 1776; d. in Washington, 18 March, 1846. He was a son of Gen. William Crane, an officer in the Revolutionary army, who was wounded at Quebec, and died in 1814. William Montgomery entered the navy as a midshipman in 1789, became lieutenant in 1802, commander in 1813, and captain, 22 Nov., 1814. While in command of the brig "Vixen" he distinguished himself in the attack on Tripoli. He was in the "Chesapeake" when she was attacked by the "Leopard." In July, 1812, while in command of the "Mercur," at Baltimore, Md., US. frigate "Southampton," and, on being exchanged, was ordered to the lakes, where, in command of the "Madison" and "Pike," in Chauncey's squadron, he served until the end of the war. In 1817, in the frigate "Delaware," he commanded the Mediterranean squadron, acting as joint commissioner with Mr. Offley, U. S. consul at Smyrna, to open negotiations with the Ottoman government. He was appointed navy commissioner in 1841, and in 1842 chief of the bureau of ordnance and hydrography.

CRANFIELD, Edward, governor of New Hampshire, d. in England in 1704. He was selected by Robert Mason to become governor of New Hampshire in 1689, and gave up lucrative employment in England with hopes of bettering his fortune. Mason, an optimist, never realized the potential of the colony, and the selection was exceedingly arbitrary, and in his greed for money he attempted to tax the people without their consent. This action was strongly resented, and complaints referred to the board of trade were decided against him. Associations were formed for mutual support in resisting the collection of illegal taxes. At Exeter, the collector was driven off with clubs, and farmers' wives threatened to scal the officer if he should attempt to attach property in the house. Gov. Cranfield forbade the usual exercise of church discipline, and, in his efforts to intimidate the clergy, prosecuted, condemned, and imprisoned the Rev. Joshua Moody. Religious worship was almost entirely broken up in the colony. In 1685 he returned to England, and afterward became collector of Barbadoes.

CRANFIELD, Henry Yon, b. in Newport, R. I., 9 Oct., 1789; d. there, 12 Feb., 1864. He received a limited education, and after following a trade, studied law, and in 1809 was admitted to the bar. From 1818 till 1833 he was clerk of the court of common pleas, and he was a member of the state conventions held for framing and improving the constitution of Rhode Island. He was a member of the state legislature from 1827 till 1848, and was repeatedly elected its presiding officer. Subsequently he was sent to congress and served from 4 Dec., 1843, till 3 March, 1847, after which he was again a member of the state legislature and for three years its speaker. He retired from public life in 1854, but continued his residence in Newport until his death.—His brother, Robert Bennie, b. in Newport, R. I., 14 Jan., 1791; d. there, 27 Jan., 1878, received a public-school education and he was therefore called the sheriff of Newport, and then was elected as a whip to congress, serving from 4 Sept., 1837, till 3 March, 1848. He was a banker for several years, was postmaster in 1854, and was therefore called "Crane college" in honor of Dr. Crane. He was regarded as one of the ablest and most scholarly divines of his denomination. He was the author of "Literary Discourses," a "Life of Sam Houston," and other works.

CRANSTON, John, president of Rhode Island, d. 12 March, 1880. He appears to have had some knowledge of law, and was for many years attorney-general of the colony, first holding this office under Nicholas Eide, in 1782. In 1782 he became deputy-governor, and continued in that capacity until his election as governor in 1783, in which office he remained until his death. During King Philip's war he was selected to command all the militia of the colony, and he was the first that ever had such power. He was also a member of the council of the colony.—His son, Samuel, president of Rhode Island, d. in 1727. He became governor in 1698, and was thirty times successively chosen to that place, holding the office until his death. Gov. Cranston held his place probably longer than any other man that has ever been subjected to the test of an annual election. He also held the highest military office that it was possible to occupy in the colony, and his great firmness in times of unexampled trial is said to have been the cause of his great popularity and successful administrations.

CRAPÉ, Henry H., governor of Michigan, b. in Dartmouth, Mass., 24 May, 1804; d. in Flint, Mich., 23 July, 1869. He early removed to New Bedford, where he resided until 1857, when he settled in Michigan. For many years he was extensively engaged in the manufacture of woolen goods, and held important political offices. He was elected mayor of Flint, subsequently served in the state senate, and was twice chosen governor of the state, holding that office from 1864 till 1868. During the civil war he rendered important services to the cause of the Union, especially in raising and equipping a regiment of the 50th Michigan infantry.

CRAYEN, Charles, colonist, d. in 1754. He was secretary of the proprietors of South Carolina, and governor of the colony from 1712 till 1716. During 1712 he was ordered to sound Port Royal, and it is supposed that he then founded Beaufort. Three years later all of the Indians from Cape Fear to St. Mary's river combined under the leadership of the Yemassee for the purpose of destroying the colony on Ashley river. Gov. Craven at once proclaimed martial law, laid an embargo on all shipping, prohibited the sale of men or provisions, and at the head of 1,200 men, part of whom were faithful blacks, met the Indians in a series of desperate encounters and finally drove them beyond the Savannah.

CRAVEN, Thomas Tingey, naval officer, b. in Washington, D. C., 30 Dec., 1808. He was the eldest son of Tunis Craven, of the U. S. navy, and his wife, Hannah Tingey, daughter of Com. Thomas Tingey, also of the U. S. navy. Young Craven attended school in Portsmouth, N. H., until in 1822, when he entered the navy as a midshipman, and from 1822 till 1828 served in the Pacific squadron. on the "United States" and on the "Peacock." In 1828 he joined the "Erie," of the West India squadron, as sailing-master, and took part in the capture of the pirate "Federal." After being commissioned lieutenant in 1830, he spent three years in cruising on the "Boxer," and in 1835-6 was attached to the receiving-ship at New York, at the same time serving in the "John Fife," flagship of the Mediterranean squadron. In 1838 he was attached to the "Vincennes," Capt. Wilkes's flag-ship in the arctic exploring expedition. He then served on the "Boxer," "Fulton," "Monroe," "Macedonia," and "Forpoise," principally in the African squadron, after which, during 1845, he was attached to the naval rendezvous in New York. He then served on the "Ohio," in the Pacific squadron, and on the "Independence," in the Mediterranean squadron, returning home in January, 1850. In the following July he was made commandant of midshipmen in the U. S. naval academy in Annapolis, becoming commander in December, 1852, and remaining at the academy until June, 1855. After commanding the "Congress," of the Mediterranean squadron, for several years, he was ordered to resume his post at Annapolis. In October, 1860, he had resigned, and in a short time spent in recruiting-service in Portland, Me., was commissioned captain in June, 1861, and assigned to the command of the Potomac flotilla. In the autumn of 1861 he was placed in command of the "Brooklyn," participating in the capture of New Orleans and subsequent operations on the Mississippi. He was made commodore in July, 1862, and during the subsequent years of the civil war commanded the "Niagara," on the coast of England and France. In September, 1866, he was placed in command of the navy-yard at Mare island, and was a brigadier general. In 1877 he was associated with Gen. George S. Greene on important professional work near Charleston and elsewhere. He was a successful railroad engineer and manager, and rapidly rose to the first rank in his profession. Mr. Craven began engineering commissions to the Croton water board of New York on its organization in 1849, and continued in that capacity until 1868. Among the many works projected and carried out during these years under his supervision were the building of the large reservoir in Central park, the enlargement of pipes across High Bridge, and the construction of the reservoir in Graver's Corners, Putnam co. He also caused to be made an accurate survey of Croton valley, with a view of ascertaining its capacity for furnishing an adequate water-supply, and was largely instrumental in securing the passage of the Croton improvement act of 1842. He was a director for many years, and its president from November, 1869, till November, 1871. Another brother, Tunis Augustus Macdonough, naval officer, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., 11 Jan., 1818; d. in Mobile Bay, Ala., 5 Aug., 1884. He entered the U. S. navy as a midshipman in February, 1829, and until 1837 served in different vessels, after which he was at his own request attached to the coast survey. In 1841 he was made a lieutenant and served in the "Palmouth" until 1845, when he was transferred to the "North Carolina." Three years later he was connected with the Pacific squadron as lieutenant of the "Dale," and participated in the conquest of California. In 1849 he returned east, and for some time afterward was associated in the work of the coast-survey, having command of various vessels attached to this bureau. He commanded the Atrato expedition which left New York in October, 1857, for the purpose of surveying the isthmus of Darien by way of the Atrato river for a ship-channel. Later he commanded the "Mohawk," stationed off the coast of Cuba to intercept slavers. On one occasion he captured a brig containing 500 negroes, who were afterward sent to Africa and liberated. He also saved the crew of a Spanish merchant vessel, for which he was presented by the queen of Spain with a silver service of plate for the efficient services rendered to merchant vessels while at sea by her husband. At the beginning of the civil war he was placed in command of the "Crusader," and was instrumental in preserving the Union the fortress at Key West. In April, 1861, he was made a commander, and ordered to the charge of the "Tuscawora," in search of Confederate cruisers. While so occupied he succeeded in blockading the "Sumter," so that, after it had been kept a close prisoner for two months in Sullivan's harbor, the officers and crew deserted her. On his return home, he was given command of the monitor "Tecumseh," and directed to join the James river flotilla. A few months later he was attached to Admiral Farragut's squadron, then collected for the attack on Mobile. In the subsequent battle the "Tecumseh" was given the post of honor, and on the morning of 5 Aug., leading the fleet, she fired the first shot at 6.47 a.m. The general orders to the various commanders directed them, in order to avoid the line of torpedoes at the entrance of the bay, to pass eastward of a certain point and directly under the guns of Fort Morgan. The Confederate ram "Tennessee" was on the port-beam of the "Tecumseh," inside of the line of torpedoes, and Craven, in his eagerness to engage the ram, passed to the west of the buoy. When suddenly the monitor reeled and sank with almost everyone on board, destroyed by a torpedo. As the "Tecumseh" was going down, Com. Craven and his pilot, John Collins, met at the foot of the ladder leading to the top of the turret. Craven, knowing it was through no fault of the pilot, but by his own command, that the fatal change in her course had been made, stepped back, saying: "After you, pilot." There was no "after" for him. When the pilot reached the top round, the vessel seemed "to drop from under him," and no one followed. A buoy that swings to and fro with the ebb and flow of the tide marks the scene of Com. Craven's bravery and of his death, and beneath, only a few fathoms deep, lies the "Teumess." He has been called the "Sydney" of the American navy. His son, Charles H. Anderson, naval officer, son of Thomas Tingey, b. in Portland, Me., 30 Nov., 1843, was graduated at the U. S. naval academy in 1863, promoted to ensign, and served in that capacity in the South Atlantic blockading squadron until 1865. He participated in many of the engagements in the vicinity of Charleston and Savannah during 1863-4, and was attached to the "Housatonic" when she was blown up in February, 1864. During 1865-7 he served in the European squadron on the "Colorado," and was commissioned lieutenant-commander in November, 1866. He then served on the "Wampasnoag," and was made lieutenant-commander in March, 1868, after which he was attached to the Pacific squadron. Subsequently he served on shore duty at Mare island, Cal. In 1874 he became executive officer of the "Kearsarge," of the Pacific squadron, and later of the "Merrimac," which was detached from duty in June, 1873, broken down by over-work, and was retired in May, 1881.—Henry Smith, another son of Thomas Tingey, civil engineer, b. in Brook, N. J., 14 Oct., 1845, studied in St. John's college, Annapolis, Md., and later in the scientific department of Hobart, but was not graduated, as he entered the army shortly before the close of the civil war. He obtained employment on the Croton works in New York city, but in 1866 went to California and became secretary, with the rank of lieutenant, to his father, then commanding the North Pacific squadron, and in 1869 was appointed assistant civil engineer of the navy-yard at Mare island. This office he resigned in 1872, and then practised his profession in San Francisco until 1879. He was commissioned civil engineer in the U. S. navy during the latter year, and ordered to Chester, Pa., where he was occupied with the construction of the iron floating dock then building for the Pensacola navy-yard. Later he was ordered to the navy-yard at League island, Pa., and in July, 1891, was sent to the navy-yard at Portsmouth, N. H., and in September, 1892, was assigned to special duty at Coaster's harbor training station. He was granted leave of absence in 1888, and took charge of the construction of the new Croton aqueduct in New York, up to March, 1886. He is the inventor of an automatic trip for mining-buckets (1876), and of a tunnelling machine (1888). Mr. Craven was given the honorary degree of B. S. by Hobart in 1878, and is a member of the American society of civil engineers.

CRAWFORD, George Washington, lawyer, b. in Columbia county, Ga., 22 Dec., 1798. He was graduated at Princeton in 1820, and after studying law with Richard Henry Wilde in Augusta, was admitted to the bar in 1822. He was appointed attorney-general of Georgia in 1827, and continued in that office until 1831. From 1837 till 1842 was a member of the legislature of Richmond county, with the exception of one year. He then was elected to Congress, his term being vacated by the death of Richard W. Habersham, and served from 7 Feb., 1843, till 3 March of the same year, during which time he was also elected governor of Georgia, and re-elected in 1845. Later he held the office of secretary of war in President Taylor's cabinet, serving from 7 March, 1846, till 15 Aug., 1850. On the death of the president Mr. Crawford resigned his portfolio, and subsequently spent some time in travel abroad, after which he returned to Georgia, where he has since resided in retirement at his home in Richmond county.

CRAWFORD, Martin Jenkins, lawyer, b. in Jasper county, Ga., 17 March, 1830: d. in Columbus, Ga., 22 July, 1883. He was educated at Mercer university, and, after studying law, was admitted to the bar in 1859. For a while he followed his profession, but the death of his father caused him to give it up and enter the army. In 1861, 1863, 1864 till 1847 he was a member of the state legislature, and in 1850 was a delegate to the southern convention held in Nashville during May. In 1853 he was made judge of the superior courts of the Chattahoochee circuit, and held his seat until his election to Congress as a democrat, where he served from 3 Dec., 1855, until his withdrawal on 23 Jan., 1861. He was then elected by the convention of Georgia a delegate to the Confederate provisional congress, serving from January, 1861, till February, 1863. He was also one of the three commissioners sent to treat with the authorities in Washington for a peaceful separation of the states. During 1862 he raised the 8th Georgia cavalry, and after a year's service was transferred to the staff of Gen. Howell Cobb, with whom he continued until the close of the war. He then resumed the practice of his profession, and in 1875 was appointed judge of the superior courts of the Chattahoochee circuit, to which office in 1877 he was reappointed for a term of eight years. In 1880 he was appointed associate justice of the supreme court of Georgia, to fill the unexpired term of Logan E. Bleckley, on the completion of which he became his own successor by appointment from the state legislature.

CRAWFORD, Samuel Wylie, soldier, b. in Franklin county, Pa., 9 Nov., 1829. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1846, after which he studied medicine, and in 1851 became an assistant surgeon in the U. S. army. He served in various forts in the south-west, principally in Texas, until 1860, when he was stationed at Fort Moultrie and later at Fort Sumter, being one of the garrison of that fort at the beginning of the civil war, and having command of a battery during the bombardment. From that time till August, 1861, he was at Fort Columbus, New York harbor. He then vacated his commission of assistant surgeon by accepting that of captain in the infantry, and in 1862 was commissioned a brigadier-general of volunteers. Gen. Crawford served with distinction in the Shenandoah campaign, being present at the battles of Winchester and Cedar Mountain, losing one half of his brigade in the last mentioned action. In the battle of Antietam he succeeded Gen. Mansfield in command of his division, and was severely wounded. Early in 1863 he was placed in command of the Pennsylvania reserves, then stationed about Washington, and with these troops, forming the 3d division of the 9th army CRAWFORD, THOMAS, sculptor, b. in New York city, 22 March, 1814; d. in London, 10 Oct., 1857. He was of Irish extraction. Of his early years we only know that he was at school with Page, the artist, and that his proficiency in his studies was hindered by the exuberance of his fancy, which took form in drawings and carvings. His love of art led him, at the age of nineteen, to engage in sculpturing, and he learned the art from the sculptors of marble, well known to the New York of that day. In 1834 he went abroad for the promotion of artistic studies, and took up his residence in Rome for life, as it proved. The celebrated sculptors of Italy became his friends. Under this fortunate guidance he devoted himself to the study both of the antique and of living models. His first ideal work was a group of "Orpheus and Cerberus," executed in 1839, and purchased, some years later, for the Boston Athenæum. This was followed by a number of cameos, single figures, and bas-reliefs, whose rapid production bore witness to the fertility as well as the versatility of his genius. Among these are "Adam and Eve" and a bust of Josiah Quincy, now in the Boston Athenæum; "Hebe and Ganymede," presented to the Boston Art Museum by Mr. C. C. Perkins, and a bronze statue of Beethoven, presented by the same gentleman to the Boston music hall; "Babes in the Wood," in the Lenox library; "Mercury and Psyche"; "Flora," now in the gallery of the late Mrs. A. T. Stewart; an Indian girl; "Dancing Indian," made by his own hand, and a statue of James Otis, which adorns the chapel at Mount Auburn, Cambridge. In 1849, while on a visit to this country, he received from the state of Virginia an order for a monument to be erected in Richmond. He immediately returned to Rome and began the work, of which the design was a star of five rays, each one of these bearing a statue of some historic Virginian, Patrick Henry and Thomas Jefferson among the number. The work is surmounted by a plinth, on which stands an equestrian statue of Washington. These statues, modelled in Rome, were cast at the celebrated Munich Foundry, where, as elsewhere, their merit was much appreciated. Mr. Crawford's most important works after these were ordered by the national government for the capitol at Washington. First among these were a statue of Washington, Promised among his own designs, a statue of Liberty, which surmounts the dome; and last of these, and of his life-work, was a bronze dove on which are modelled various scenes in the public life of Washington. Promising among his other projects, a statue of Liberty, which was also his statue of an Indian chief, much admired by the English sculptor Gibson, who proposed that a bronze copy of it should be retained in Rome as a lasting monument. Mr. Crawford's health failed under the pressure of the great public works here enumerated. In 1856 he was suddenly afflicted with blindness caused by a cancerous affection. He was above middle height, well formed and athletic, with a clear eye, ruddy complexion, and energetic temperment. In politics he was a liberal, in religion a Deist, and in character generous and kind, and adverse to discord, professional or social.—His son, Francis Marion, author, b. in Italy in 1845, has lived chiefly abroad. He has published novels in rapid succession, including "Mr. Issacs," (New York, 1882); "Doctor Claudius" (Cincinnati, 1879); "To Leeward" (1884); "An American Politician" (1885); "Zoroaster" (1885); "Tale of a Lonely Parish" (1886); and "Saracenias" (1886).

CRAWFORD, THOMAS HARTLEY, lawyer, b. in Chambersburg, Pa., 14 Nov., 1789; d. in Washington, D. C., 27 Jan., 1839. He was graduated at Princeton in 1804, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1807, and began to practise in Chambersburg. Later he was elected as a Jackson democrat to congress, and was re-elected, serving from 7 Dec., 1829, till 2 March, 1833. During 1836 he was a member of the committee of the House of Representatives which was appointed to investigate alleged frauds in the purchase of the reservation of the land of the Creek Indians. From 1836 till 1845 he held the office of commissioner of Indian affairs. In 1845 he was elected and served as a circuit judge of the criminal court of the District of Columbia, and continued as such until his death.

CRAWFORD, WILLIAM, soldier, b. in Berkeley county, Va., in 1732; d. in Wyandot county, Ohio, 11 June, 1782. He was a surveyor, and the associate of Washington, who engraved many of his maps. At the beginning of the French and Indian war he became an ensign in the Virginia rifeeman, and was with Gen. Braddock in the expedition against Fort Duquesne. He continued in the service until 1761, having been promoted to the grade of captain on the recommendation of Washington. He then served during the Pontiac war from 1763 till 1764, and in 1767 settled in western Pennsylvania, where he purchased land and became a justice of the peace. Soon after the beginning of the Revolutionary war he raised a company of Virginians and joined Washington. In 1776 he was made lieutenant-colonel of the 5th Virginia regiment, and later became colonel, resigning from the army in 1781. He was at the battle of Long Island, in the subsequent retreat across New Jersey and over the Delaware, participated in the battles of Trenton and Princeton, and afterward was engaged around Philadelphia. In 1778 he was assigned to frontier duty, and during the following years was occupied in suppressing the Indian attacks on the settlers. After his resignation he retired to his farm, in the hope of spending the remainder of his days with his family, having already given nearly twenty-five years of his life to the service of his country; but in May, 1782, at the urgent request of Gen. Washington and William Irvine, he accepted, though with great reluctance, the command of an expedition against the Susquehannock tribe in the banks of the Muskingum. The Indians were discovered on 4 June, and an engagement ensued, in which Crawford's troops were surrounded in a grove called Battle island by a force much larger than his own. For two days the fight was continued, when, finding his ammunition exhausted, he decided to cut their way out. In the retreat that followed, the soldiers were separated, and Col. Crawford fell into the hands of the Indians. After several days of cruel experience, during which he was subjected to horrible torture, he was burned to death. The story is told by N. N. Hill, Jr., in the "Magazine of Western History" for May, 1885, under the title of "Crawford's Campaign."

CRAWFORD, William Harris, statesman, b. in Amherst county, Va., 24 Feb., 1772; d. in Elbert county, Ga., 13 Sept., 1864. His father, who was in reduced circumstances, removed first to South Carolina and then to Columbia county, Ga. After teaching school at Augusta the boy studied law, began practice at Lexington in 1799, and was one of the compilers of the first digest of the laws of Georgia. He became a member of the state senate in 1802, and in 1807 was chosen U. S. senator to fill a vacancy. The political excitement of the period led him to engage in two duels, in one of which his opponent fell, and in the second of which he was himself wounded. He was re-elected in 1811, acquiesced in the policy of a U. S. bank, and in 1812 was chosen president pro tem. of the senate. He was at first opposed to the war with Great Britain, but eventually gave it his support; and in 1813, having declined the place of secretary of war, accepted that of minister to France, where he formed a personal intimacy with Lafayette. In 1816, on the retirement of Mr. Dallas, he was appointed secretary of the treasury. He was prominently urged as a candidate for the presidency, but refused. In 1820 he rose to the head of the treasury department, where he adhered to the views of the Monroe-Jefferson school, and opposed the federal policy in regard to internal improvements, then supported by a considerable section of his own party. This position on the great question of the time subjected him to virulent hostility from opponents of his own party; and Mr. Calhoun, who was one of these opponents, became a dangerous rival for the democratic nomination for the presidency, to succeed Monroe. Crawford, however, as the choice of the Virginia party, and the representative of the views of Jefferson, secured the nomination of a congressional caucus in February, 1824; and in the election that followed he received the electoral votes of Virginia and Georgia, with scattering votes from New York, Maryland, and Delaware—in all, 41. No choice having been made by the electoral college, the election reverted to the house of representatives, where John Quincy Adams was elected over Jackson and Crawford, through the influence of Henry Clay, the fourth candidate before the people, who brought his friends to the support of Adams. The result was also due, in a measure, to the confirmed ill health of Mr. Crawford, and perhaps to imputations brought against his conduct of the treasury department. These charges he promptly refuted, and a committee that included Daniel Webster and John Randolph unanimously declared them to be unfounded. But his health rendered it impossible for him to continue in public life; and, although he recovered his strength partially, he took no part after this date in politics. Returning to Georgia, he became circuit judge, which office he continued to fill with great efficiency, by successive elections in 1828 and 1831, until nearly the end of his life. He had no connection with the nullification movement, to which he was opposed; and his last days were spent in retirement. Personally he was a man of classic and sound education, a conversationalist, religious in his views and feelings, and a supporter of Baptist convictions. At his home he dispensed a hearty republican hospitality, and his name is eminent among the illustrious citizens of Georgia.—His son, Nathaniel Mason, ed., of Walker county, Ga., d. 29 March, 1811; d. in Walker county, Ga., 27 Oct., 1871, was graduated at the University of Georgia in 1829 with the first honor. At the age of twenty-five he was elected to a professorship in Oglethorpe college, at Milledgeville, Ga. He had been a Presbyterian, but changed his views and entered the Baptist ministry. In 1846 he accepted the chair of theology in Mercer university, and ten years later was elected to the presidency, but soon retired to accept the professorship of moral philosophy in the University of Maryland. In 1857 he became professor of theology in Georgetown, Ky., but returned to Georgia again as president of Mercer university, where he remained for seven years. At the close of the war, in 1865, he accepted the presidency of Georgetown college, Ky., and continued to fill this post until the time of his death. He was the author of a volume entitled "Christian Paradoxes."

CRAZY HORSE, Indian chief, b. about 1842. He was an Ogalalaa Sioux, brother-in-law of Red Cloud, and one of the principal chiefs of the hostile Indians in the Black Hills, which formed the basis of his authority in the U. S. government in the western territories. He left Fort Laramie, and went to war, after the murder of his brother in 1865. He soon established a reputation as a brave and cunning leader, and gathered a strong band, whom he ruled with despotic rigor. With Sitting Bull he surprised and destroyed Gen. Custer's command on the Little Big Horn river, 25 June, 1876. He was pursued by Gen. Terry into the Black Hills, and the following spring Gen. Crook conducted an expedition against his own party, with 900 followers, at the Red Cloud agency.

CREERY, William Rufus, educator, b. in Baltimore, Md., 9 May, 1834; d. there, 1 May, 1875. He was graduated at Dickinson college, Carlisle, Pa., in 1842, and at once began teaching in the public schools of Baltimore, continuing in that capacity until 1854, when he became professor of belles-lettres in Baltimore city college. In 1859 he was chosen president of the Lutherville female seminary, where he remained until 1862, when he renewed his teaching in the public schools of Baltimore. Five years later he was elected city superintendent of public instruction for a term of four years, and in 1872 was re-elected. In conjunction with Prof. M. A. Newell he prepared the Maryland series of school-books, which includes "Primary-School Sounding-Book," "Grammar-School Sounding-Book," and the series of six "Readers," and "Catechism of United States History."

CREIGHTON, John Orde, naval officer, b. in New York city about 1785; d. in Sing Sing, N. Y., 13 Oct., 1838. He entered the navy as a midshipman in June, 1800, served under Preble before Tripoli, became a lieutenant, 24 Feb., 1807, and was attached to the frigate "Chesapeake," in June, 1807, when she was attacked by the "Leopard." He was afterward attached to the "President," and was first lieutenant in her action with the "Little Belt," 16 May, 1811. In 1813 he commanded the brig "Rattiesmaken," with the rank of master-commandant, and was made captain, 27 April, 1816. In 1829—30 he commanded the squadron on the coast of Brazil.

CREIGHTON, John Blakeney, naval officer, b. in Rhode Island, 12 Nov., 1822; d. in Morrisania, New York, 1863. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 10 Feb., 1838, became a lieutenant, 9 Oct., 1833, commissioned as commander, 20 Sept., 1862, was on special duty in 1863, and in 1866. He retired from the navy as a commodore, 27 June, 1865, and was killed in a duel with a Miss Weir, head of Philadelphia, while yet a minor, became a merchant, removed to the Ohio in the spring of 1774, and established a settlement below Wheeling. He took command of the pioneers, who prepared for an Indian war, and, after Dr. Conolly had warned him of the "Mingo," or the South Atlantic blockading squadron, which was engaged in the bombardment of Fort Wagner and Gregg in August, 1863. He was transferred to the "Mingo," of the South Atlantic blockading squadron, and commanded that steamer till the close of the war. He was commissioned captain on 26 Nov., 1868, and became a commodore on 9 Nov., 1874. He was commandant of the Norfolk navy-yard in 1879, and was retired with the rank of rear-admiral in 1883.

CREIGHTON, William, clergyman, b. in New York city, 17 May, 1831; d. in Tarrytown, N. Y., 23 April, 1865. He was graduated at Columbia in 1852, studied theology, and took orders in the Protestant Episcopal church, and during a great part of his earlier ministry, 1852—9, rector of St. Andrew's, Menlo Park, California. During the suspension of Bishop Onderdonk he was elected provisional bishop of the diocese of New York, but declined the office. He presided in the diocesan convention for nine years, and in the lower house of the general convention of the E. church during its sessions in 1853, 1855, and 1856. He was rector of Christ church, Tarrytown, N. Y., 1866—85.

CRELE, Joseph, centenarian, b. in Detroit, Mich., in 1753; d. in Caledonia, Wis., 27 Jan., 1896. The date of his birth is established by the record of his baptism in the French Catholic church, Detroit. He was married in 1775 at New Orleans, and a few years afterward settled at Prairie du Chien. He bore arms at Braddock's defeat, and before the Revolution was employed in carrying letters between Prairie du Chien and Green Bay. He settled in Wisconsin during the Revolution, and in 1816, when he passed with a daughter by his third marriage, born when he was sixty-nine years old. He enjoyed robust health up to two years of his death, and was able to walk several miles without fatigue as long as he was robust; his wand was always a help to the family.

Crenshaw, Anderson, jurist, b. in South Carolina, 22 May, 1783; d. in Alabama in 1847. He was graduated in 1806 from the College of Columbia, S. C., being the first graduate of the institution, became a successful lawyer, removed to Alabama about 1819, and held the offices of judge of the circuit court from 1821 to 1838, being also, until 1832, judge of the supreme court, and chancellor of the southern division of the state from the organization of a separate court of chancery in 1838 till his death. Though a Whig in politics, he was elected to both and both houses, and was held by a Democratic legislature.—His son, Walter Henry, b. in Abbeville district, S. C., 7 July, 1817; d. in Alabama in 1878. He was graduated at the University of Alabama in 1834, and was from 1838 till 1867 a member of either the upper or lower house of the Alabama legislature, officiating as speaker of the house in 1861—5, and president of the senate in 1865—7. In 1865 he was a member of the Constitutional convention. He was afterward judge of the Butler county criminal court, and with two other commissioners codified the laws of the state.

Cresap, Michael, trader and Indian fighter, b. in Alleghany county, Md., 29 June, 1742; d. in New York city, 18 Oct., 1775. His father, Thomas, emigrated from Yorkshire, England, settled in western Maryland, and was a member of the Ohio Company in 1748. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 10 Feb., 1838, became a lieutenant, 9 Oct., 1833, commissioned as commander, 20 Sept., 1862, was on special duty in 1863, and in 1866. He retired from the navy as a commodore, 27 June, 1865, and was killed in a duel with a Miss Weir, head of Philadelphia, while yet a minor, became a merchant, removed to the Ohio in the spring of 1774, and established a settlement below Wheeling. He took command of the pioneers, who prepared for an Indian war, and, after Dr. Conolly had warned him of the "Mingo," or the South Atlantic blockading squadron, which was engaged in the bombardment of Fort Wagner and Gregg in August, 1863. C., 7 July, 1817; d. in Alabama in 1878. He was graduated at the University of Alabama in 1834, and was from 1838 till 1867 a member of either the upper or lower house of the Alabama legislature, officiating as speaker of the house in 1861—5, and president of the senate in 1865—7. In 1865 he was a member of the Constitutional convention. He was afterward judge of the Butler county criminal court, and with two other commissioners codified the laws of the state.

Cresson, Elliott, philanthropist, b. in Philadelphia, 2 March, 1796; d. there, 20 Feb., 1854. He was a member of the Society of Friends, became a successful merchant in Philadelphia, and devoted his attention to benevolent objects, especially the promotion of the welfare of the Indians and negroes in the United States. He conceived the intention of becoming a missionary among the Seminoles in Florida, but afterwards, with the scheme of colonizing American negroes in Africa, engaged in establishing the first colony of liberated slaves at Bassa Cove, on the Grain coast, became president of the Colonization Society, and labored as its agent in New England in the winter of 1835 and 1836, in southern Illinois in 1839-40, and in Great Britain in 1840-3 and 1850-3. He left in his will $122,000 to various benevolent institutions, and a lot, valued at $30,000, for a home for superannuated merchants and gentlemen.

CRESSON, John Chapman, civil engineer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1796; d. there, in 1876. He was educated at a Friends' academy, attended lectures on agriculture at the University of Pennsylvania, and then became a farmer, but sold his farm in 1834, and engaged in business in Philadelphia. He was then made superintendent and engineer of the Philadelphia gas works, and held the office for twenty-eight years. He was given the chair of mechanics and natural philosophy in Franklin institute in 1837, and in 1855 was made its president. He also held a similar chair in the Philadelphia high-school for two years. He was for many years a member of and one of the vice-presidents of the Pennsylvania institution for the blind, and was connected with many other charitable institutions. He was also manager of the Schuykill navigation company, president of the Main Line and Schuylkill Railroad company in 1847-76, and one of the original Fairmount park commissioners, afterward becoming chief engineer of that park.

CREWS, A. J., statesman, b. in Port Deposit, Cecil co., Md., 18 Nov., 1828. He was graduated at Dickinson college, in 1848, studied law, and was admitted to the Maryland bar in 1850. He was a member of the state legislature in 1860 and 1862, and assistant adjutant-general for Maryland in 1862-3. He was elected to congress, and served from 7 Dec., 1863, till 3 March, 1865, and, having distinguished himself as an earnest friend of the Union, was elected as a republican to the U. S. senate in March, 1865, to fill the unexpired term of Thomas H. Hicks. On 22 Feb., 1866, he delivered, at the request of the House of representatives, a memorable oration of his friend and colleague, Hon. James A. Garfield, to the Baltimore convention of 1864, the Philadelphia loyalists convention of 1866, the Border states convention held in Baltimore in 1867, and the Chicago republican convention of 1868. In May, 1868, he was elected secretary of the U. S. senate, but declined. On 5 March, 1869, he was appointed by President Grant postmaster-general of the United States, and served till 3 July, 1874.

CREW, Julia (Pleasant), author, b. in Huntsville, Ala., 21 Aug., 1827; d. near Shreveport, La., June 4, 1891. Col. James J. Pleasants, of Virginia, removed to Alabama, became secretary of state, and married a daughter of Gov. Bibb. The daughter was educated by a superior teacher from the north, and was encouraged by her father to write verses. In 1854 she married Col. Thomas Bibb M. Bradley, a young poet of promise, who died soon afterward, induced her to publish a selection of her poems with some of his own. The volume appeared in 1854, before her marriage, under the title, "Philella, and Other Poems, by Two Cousins of the South" (New York). After the war Mrs. Crew taught a village-school, while her husband, who had lost his large estate, resumed the practice of law. She has published an allegorical and moral novel entitled "A Dream," (Philadelphia, 1886), and left many unpublished poems to be issued in a posthumous volume.

CREVIN, Joseph, R. C. bishop, b. in Lyons, France, in 1800; d. in St. Paul, Minn., in 1857. He studied in his native diocese, and became a priest, with the exception of the years 1839-40, and in Great Britain in 1840-3 and 1850-3. He left in his will $122,000 to various benevolent institutions, and a lot, valued at $30,000, for a home for superannuated merchants and gentlemen.

became assistant surgeon in the French navy on 24 Oct., 1868, was attached to the marines at the beginning of the war of 1870, became a surgeon of the second class in 1873, gained the cross of the Legion of Honor in 1875, and remained in the navy until 1882. He then became a surgeon of the Indian Service, and was assigned to the Maroni river in French Guiana, explored the Tu-nuc-Humac mountains, and descended the Yari to the Amazon. He afterward ascended the Orinoco, and in 1881 set out from Buenos Ayres with a company of marines to ascend the Paraguay and cross over to the Amazon by the Tapajos and the Zingu. The expedition reached the confluence of the Pilayas and Pilcomayo, and embarked in three boats; but, in the region of the Tuyo, Dr. Creveaux and all his companions save two were treacherously murdered by the Taqui Indians.

CRIVÈCEOUR, J. Hector St. John de, author, b. in Normandy in 1751; d. in 1806 or 1813. He finished his education in England, and embarked for America in 1754. He purchased an estate in the neighborhood of New York, and married the daughter of a wealthy merchant. During the war of the Revolution his family was frequently ravaged, and he himself forced to seek safety in flight. In 1780, as his affairs in Europe required his presence, he obtained permission from the British commander to cross the line of the enemy, and entered New York with one of his sons, from which city he was about to sail. But the unexpected appearance of a French squadron led to his being suspected of having entered New York as a spy, and he was cast into prison. After a detention of three months, he was released by two prominent New Yorkers in guarantee of his good behavior for him. He then embarked on a vessel sailing for Dublin, and reached France in 1782. About this time he introduced the culture of the American potato into Normandy. He had previously published in English his "Letters of an American Farmer." He now wrote "Letters on a Cultivateur Ameri-caun" and had them published in Paris. He then returned to New York, where he was appointed French consul. No sooner had he landed, in November, 1788, than he learned that his house had been burned and his farm ravaged by the savages. His wife had died a few weeks before, and he could learn nothing of his children. He discovered them, however, in the charge of an English merchant named Flower, who, through gratitude for Creveceur's kindness to the English prisoners in Normandy, had, at great risk, rescued them. The appointment of Creveceur was agreeable to the American government, and Washington gave him particular proofs of his esteem. He accompanied Franklin in the journey that the latter took in 1787 to Lancaster to lay the first stone of the college which he had founded. The "Lettres d'un cultivateur Ameri-caun" consists of three volumes, giving a description of the United States and Canada. It was so laudatory of the climate, productions, etc., that more than five hundred families left France on the faith of Creveceur's statements, and settled on the Ohio, where most of them remained. He also wrote "La culture des pommes de terre" and "Voyage dans la haute Pensylvanie et dans l'état de New York" (2 vols., Paris, 1801).

CRÍADO DE CASTILLA, Alonso (cre-ah-do-day cas-teel-yah), Spanish governor of Guatemala from 1598 till 1611. During his administration peace and order reigned in every section of the country, as the filibustering expeditions headed by Drake had been successfully repelled before he entered office. He founded the town and port of Santo Tomás on the harbor of Castilla, a yellow-fever patients in the Salut islands, and, after recovering from an attack of the disease, ascended Maroni river in French Guiana, explored the Tu-nuc-Humac mountains, and descended the Yari to the Amazon. He afterward ascended the Orinoco, and in 1881 set out from Buenos Ayres with a company of marines to ascend the Paraguay and cross over to the Amazon by the Tapajos and the Zingu. The expedition reached the confluence of the Pilayas and Pilcomayo, and embarked in three boats; but, in the region of the Tuyo, Dr. Creveaux and all his companions save two were treacherously murdered by the Taqui Indians.

CRITTENDEN, John Jordan, statesman, b. in Woodford county, Ky., 10 Sept., 1807; d. near Frankfort, Ky., 26 July, 1883. His father served in the war of the Revolution, with the rank of major. The son was graduated at William and Mary college in 1807, and entered upon the practice of the law in his native country, but after a short time removed to Logan county, bordering on Tennessee, a thinly settled part of the state. In 1809 Gov. Vinian Edwards appointed him attorney-general of the territory of Illinois. He served for a short time as a volunteer in the war of 1812, was aide to Gen. Shelby in 1813, and served with Adair and Berry in the Canada campaign. After leaving the army he resumed the practice of his profession, soon attaining a high place at the bar. In 1816 he was elected to the legislature, where he at once took a high rank. The next year he was elected to the U. S. senate, but after three years' service he resigned his seat, and in 1819 took up his residence in Frankfort. Here he soon rose to eminence in the legal profession, especially as a criminal lawyer, and served several terms in the legislature. In 1827 he was appointed by President Adams U. S. district attorney, but, on the accession of Gen. Jackson to the presidency in 1829, he was removed. He was elected again to the U. S. senate in 1835, and served a full term. In the remarkable canvass of 1840 Mr. Crittenden took an active part in favor of Gen. Harrison. He was re-elected to the senate at the expiration of his term, but resigned his seat to accept the appointment of attorney-general in Harrison's cabinet; he was confirmed to the post of Harrison's successor, and the accession of Mr. Tyler. Mr. Crittenden's views of national policy not being in harmony with those of the new president, he retired from the cabinet. Mr. Clay having decided to retire from the senate in 1842, Mr. Crittenden was appointed to fill the seat vacated by the expiration of the term was again elected for a full term. In 1848 he was elected governor of Kentucky, and resigned his seat in the senate to fill that office. Notwithstanding the intimate relations between Mr. Clay and himself, he favored the nomination of Gen. Taylor in 1848 as the Whig candidate for the presidency, but only after Mr. Clay had assured him that he would not be a candidate.

When the president died, and Mr. Fillmore succeeded him, Mr. Crittenden accepted the portfolio of attorney-general in the new cabinet. The great question as to the constitutionality of the fugitive slave law was referred to him, and he prepared an opinion in favor of it. In 1855 he was once more elected to the senate, and took a leading part in the discussions of the important questions that came before congress in the course of the next five years. The sentiments uttered by him were eminently national, and he exerted his full strength in a patriotic effort to effect a satisfactory settlement of the disturbing elements that imperilled the perpetuity of the Union. He opposed the compromise, and, in expressing his views of the questions growing out of the Kansas troubles, vigorously opposed the policy of the administrations of Presidents Pierce and Buchanan. He favored the election of Bell and Everett in the presidential canvass of 1860. He was consistently opposed secession, and supported Mr. Lincoln's administration, holding that it was the right and duty of the government to maintain the Union by force. He exerted his full power to effect a compromise between the contending parties, but, failing to accomplish it, he was re-elected in good hope of maintaining the Union, he proposed an amendment to the constitution in December, 1860, providing for the re-enactment of the Missouri compromise, and the prohibition of any interference by Congress with slavery wherever it should be legally established. Mr. Crittenden had been six times elected to the senate, and his last effort in that body was to save the Union. On 4 March, 1861, he presented the credentials of his successor, Mr. Breckinridge, and retired. Returning to Kentucky, he urged his state to stand by the Union, and held it firmly against the appeals of the other states of the south. He became a candidate for a seat in congress, and, being elected, took his place in the house of representatives, where he was at once recognized as a powerful leader. He offered, on 19 July, 1861, the following resolution, which was adopted with only two dissenting votes: "Resolved by the house of representatives of the congress of the United States, That the present deplorable civil war has been forced upon the country by the disunionists of the southern states, now in arms against the constitutional government, and in arms around the capital; that in this national emergency congress, banishing all feelings of mere passion or resentment, will recollect its only duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged on their part in any spirit of oppression, or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those states, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the constitution, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the states unimpaired; and that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease." He opposed the employment of slaves as soldiers, and he denied the power of congress to organize the state of West Virginia. His last speech, delivered 22 Feb., 1863, showed that the expectation of the expiration of the term was again elected for a full term. In 1848 he was elected governor of Kentucky, and resigned his seat in the senate to fill that office. Notwithstanding the intimate relations between Mr. Clay and himself, he favored the nomination of Gen. mitted to the bar, and became commonwealth's attorney in Kentucky in 1842. He served in the Mexican war as lieutenant-colonel of Kentucky infantry, and was volunteer aide to Gen. Taylor at the battle of Buena Vista. In 1849 he was appointed by President Taylor consul to Liverpool, and served till 1853, then returned to the United States, resided for some time at Frankfort, and afterward engaged in mercantile business at Louisville, Ky. At the beginning of the civil war he espoused the national cause, and on 27 Oct., 1861, was appointed major of the 23rd Ohio, and was commissioned a brigadier-general on 28 July, 1862, with the rank of major-general, 17 July, 1862, for gallant service on that occasion, and assigned to the command of a division in the Army of the Tennessee. He commanded the 2d corps, forming the left wing of the Army of the Ohio under Gen. Buell, and afterward served under Gen. Rosecrans in the battle of Stone River, and at Chickamauga commanded one of the two corps that were routed. In the Virginia campaign of 1864 he commanded a division of the 9th corps. He resigned, 13 Dec., 1864, on the passage of the Union Pacific Railroad, the 23d infantry on 28 July, 1866, was brevetted brigadier-general for gallantry at Stone River, 2 March, 1867, transferred to the 17th infantry in 1869, and served with his regiment on the frontier until 1870. A nephew of John Jordan, b. in Alabama about 1828, served in the Mexican war as lieutenant of Missouri mounted volunteers, afterward settled in Indiana, and entered the volunteer army in 1861 as colonel of a regiment of three months' men, with a company of which he took a part in the battle of Philippi. The regiment was reorganized under his command at the expiration of its term of service, and served for three years. He was promoted brigadier-general on 28 April, 1863, and taken prisoner at Murfreesboro on 13 July, and not released till October. He resigned 5 May, 1863.

CROASDALE, Samuel, soldier, b. in Pennsylvania; d. at Antietam, Md., 17 Sept., 1862. He was a lawyer in Doylestown, Pa. Immediately after the president's proclamation of 15 April, 1861, he volunteered for three months, and, after the governor's call for nine months' men in the summer of 1862, raised a company in Doylestown, and, upon the organization of the 128th Pennsylvania regiment, was appointed its colonel. After a few weeks' service in camps of instruction near Washington, the emergency of the invasion of Maryland required the services of the regiment in the field. At Antietam it was assigned an important position, and Col. Croasdale, having formed his men in line, was leading an assault under a heavy fire, when a ball killed him instantly.

CROCKER, Alvah, capitalist, b. in Leominster, Mass., 14 Oct., 1801; d. in Fitchburg, 26 Dec., 1874. He obtained an academic education, entered a paper-mill at Franklin, N. H., in 1826, removed to Fitchburg, Mass., in 1828, and began to manufacture paper on his own account on borrowed capital. He struggled for many years with debt, but gradually extended his business, and in 1834 laid the foundation for a fortune by purchasing all the land in the Nashua valley, in order to build a new road. He was elected to the Massachusetts legislature in 1855, where he advocated steam communication with Boston, returned to the legislature in 1843, and obtained a charter for a new railroad between northern Massachusetts and the seaboard, which was completed through his exertions in 1845. He afterward engaged in building the Vermont and Massachusetts, the Troy and Boston, and the Ho osac tunnel railroads, and in 1847-8 lectured in behalf of the tunnel project. Near his paper-mills, which became the largest in the United States, he built machine-shops and foundries. He was the first to use cotton-waste in the manufacture of paper, and was the first to substitute linen for coarse paper. He was a member of the state senate for two terms during the civil war, on 2 Jan., 1872, was elected to congress as a Republican to serve out the unexpired term of William B. Washburn, who had been made governor, and served for two terms, serving from 14 Feb., 1872, until his death.

CROCKER, Charles, railroad builder, b. in Troy, N. Y., 16 Sept., 1822. He had a limited education, and was early turned adrift by his father. In 1840 he went to California, and, after engaging in placer mining, opened a general store in Sacramento. He was elected to the common council in 1855, and to the legislature in 1860. With Leland Stanford, Mark Hopkins, and Collins F. Huntington, he furnished means for the survey of a railroad route across the Sierra Nevada; and in 1859, when the legislature under contract with him by congress was associated with them in constructing the Central Pacific division, the four supplying the capital beyond the government subsidy. He personally built a large portion of the line. In 1871 he was elected president of the Southern Pacific railroad company, of California, and second vice-president of the Central Pacific, superintending, in the former capacity, the construction of the divisions in Arizona, New Mexico, and Texas. In 1884 he effected a combination of the two companies, having a joint control of 8,908 miles of railroad and steamship lines, and soon afterward removed to New York city.

CROCKER, Hannah Mather, author, b. in Boston, Mass., in 1765; d. in Roxbury, Mass., 10 July, 1847. She was a granddaughter of Hannah Mather, a daughter of the Rev. Samuel Mather, of Boston, and married Joseph Crocker, of Taunton, who left her a widow. In 1810 she sent to a newspaper a series of "Letters on Free-masonry," which were republished on the advice of the Rev. Dr. Thaddeus Harris, who furnished a preface to the volume. She published afterward "The School of Reform," and in 1818 "Observations on the Rights of Woman," and wrote an account of the life of Madam Knight, the school-mistress of Benjamin Franklin, which is preserved in the library of the Antiquarian society of Worcester, Mass.

CROCKER, Marcellus M., soldier, b. in Franklin, Johnson co., Ind., 6 Feb., 1830; d. in Washington, D. C., 28 Aug., 1865. He entered the U. S. military academy in 1847, but left at the end of his second year, studied law, and practised in Des Moines, Iowa. He entered the national service as major of the 2d Iowa infantry in May, 1861, was promoted colonel on 30 Dec., fought with distinction in the battle of Shiloh, April 6 and 7, 1862, was promoted brigadier and engaged at the siege of Vicksburg, conducting a raid in Mississippi. After the re-enlistment of his brigade as veteran volunteers he fought through the Georgia campaign of Gen. Sherman, commanding a division a part of the time. He was suffering from cancer during the whole of his military career, and was assigned to duty in New Mexico on account of sickness. The brigade that he had commanded and brought to a high state of discipline was nicknamed "Crocker's Greyhounds." It lost heavily in the assault of Bald Hill before CROCKETT, David, pioneer, b. in Limestone, Greene co., Tenn., 17 Aug., 1786; d. in Texas, 6 March, 1836. His father, a Revolutionary veteran of Irish birth, moved to eastern Tennessee after the war, and about 1793 opened a small tavern on the road from Knoxville to Abingdon. When David was about twelve years old his father hired him to an old Dutchman, with whom he went 400 miles on foot, but, after remaining a few weeks with his master, ran away and succeeded in reaching home. Shortly afterward he was sent to school, but on the fourth day gave one of the pupils with whom he had quarreled a sound beating, and, after playing truant for a time to avoid a flogging, ran away from home to escape the vengeance of his father. For three years he worked for teamsters in Tennessee, Missouri, and Virginia, and for eighteen months was bound to a hatter in the last-named state. Tired of wandering about, he finally returned home, and shortly afterward worked hard for a year to pay two notes of his father's, amounting to $76. He then went to school for six months, and learned his letters for the first time, but relinquished study to seek a wife, and, after several disappointments in love, married and settled in Lincoln county in 1809, and about 1811 in Franklin county, one of the wildest parts of the state. Crockett had by this time acquired some fame as a hunter, and, at the beginning of the Creek war in 1813, he enlisted in a regiment of sixty-day volunteers. He served through the war, and afterward settled on Shoal creek, in a desolate region of the state, where a temporary government was formed by the settlers and Crockett was made a magistrate. He was subsequently appointed to the same office by the state legislature, and was then elected to the U.S. House of Representatives. In 1826 he was again a candidate for the legislature, and winning favor by telling amusing stories and by his skill with the rifle, was elected by a handsome majority, though he had never read a newspaper in his life, and was entirely ignorant of public speaking. In 1822 he lost all his property by fire, and moved again to the Obion river, where he devoted himself to his favorite occupation of hunting, living on bear meat and venison. He served again in the legislature in 1829-30, and in the latter year was an unsuccessful candidate for Congress. In 1830 he was again a candidate, as a supporter of Jackson, and this time was elected, serving two terms, from 1827 till 1831. In his second term he opposed Jackson's Indian bill, and this course caused his defeat in 1836; but he served again in 1835-6. Crockett was popular at Washington, where he became noted not only for his eccentricity of manner, but for his strong common sense and shrewdness. He prided himself on his independence, and thus set forth his position: "I am at liberty to vote as my conscience and judgment dictate to be right, without the yoke of any party on me, or the driver at my heels, with his whip in hand, commanding me. to go-wo-haw, just at his pleasure." After the increasing influence of Jackson in Tennessee, which made it impossible for Crockett to be re-elected to congress, he joined the Texans in their struggle for independence. Taking part in various exploits, ended his adventurous life in the famous defence of the Alamo, where, as one of the six survivors of a band of 140 Texans, he surrendered to Santa Anna, only to be massacred by that officer's orders. An unauthorized account of Crockett's life, "K'in," was published in 1797, and a "Tour to the North and Down East" (New York, 1833). See, also, "Crockett's Exploits in Texas" (New York, 1849); and "Life of Colonel David Crockett," by Edward S. Ellis (Philadelphia).—His son, John W., b. in Trenton, Tenn.; d. in Memphis, Tenn., 24 Nov., 1852, was a member of congress in 1837-39. He was elected by the legislature to represent the 4th district of Tennis on 1 Nov., 1894, and afterward removed to New Orleans, where, on 25 May, 1846, he became associate editor of the "National." CROES, John, P. E., bishop, b. in Elizabeth-town, N. J., 1 June, 1792. Removed to Brunswick, N. J., 26 July, 1833. His early years were occupied partly in mechanical pursuits and partly in efforts to acquire a classical education. During the Revolution he served as a sergeant and quartermaster, and after the war he opened a school in Newark, N. J., and studied for the ministry of the Episcopal church. He was ordained deacon by Bishop White in Philadelphia, 28 Feb., 1790, and priest in March, 1792. He then became rector of Trinity church, Swedesborough, N. J., which place he held for twelve years. He was uniformly active and zealous in the service of the church in both diocesan and general conventions. Dr. Croes became rector of Christ church, New Brunswick, in 1801, having in charge also a neighboring church and an academy. He was elected bishop of New Jersey in the summer, and consecrated in Philadelphia in November, 1801, and made bishop in 17th infantry, 12 March, 1812. He distinguished himself under Harrison in the sortie from Fort Meigs, became his aide-de-camp, with the rank of major, 30 March, 1813, and, on the 1st and 2d of August following, conducted the memorable defence of Fort Stephenson, St. Lawrence River, against Gen. Proctor, with an army of 500 regulars and 700 Indians. Maj. Croghan was brevetted lieutenant-colonel for his gallantry on this occasion, and subsequently received from congress a gold medal. He was made a lieutenant-colonel 21 Feb., 1814; and as inspector-general, with the rank of colonel, 21 Dec., 1825. In 1846 he joined Taylor's army in Mexico, and served with credit at the battle of Monterey. His son, George St. John, a Confederate officer, was mortally wounded at McCoy's Mills, W. Va., during Floyd's retreat from Cotton Hill, in December, 1861. Before his death he admitted to Gen. Benham, by whose soldiers he had been wounded, that he had fought on the wrong side. He invented a peculiar pack-saddle for mules, which had been successfully used in convaying wounded men over the mountain-passes of western Virginia.

CROIX, John Baptist De La., R. C. bishop, b. of a noble family, in Geneva, France, in 1838; d. in Quebec, 28 Dec., 1727. He was first almoner to Louis XIV, and came to Canada in 1685 as successor to Laval, the first bishop of Quebec. He founded three hospitals, and distributed more than a million lives among the poor.

CROLY, George A., b. in New York city, 3 Nov., 1839. He was graduated at New York university in 1854, was subsequently a professor of phonography, and a reporter for the New York "Evening Post" and "Herald" from 1855 till 1858. He owned and edited the Rockford, Ill., "Daily News" in 1857-8, and became city editor of the New York "World" when it was founded in 1860, then its managing editor until 1872. His active work as a newspaper editor terminated in 1878, when, in consequence of ill health, he resigned the editorship of the New York "Graphic," which he had held since 1872. Mr. Croly has had some notoriety as a predictor of financial catastrophes, and foretold in the spring of 1872 the panic of the autumn of 1873, naming the banking-house (Jay Cooke & Co.) that first failed, and also indicated the probable end of the "Northern Pacific" that would first go down. Mr. Croly has contributed many articles to periodicals, and published lives of Seymour and Blair, with a "History of Reconstruction" (New York, 1888), and "A Primer of Pessimism" (1876).—His wife, Jane Cunningham, b. in Market Harborough, England, 19 Dec., 1831, is known by her writings under the pen-name of "Jenny June." Her father came to the United States when she was ten years old. Until that time she was educated at her native place, afterward by her father and brother at Poughkeepsie, and in 1860 became editor of Demorest's "Quarterly Mirror of Fashion," and then she contributed to the New York "Weekly Illustrated News" in "Demorest's Illustrated Monthly." She became the editor of the new journal. Mrs. Croly has also editorially connected with the "New York "World," "Graphic," "daily Times," and "Noah's Sunday Times," and was dramatic critic and assistant editor of the "Messenger" for five years, 1861-6. She invented the system of duplicate correspondence, and has practiced it for the "World." Mrs. Croly's "Jenny June" was a comic poem by Benjamin F. Taylor, sent to her, when she was about twelve years old, by her pastor, in Poughkeepsie, with the name underlined, because, he said, "You are the littlest girl I know." Mrs. Croly called the first Woman's Congress in New York, in 1856, and the second, in 1869, and in 1868 founded the Sorosis, and was its president until 1870, and again from 1876 till 1880. She is vice-president of the Association for the advancement of the medical education of women. She has published "Talks on Women's Topics" (1869); "For Better or Worse" (1875); a "Cookery Book for Young Housekeepers"; and "Knitters and Crochet," "Letters and Monograms" (New York, 1883-5).

CROOK, William, inventor, b. in Preston, England, in 1807. He was brought up as a handloom cotton-weaver, and at an early age learned the trade of a machinist. While superintendent of a cotton-mill in Ramsbottom, near Berry, he made many experiments on cotton-locks. He came to Taunton, Mass., in 1846, and while there devised a lock for the manufacture of fancy cotton goods, for which he received a patent on 23 Nov., 1837. In this loom one part of the warp was depressed while the other was lifted, instead of allowing one part to remain stationary, thus securing more room for the passage of the shuttle. Another feature of it was the chain, which, with its peculiar apparatus, operated the warp. Mr. Crompton went to England in 1838, and, after patenting his loom there, returned with his family to this country in 1839, and in 1840 adapted his loom to the weaving of fancy woollen goods. At least three fourths of all the woollen goods now made in the United States are woven on the Crompton loom, or on looms embodying its principles. Mr. Crompton retired from active business in 1849, on account of failing health.—His son, George, inventor, b. in Ramsbottom, Eng., 29 March, 1836, and in 1839, and in 1849 was called to the management of his father's business. In 1831 he engaged in the manufacture of fancy looms in Worcester, Mass., where the Crompton loom-works have since been established. He soon directed his attention to improvements in his father's loom, and, in 1845, took out more than fifty patents, including those for the harness mechanism, picker movement, let-off and stop motions, shuttle and shuttle-boxes, shipping mechanism, and devices for finding the loop when broken. He has received eight patents for textile fabrics. At the Centennial exhibition in 1876 he received an award "for the best looms for fancy weaving on shawls, casimiers, and satins."—By Mr. Crompton's improvements in his father's looms there is an increased production of sixty per cent, with a saving of fifty per cent. in labor and more than that in the cost of repairs.

CROMWELL, Henry Bowman, merchant, b. in 1828; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 2 April, 1864. He engaged in trade at an early age, and became a member of the firm of Crompton, Haigie & Co. before he was twenty years old. In 1850 he became a partner in the firm of John Haigie & Co., in Huddersfield, England, and resided there until 1854, when he returned to his native city, and then engaged in the shipping business, managing a line of screw propellers in connection with the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, his business increasing until he had connection with nearly all the important domestic seacoast ports. During the few years previous to 1861 he had in successful operation steam lines from New York to Savannah, Charleston, Wilmington, Jacksonville, Aiken, Newport, Portland, and Baltimore; also from Baltimore to Charleston and Savannah. When the civil war began he sold nearly all his vessels to the government, and immediately proceeded with the construction of two fine steamers, the "George Washington" and "Oliver Cromwell," which subsequently sailed between New York and New Orleans. Although Mr. Cromwell's commercial interests were so largely connected with the south, he firmly upheld the cause of the government during the war.

CROWN, Benjamin, Canadian, b. in Kilkenny, Ireland, in 1802; d. in London, Ontario, 22 Sept., 1871. He was graduated at Trinity college, Dublin, in 1821, in 1825 was ordained a deacon of the Episcopal church, and afterward officiated for a short time as curate in the diocese of Chester. In 1832 he was elected bishop of the diocese of Tuam, and served for six years as curate under the late archbishop of Tuam. In 1832 he emigrated to Canada and became rector of St. Paul's church, London, which charge he kept until 1857, when he was elected bishop of the new diocese of Huron.

CROOK, George, soldier, b. near Dayton, Ohio, 8 Sept., 1858. He was graduated at the CROOKS, George Richard, author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 3 Feb., 1822. He was graduated at Dickinson college in 1840, and in 1841 entered the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal church, and became a presbytery at Appomattox. He was afterward transferred to the districts of Wilmington, N. C., where he remained from 1 Sept., 1865, till 15 Jan., 1866, when he was mustered out of the volunteer service. After a six weeks' leave of absence he was assigned to duty on the board appointed to examine rifle tactics, was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the 29th infantry, U. S. army, on 28 July, 1866, and assigned to the districts of Boise, Idaho, where he remained until 1872, actively engaged against the Indians. In 1872 Gen. Crook was assigned to the Arizona district, to quell the Indian disturbances. He sent an ultimatum to the chief to return to their reservations or "be wiped from the face of the earth." No attention was paid to his demand, and he attacked them in the Tonto basin, a stronghold deemed impregnable, and enforced submission. In 1875 he was ordered to quell the disturbances in the Sioux and Cheyenne nations in the northwest, and defeated those Indians in the battle of Powder River, Wyoming. In March another battle resulted in the destruction of 135 lodges, and in June the battle of Tongue River was a victory for Crook. A few days later the battle of the Rosebud gave him another, when the maddened savages massed their forces and succeeded in crushing Custer. (See Custer, George Armstrong.) Crook, on receiving re-enforcements, struck a severe blow at Slim Buttes, Dakota, and followed it up with a series of victories. On 1 May, 1877, all the hostile tribes in the northwest had yielded. In 1882 he returned to Arizona, forced the Mormons, squatters, miners, and stockraisers to vacate the Indian lands on which they had seized, encouraged the Apaches in planting, and pledged them in the protection of the government. In the spring of 1888 the Chiricahuas entrenched themselves in the fastnesses of the mountains on the northern Mexican boundary, and began a series of raids. Gen. Crook struck the trail, and, instead of following, took it backward, penetrated into and took possession of their strongholds, and, as fast as the warriors returned from their plundering excursions, made them prisoners. He marched over 200 miles, made 400 prisoners, and captured all the horses and plunder. During the two years following, he had sole charge of the Indians, and in that time no depredation occurred. He set them all at work on their farms, abolished the system of trading and paying in goods and store orders indulged in by contractors, paid cash direct to the Indians for all his supplies, and stimulated them so strongly that the tribes became self-supporting within three years.

CROOKS, James, Canadian merchant, b. in Kilmarnock, Scotland, in 1778; d. in West Flamborough, Ontario, 1856. He was one of the first settlers in Upper Canada, making his home at Niagara in 1794. He established the first paper-mill, and sent the first load of wheat and flour from Upper Canada to Montreal. During the war of 1812 he served with distinction at Queenstown and other points on the Niagara frontier. He was soon afterward elected to the assembly, and ultimately became a member of the legislative council. His son, Adam, Canadian statesman, b. in West Flamborough, Ontario, 11 Dec., 1857; d. 28 Dec., 1886, was graduated with honors at King's college, Toronto, in 1860, entered the bar in 1862, and distinguished himself as an equity lawyer. He was for eight years vice-chancellor of the University of Toronto (formerly King's college). He contested the representation of the West Riding of Toronto in the Ontario legislative assembly in 1867, as a liberal, and was defeated, but was elected by the same constituency in 1871, and appointed attorney-general in Mr. Blake's cabinet. He became provincial treasurer under Mr. Mowat in 1872, and minister of education in 1876, holding the two portfolios until 1877, when he resigned the treasurer's, but retained that of the minister of education. education until 1888, when he was judicially declared insane and confined in a private asylum at Hartford, Conn. Though his administration of the department of education was successful in a certain sense, his conduct was such as to displease the Catholic Diocese of New York in detaching passages obnoxious to them from Collier's school history of England, and the discard of one of Sir Walter Scott's poems as a teachers' examination class-book, for a similar reason, gave great offence to the majority of the liberal party. It is well to state the fact that the college did not appoint a full surgical professor till 1871. In 1870 he found himself unable to perform even the divided duty to his satisfaction, and was appointed emeritus professor of surgery, and lectured when he pleased. The degree of LL.D. was conferred on him by Dartmouth in 1877—His brother, Nathan, lawyer, b. in Sandwich, N. H., 13 Feb., 1798; d. in Lowell, Mass., 9 Feb., 1865, was graduated at Dartmouth in 1820, and practised his profession in Gilmanton, N. H., Salisbury, Newburyport, and Lowell, Mass. In 1843-6 he purchased for the Lowell he was during corporations the great lakes of New Hampshire, which now form the reservoirs of water-power for that city. He was commissioned justice of Lowell police court, 19 May, 1846, and held the office till his death. He was the author of "First Half-Century of Dartmouth College," and edited "Wentworth, and Judge S. S. Wilde, of the Massachusetts supreme court, and many lectures and essays on historical and philanthropic subjects. The degree of LL.D. was conferred on him by Dartmouth in 1873—Another brother, Alpheus Benning, surgeon, b. in Gilmanton, N. H., 22 Feb., 1832; d. in Hanover, N. H., 9 Aug., 1877, was graduated at Dartmouth in 1853, and at the medical department there in 1856. Meanwhile he had devoted one year as an assistant surgeon in the marine hospital at Chelsea, Mass. Returning to Hanover, he began practice, but at the beginning of the civil war joined the 1st New Hampshire volunteers as a private, Stephen Moody, b. in Salisbury, Mass., 14 Aug., 1827, was educated in the Boston Latin-school and the Lowell high-school, graduated at Dartmouth in 1849, and at Harvard law-school in 1853. At the beginning of the civil war he entered the national service as a captain in 1861, and was brevetted lieutenant-colonel for meritorious service. He was elected representative in the state legislature in 1865, was state senator in 1870–1, state director of the Boston and Albany railroad for 1871–2, commissioner of the Hoosac tunnel in 1874–5, and treasurer of the Massachusetts Trust company in 1875–8, when he became president of that corporation.

CROSBY, Ebenezer, physician, b. in Braintree, Mass., 30 Sept., 1758; d. 16 July, 1788. He was a son of Judge Joseph Crosby, and was educated at Harvard in 1777, and at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1780. He served through the Revolutionary war as surgeon of Gen. Washington's guards, and was one of the original members of the Society of the Cincinnati. At the close of the war he married Catharine, daughter of William Bedlow, and niece of Col. Henry Bedlow, of New York, and became a physician in that city. He was also professor of obstetrics at Columbia college, and one of the trustees of that institution until his death.—His son, William Bedlow, philanthropist, b. in New York, 7 July, 1786; d. there, 19 March, 1863. His parents died when he was two years old, and he was adopted by Col. Henry Rutgers, his mother's uncle, from whom he received a large part of the old Rutgers estate, comprising most of the present Seventh ward of New York city. He never engaged in business but gave his time and attention to the care of his property and to works of benevolence. He was connected with many societies, and spent a large part of his income in private charities. By virtue of his father's service in the war of the Revolution, he was made a member of the Society of the Cincinnati.—His grandson, Howard, b. in New York city, 27 Feb., 1826, was graduated at the University of the city of New York in 1844, and became professor of Greek in that institution in 1851. In 1859 he was called to the chair of Greek at Rutgers. Two years later he entered the ministry of the Presbyterian church, and united the duties of pastor of the first church of New Brunswick with those of his professorship. In 1863 he gave up his work at New Brunswick to become pastor of the Fourth avenue Presbyterian church in New York city, which place he still holds. He also held the office of chancellor of the University of New York from 1870 till 1881, and has since 1864 a member of its council. In 1859 he received the degree of D. D. from Harvard, and in 1871 that of LL. D. from Columbia. He was chosen moderator of the general assembly of the Presbyterian church of the United States in 1873, and has often been a delegate to that body. In 1877 he was a delegate to the first Presbyterian general council at Edinburgh. In addition to his work as an educator and clergyman, Dr. Crosby has taken a lively interest and exerted a beneficent influence in public affairs, particularly in advocating temperance as distinguished from total abstinence. In 1877 he took the principal part in founding the Society for the Prevention of Crime, whose chief object is the reduction of the number of saloons and the restriction of the liquor traffic. Through this society, of which he has been president since its foundation, and apart from it, he has done much in his great work, influencing legislation and the municipal government of his own city in so far as it has relation to the regulation of intemperance and crime. He has also been actively interested in the welfare of the Indians, and in the procurement of an international copyright law. His published works include "Lands of the Moslem," written after a tour in the east (New York, 1851); "Edipus Tyrannus of Sophocles," edited with notes (1851); "Scholia on the New Testament" (1861); "Social Hints" (1866); "Life of Jesus" (1870); "Bible Companion" (1870); "Healthy Christian" (1871); "Thoughts on the Pentateuch" (1873); "Notes on Genesis" (1879); "Commentary on Nehemiah" (1876); "The Christian Preacher" (1879); "The Humanity of Christ" (1880); and "Commentary on the New Testament" (1885). He has also written largely for periodicals, and was a member of the American committee to revise the New Testament.—Howard's nephew, John Schuyler, soldier, b. in Albany, N. Y., 19 Sept., 1839. He was educated in the New York schools and at the University, but before graduation made a tour of the world. At the beginning of the civil war he entered the regular army as second lieutenant of artillery, served with his battery under McClellan in the Army of the Potomac, and in the Florida campaign of 1862 was transferred to the Department of the Gulf under Gen. Banks, and brevetted captain after the Teche campaign. He carried the first despatches from the Red river.
to Farragut, for which he was brevetted major, and also brevetted major and lieutenant-colonel in the regular army for his services at Sabine Cross-Roads and Pleasant Hill. In August, 1864, he was commissioned colonel of the 7th New York heavy artillery, but declined the appointment, becoming assistant adjutant-general of the Union. Captain Crosby served in the Department of the Gulf, and being afterward transferred to Sheridan's staff. In 1866 he served in the campaigns of Sheridan and Custer against the Indians. He resigned in 1872, and was appointed consul to Florence, Italy, in 1878. He bore a large part of the expenses of Miss Crosby's trip to India. August, 1882, took an active part in preventing the Yellowstone park from falling into the hands of a cattle syndicate, and in November, 1884, was appointed first assistant postmaster-general, but resigned 4 March, 1886.

CROSBY, Enoch, patriot, b. in Harwich, Mass., 4 Jan., 1750; d. in Brewsters, N. Y., 26 June, 1885. He was supposed to be the original of "Harvey Birch" in Cooper's "Spy." In his infancy his parents removed to Southampton, Dutchess co., N. Y., and by a series of disasters were reduced to poverty. At 15 years of age he became a pilot and sloop wainer. At the beginning of the Revolutionary war he joined the Continentals, and served in the Lake Champlain campaign for several months, then became ill and was sent home. On his recovery he shouldered his musket and set out on foot for the Seat of War. He afterwards became a postmaster and postmaster-general, of which he took advantage, revealed a deep-laid conspiracy, upon which he successfully studied and acted. The result was the prompt arrest of a band of tories, and his own appointment to a place in the Secret Service Department. He became a most successful warrior, and by his shrewdness prevented various catastrophes to the patriot cause. After many hair-breadth escapes he finally rejoined the command of Lafayette, under whom he served till the end of the war, when he purchased a farm and devoted himself to the pursuits of life. The story of his secret-service life, which was thought to be incorporated in Cooper's "Spy" (though Cooper had never heard of him), was dramatized, and Mr. Crosby was on one occasion present at a representation of the play in New York city, and, as the hero, received the plaudits of the multitude. His narrative, taken from his own lips by Capt. H. L. Barnum, was published under the title of "The Spy Unmasked" (New York, 1828).

CROSBY, Pelree, naval officer, b. near Chester, Delaware co., Pa., 10 Jan., 1825. He was educated at a private school, and was appointed in 1839 midshipman from Pennsylvania. He sailed in 1842 on the frigate "Congress" to the Mediterranean, serving on her six months, when he returned to the United States. In May, 1844, he was promoted to passed midshipman, and served on the coast survey in 1844-5. He was six months on the "Decatur," in the gulf of Mexico during the Mexican war, participated in the attack and capture of Tuxpan and Tobasco, and then served a year on the "Petrel." Peace being declared in 1848, he was transferred to old frigates, and commissioned lieutenant, 5 Sept., 1853. At the beginning of the civil war, Lieut. Crosby served in Chesapeake bay, keeping the communications open between Annapolis and Havre de Grace, was detailed, on the night prior to the battle of Big Bethel, to transport troops across Hampton creek, and also upon their return from their unsuccessful expedition. In the attack on Forts Harters and Clark he commanded the "Fannie," a light-draught steamer, and superintended the landing of troops, until the surf swamped and broke his boats. He then took a ship's heavy launch and landed two more boat-loads of men; but the sea became so heavy that the launch was dashed upon the shore and the crew hurled out. He succeeded in landing 800 men, but, on account of the bad weather, the squadron stood off seaward, leaving him and his companions upon shore. Lieut. Crosby was ordered to put out in pursuit of 20 Spanish gun-boats, "Pinoia," and joined the Gulf squadron under Farragut. In September, 1862, he captured the "Corn," loaded with cotton. On arriving at the mouth of the Mississippi, he co-operated with the "Itasca" in breaking the chain barrier across the river below Forts Jackson and St. Philip, and participated in the capture of New Orleans, and also at the passage and repassage of the batteries at Vicksburg, 30 June and 15 July. He was promoted to commander, 3 Sept., 1862, and appointed fleet-captain of the North Atlantic squadron, and did good service in various expeditions. In the winter of 1863-4 he was in command of the "Florida," destroyed two blockade-runners at Mas- sonboro inlet, was transferred to the "Keystone State" in 1864, and captured five blockade-runners, causing many others to throw overboard their cargoes in order to escape. In 1864-5 he was in command of the "Florida" on a junction an unexpected attack of an enemy, of which he took advantage, revealed a deep-laid conspiracy, upon which he successfully studied and acted. The result was the prompt arrest of a band of tories, and his own appointment to a place in the Secret Service Department. He became a most successful warrior, and by his shrewdness prevented various catastrophes to the patriot cause. After many hair-breadth escapes he finally rejoined the command of Lafayette, under whom he served till the end of the war, when he purchased a farm and devoted himself to the pursuits of life. The story of his secret-service life, which was thought to be incorporated in Cooper's "Spy" (though Cooper had never heard of him), was dramatized, and Mr. Crosby was on one occasion present at a representation of the play in New York city, and, as the hero, received the plaudits of the multitude. His narrative, taken from his own lips by Capt. H. L. Barnum, was published under the title of "The Spy Unmasked" (New York, 1828).
CROSUN. George Hampton, soldier, b. in Taunton, Mass., Nov., 1798; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 28 May, 1882. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1823, assigned to the 6th infantry, and served on frontier and garrison duty. He was promoted to first lieutenant on 30 Aug., 1888, and made assistant quartermaster on 15 Oct., 1880. He performed the duties of this office in the Indian country during the Black Hawk war of 1832, and in the Florida war of 1836-7, and was promoted to captain, 30 April, 1887. He was chief quartermaster in the military occupation of Texas in 1845-6, and distinguished himself at the storming of Palo Alto, 8 May, 1846, receiving the brevet of major for his gallantry on that occasion. He became chief quartermaster on 10 March, 1847, deputy quartermaster-general with the rank of lieutenant-colonel in 1856, and assistant quartermaster-general with rank of colonel in 1863, serving during this time in charge of various clothing depots and arsenals. From 1864 till 1896 he was on the force preparing for public instruction, a "Manual for the Quartermaster's Department." He was brevetted brigadier-general and major-general, U. S. army, for his services during the civil war, 13 March, 1865, and was retired from active service in 1866, but was on duty again in 1867; d. on 29 June, 1888.

CROSS, Charles Robert, physicist, b. in Troy, N. Y., 29 March, 1848. He was graduated at the Massachusetts institute of technology in 1870, and has since been connected with the physical department of that institution as student assistant in 1870-71, instructor in 1872-77, professor in 1871-5, and as professor in 1875-78. In addition to holding the chair of physics, he is director of the Rogers laboratory, and is also the head of the department of electrical engineering. The developing and superintending of this latter course has been the chief occupation of his life in this country, has occupied his attention for several years, and its success under his administration is his just reward. Prof. Cross is a member of the Appalachian mountain club, and was its president in 1886. He was a delegate to the international congress of Alpine clubs held in Geneva in 1879, and was elected one of its vice-presidents. Besides numerous papers contributed to "Proceedings of the American Academy of Sciences and Arts," "American Journal of Oology," he has published "Course in Elementary Physics" (Boston, 1873) and "Lecture Notes on Mechanics and Optics" (1884).

CROSS, David W., lawyer, b. in Richland (now Pulaski), Oswego co., N. Y., 17 Nov., 1814. He was educated at Hamilton, N. Y., seminary (now Madison university) and member of the bar in 1840. He entered extensively into coal mining, and continued in it till 1867. Since then he has been connected with other important enterprises and has done much for the industries of Cleveland. Mr. Cross is an ardent sportsman, and was one of the first to plant successfully the California trout in Ohio. He has published "Fifty Years with the Gun and Rod" (Cleveland, 1880), and has been for years a contributor to "Forest and Stream," the "American Field," and the "American Angler."

CROSS, Edward Ephraam, soldier, b. in Lancaster, N. H., 22 April, 1832; d. near Gettysburg, Pa., 2 July, 1863. He was educated at Lancaster academy, and began life as a journeyman printer. He went to Cincinnati in 1852, and in 1854 became an editor of the "Cincinnati Times," also acting as correspondent for the "New York Herald" and other journals. In 1854 he canvassed the state of...
Ohio for the American party. He was afterward employed as agent of the St. Louis and Arizona mining company, in which he subsequently became a large stockholder. In 1858 he made a trip across the plains, taking the first steam-engine and the first printing-press in the United States to Rocky mountain mining camps. In 1860 he held a lieutenant-colonel's commission in the Mexican army, and when the news of the attack on Fort Sumter reached him he was in command of a large garrison at El Fuerte. He at once resigned, and hastened to Concord, N. H., where he organized a company to go to the state, organized the 5th New Hampshire regiment, and was commissioned as its colonel. Under his command the regiment distinguished itself in many important engagements, and won an enviable reputation for bravery, becoming known as the "Fighting Fifth." He was mortally wounded at the battle of Gettysburg while leading the 1st brigade of the 1st division, 2nd army corps. He had been several times wounded before, and Gen. Hancock had strongly recommended his promotion to brigadier-general, but, though he had commanded a brigade for several months with conspicuous gallantry, it was delayed, as has been claimed, through political influence. Col. Cross was the author of numerous poems and prose sketches, written under the pen-name of Richard Everett. He was educated in the University of Massachusetts, and in Western R. L., 24 Jan., 1799; d. there, 1 Oct., 1872. He was educated at a private school in Lebanon, Conn., and entered public life in 1821. He served six terms in the general assembly, was state senator in 1826-27 and 1828-30, chief justice of the court of common pleas for his county in 1827-30, and in 1840 was one of the commissioners for fixing the boundary-line between Connecticut and Rhode Island. In 1842, and again in 1853, he was elected a member of the conventions to amend the state constitution. He held many offices of honor and trust in his native town, interesting himself especially in the matter of free schools.

CROSS, Joseph, clergyman and author, b. in East Brent, Somersetshire, England, 4 July, 1813. He came to the United States in 1825, and in 1828 entered the Episcopal Seminary at Geneseo, N. Y. He was for some time professor of English literature in Transylvania university, Lexington, Ky., and became prominent in the southern branch of the church. He was a member of the Nashville general conference of 1837, and principal in the students' college at a female seminary at Spartanburg, S. C. He entered the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal church in 1837, and, after holding pastorates at Houston, Tex., Buffalo, N. Y., St. Louis, and other places, became in 1855 rector of the church at Las Vegas, New Mexico. Among his publications are "Headlands of Faith"; "Life and Sermons of Christmas Evans," from the Welsh; "The Hebrew Missionary" (Nashville, Tenn., 1853); "Pigah View of the Promised Inheritance," a series of dissertations on the unaccomplished prophecies (New York, 1836); "Epistles to the Emigrants," (1833); "The Workers" (Baltimore, 1861); "Stories and Illustrations of the Ten Commandments" (New York, 1863); "Illustrations of the Shorter Catechism" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1865); "Prellections on Charity"; "Edens of Italy" (New York, 1882); "Knight Banneret" (1862); "Clouds from the Altar" (2 vols., 1883); "Pauline Charity" (1883); and "Old Wine and New" (1884). The last four are collections of sermons. Dr. Cross has also compiled a "Church Reader for Lent" (1863).

His wife, Jane Tandy Chinn, author, b. in Harrodsburg, Ky., in 1817; d. in Elizabethtown, Ky., in October, 1870, married James P. Hardin, a lawyer, in 1835, but he died in 1842, leaving her with three children, and in 1848 she married Dr. Cross.

Mrs. Cross devoted more than twenty years to the education of her children. She was a member of the Methodist church, and was constantly successful. During a trip through Europe with Dr. Cross, she wrote letters to the "Christian Advocate," and also to the Charleston "Courier," and contributed largely to the Nashville "Home Monthly" and other periodicals. During the civil war she sympathized with the soldiers, and at one time she and her two daughters were arrested, tried by a military tribunal, and sent to jail. Her works, all published in Nashville, Tenn., between 1860 and 1870, include "Heart Blossoms for My Little Daughters"; "Warside Flowerets"; "Bible Gleanings," "Drift-Wood," "Gonzalo de Cordova," a translation from the Spanish of Florian; "Duncan Adair," a story of the civil war; and "Azile," a story partly of southern experiences during the war (1868).

CROSS, James, soldier, b. in Maryland; d. near the present Fort Brown, Texas, 21 April, 1846. He entered the army as ensign in the 42d infantry, 27 April, 1814; became assistant deputy quartermaster-general, with the rank of captain, 18 June, 1819; major-quartermaster, 22 May, 1828; and assistant quartermaster-general, 1 Jan., 1838, and became captain of colonel, 7 July, 1888. He was chief of the quartermaster's department of the army of occupation from 10 Oct., 1845, till his death, which he met at the hands of Mexican banditti. Col. Cross published "Military Laws of the United States" (Washington, 1837), b. in Maryland in 1808; d. in New York city, 15 July, 1876, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1835, assigned to the infantry, and served on garrison, frontier, and commissary duty. He was made first lieutenant on 31 Dec., 1831, assistant quartermaster, 1 Jan., 1838, and became captain in the first infantry, 7 July, 1888. He was chief quartermaster of Wool's division in 1846-7, and of the Army of Mexico in 1848, promoted to major on 24 July, 1847, and served until the civil war, during which he was chief quartermaster of various posts and camps. He was made deputy quartermaster-general, 26 Feb., 1863, and on 13 March, 1865, was brevetted brigadier-general in the regular army. He was promoted to colonel, 29 July, 1866, and on the same day was retired.

CROSSWELL, Andrew, clergyman, b. in Charlestown, Mass., in 1790; d. in Boston, Mass., 12 April, 1875. He was graduated at Harvard in 1782, ordained in Groton, Conn., 14 Oct., 1788, and on 6 Oct., 1798, was installed over a society in Boston formed by persons from other churches. He was active as a controversialist. Among his numerous publications are "Reply to a Book entitled 'A Display of God's Special Grace'" (1742); "The Apostle's Advice to the Jailer Improved: being a Solemn Warning against the Awful Sin of Soul-Murder" (1744); "Heaven Shut against Arminians and Independents," (1745); "Bishop Warburton's Sermon before the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel" (1769); and "Remarks on the Satirical Drollery at Cambridge, Last Commencement Day." (1771).

CROSWELL, Charles Z., statesman, b. in Newburgh, N. Y., 7 Oct., 1825; d. in Adrian, Mich., 13 Dec., 1885. He was apprenticed to the carpenter's trade in Adrian, but in his twentieth year began the study of law, and soon became deputy county clerk. In 1860 he was city registrar, and was re-elected in 1852. Mr. Crosswell became mayor of Adrian in 1862, and in the autumn of that year entered the state senate. After serving in this capacity three terms, he was successively president of the Constitutional convention in 1867, elector at-large on the Democratic ticket in 1868, speaker of the lower house of the legislature in 1874, and later secretary of the State board of charities.

After filling the office of governor of Michigan in 1876, he was re-elected in 1878.

CROSWELL, Harry, clergyman, b. in West Haven, Conn., June 21, 1813, d. in the same place, June 21, 1888. He was educated under the care of Rev. Dr. Perkins and Dr. Noah Webster. When quite young, he entered his brother's printing-office in Catskill, N. Y., and soon became editor of a paper issued there. He founded a Federalist newspaper called the "Balance" in Hudson, N. Y., in 1802, which became noted for the bitterness and scathing sarcasm of its editorials; and Mr. Croswell became involved in many libel suits. The most celebrated of these was caused by an article on Jefferson, published in the "Waasp," a paper owned by Mr. C. B. Brewster, and Alexander Hamilton's last and one of his finest speeches was made in Croswell's defence at the trial. Croswell afterward edited a political newspaper in Albany, whither he removed in 1806, and was afterwards editor of many liberal papers in New York, among them the "Argus," edited by Mr. Southwick, who recovered damages. Croswell called on his friends for money to make good this amount, and on their refusal determined to enter the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal church, though he had been brought up a Congregationalist. He was ordained deacon of the church in which he was born, in the city of New York, in 1813; and in 1814, he became rector of Trinity church, New York, Conn., then the only Episcopal church in the city, holding services in an old wooden building on Church street till the opening of the new church edifice, on Oct. 22, 1815. He was a prominent and active member of the vestry till his death. He was a man of great ability and much learning, and the church was much benefited by his labors.

CROSOE, Samuel, clergyman, b. near Chambersburg, Pa., Oct. 22, 1788; d. in Oswego, Ill., July 20, 1856. He was graduated at Yale in 1809, and was licensed to preach by the presbytery of Kentucky. In 1809, he was licensed to preach by the presbytery of Kentucky. In 1813, he was called to the pastorate of the church at Greenfield, Ohio, and in 1815 he was called to the Pastorate of the church at New York, and remained pasto-CROWELL, William, journalist, b. in Middlefield, Mass., in 1806; d. in Flanders, N. J., 19 Aug., 1871. After receiving an academical education, he entered the navy, and served for three years at Waterville, Me. He took charge, in 1838, of the "Christian Watchman," the principal Baptist paper in New England, to which he had previously been a large contributor, and conducted it with ability till its consolidation with the "New England Watchman." He then edited the "Western Watchman," in St. Louis, for several years, and during the civil war was pastor of a church in central Illinois. Rochester university gave him the degree of D.D. In 1857, Dr. Crowell was the author of "The Church-Member's Manual of Ecclesiastical Principles"; "The Church-Member's Hand-Book" (Boston, 1850); a "History of Baptist Literature for Fifty Years," for the missionary jubilee volume, and several Sunday-school books.

CROWNINSHIELD, Jacob, congressman, b. in Salem, Mass., 31 March, 1770; d. in Washington, D. C., 14 April, 1808. He was educated for a merchant, and at one time he and three of his brothers were in command of vessels in the India trade. He was a member of the Massachusetts legislature, and a member of Congress, serving from 1803 till 1805. He was appointed secretary of the navy by President Jefferson on 3 March, 1805, but never entered upon his duties, owing to his rapid decline and death, the result of consumption.—Jacob's brother, Benjamin Williams, secretary to the navy, was president of Brown university, died 25 Feb., 1812; d. there, 3 Feb., 1851, received an English education, and engaged in business in Salem, Mass. He was a state senator in 1811, and on 17 Dec., 1814, appointed secretary of the navy by President Madison. He held the same office in Monroe's cabinet, and resigned in November, 1818. He was a presidential elector in 1820, and in 1822-3, and then elected to congress as a democrat from the Salem district, serving from 1 Dec., 1823, till 3 March, 1831. He was a candidate for re-election in 1828, but defeated by Rufus Choate. —His grandson, Arrant Schuyler, naval officer, b. in New York state, 14 March, 1843, was graduated at the U. S. naval academy in 1863. He was attached to the steam sloop "Ti- condorega," and participated in both attacks on Fort Sumter. He was commissioned for his efficiency by Capt. Charles Steedman. He was made lieutenant, 10 Nov., 1866, lieutenant-commander, 10 March, 1888, and commander, 25 March, 1880. He is a member of the naval advisory board in New York city. —Benjamin Williams's grandson, Frederick, artist, b. in Boston, Mass., 27 Nov., 1843, was graduated at Harvard in 1866, and began the study of water-color drawing in London in 1867 under Rowbotham, devoting himself to landscape-painting in water-colors and in oil. He passed eleven consecutive years in Europe, most of the time in Italy, and studied his profession under Couture, though he was for one term in the Paris école des beaux arts, under Cabanel. At this time he took up figure-painting. His first work exhibited in public was an allegorical portrait group, the Everlasting Father, from Indiana, 16 July, 1862, and became a major-general of volunteers, 5 March, 1865. He served with credit throughout the war, and especially distinguished himself in the battles that were fought near Richmond, Ky., 22 and 30 July, 1864. His water-colors are much admired. After his return to this country he became, in 1879, instructor in the art school connected with the Museum of fine arts in Boston, and remained there till 1885. He has lately devoted the greater part of his time to mural painting, and to stained glass. —Croixton, John Thomas, soldier, b. in Bourbon county, Ky., 20 Nov., 1817; d. in La Paz, Bolivia, 16 April, 1874. He was graduated at Yale in 1857, studied law in Georgetown, Ky., was admitted to the bar in 1858, and began practice in Danville, Ky., 11 Aug. 1860. Two years later he was active in the movement for raising Union troops, and went to the front in June, 1861, as lieutenant-colonel of the 4th Kentucky infantry. In March, 1862, he succeeded to the command of the regiment, and in August, 1862, was commissioned brigadier general. Soon afterward he was brevetted major-general. He participated in the battles of Sherman's army, and at the close of the war was put in command of the military district of southwest Georgia, with headquarters at Macon. In December, 1865, he resigned his commission and returned to Kentucky, where he resumed the practice of law, residing on his farm near Paris. Two or three years later he was active in establishing the "Louisville Commercial" as a republican journal. His exposure during the war and subsequent overwork had greatly impaired his health, and in 1873 he accepted the office of U. S. minister to Bolivia, in the expectation of benefit to his health from it; but it was too late.

Crowther, John Price, manufacturer, b. in Springerfield, Delaware co., Pa., 13 Jan., 1789; d. in Upland, Pa., 1 Aug., 1854. He began with cheap cotton goods; he made an ample fortune, which he largely devoted to philanthropic purposes. In 1855 he erected at Upland, Pa., at a cost of $45,000, a building intended for general education, but which he subsequently gave to the Baptists for a theological seminary. In honor of him as a founder, this institution was called the Crozer theological seminary. His widow and children have endowed it with contributions amounting to $275,000. Mr. Crozer made other large gifts to the cause of education, the American Baptist publication society, and humane institutions.

Crozet, Claude, educator, b. in France; d. in 1863. He was educated at the Polytechnic school in Paris, and became an officer of artillery under Napoleon 1. He came to the United States in 1816, and on 1 Dec., 1817, took charge of the military Seminary at West Point, and was a professor from 1817 till 1823, and thereafter as a civil engineer.

Cruse, Francisco, author, b. in Granada, Spain, about 1828, died in Peru in 1864. He was a Dominican, and held many offices in the province of San Juan Bautista, Peru. He founded the college of Santo Tomás in Lima, and was professor of theology at the time of his death. He was a voluminous writer, both on theological and political subjects. His principal works, published in Lima, are "Historia del Rosario & Coros," "Discursos pro Occidentalibus," "Cursus Artium," and "Memorial Obligation del Vassalo." CRUSE, Peter Hoffman, writer, b. in Baltimore, Md., in 1795; d. there, 7 Sept., 1822. He was educated at Princeton, and studied law, but subsequently devoted himself entirely to literary pursuits. His contributions to newspapers and periodicals embrace the reviews, and for ten years prior to his death he edited the "Baltimore American." During the years 1818-9 he was associated with John P. Kennedy in the publication of "The Red Book," a fortnightly of local and temporary interest, which contained much playful satire by Kennedy, and some bright poetry by Cruse. He was noted as a brilliant conversationalist.

CRUTTENDEN, Daniel Henry, educator, b. in Galway, N. Y., 27 Feb., 1819; d. in Castleton, N. Y., 21 June, 1875. In 1841, he became principal of the Mechanics' institute in New York. He advocated methods of teaching that are now in general use. He published text-books, including a series of "Systematic Arithmetics" (New York, 1868); "The Philosophy of Language" (1870); and a "Rhetorical Grammar" (1872).

CRUZ, Juan Bautista Velasco de la (crooth), cacique and captain-general of the Chichimecas, b. in Texcoco, Mexico, about 1517; d. in the city of Mexico in 1572. He was a descendant of King Macehualtepetitza. When the Spaniards occupied Mexico he was baptized, and, entering the Spanish militia, was appointed ensign of the royal guards two years afterward. Antonio de Mendoza gave him command of 80 Spanish soldiers and 400 Indian archers, and sent him to enlist volunteers and conquer the territories occupied by the Chichimecas. When Mendoza left Mexico, in 1550, he appointed Cruz cacique of all territories that he might conquer, and in 1559 Luis de Velasco advanced him to the rank of captain-general of the Chichimecas. Cruz gave the Spaniards three Franciscan friars in acknowledgment of their work in favor of the natives, and built the bridge of that city. Charles V. rewarded him with new privileges, and Cruz continued his services during the rest of his life. His remains were buried in the convent of Santiago Tlatelolco of Mexico.

CRUZ, Rodrigo de la (crooth), soldier, b. in Marbella, Spain, 25 Dec., 1637; d. in Mexico, 10 Sept., 1716. He went to Central America with his father, who had been appointed governor of Costa Rica, in 1636, and afterward succeeded him in that office. He accompanied the conquest of Talampanca, in which he spent a large portion of his private fortune, and the king of Spain rewarded him with the title of Marquis de Talampanca; but he soon entered the order founded by Father Betencourt in Guatemala, and succeeded him as superior, 2 Feb., 1698. He went to Spain, where he founded several hospitals, and obtained the incorporation of his order, 26 March, 1687. For this purpose he went to Rome and Madrid, where he remained for nine years, and on his return he founded new institutions and hospitals in Mexico and Potosí. He wrote "Constitutiones de la Religion Bolemitifcic fundada en las Indias Occidentales" (Mexico, 1751).

CRUSE, Christian Frederick, clergyman, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 27 June, 1794; d. in New York city, 5 Oct., 1864. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1815, and after studying theology was ordained in the Presbyterian Episcopal church by Bishop White, of Pennsylvania, in 1822. He acquired a high reputation for his knowledge of ancient languages. From 1831 till 1833 he was assistant professor in the University of Pennsylvania, and afterward professor of rhetoric and rhetoric at St. Paul's college, Minn. In 1847 he became rector of Trinity church in Fishkill, N. Y., where he remained until 1853, after which he became librarian in the General theological seminary in New York. His translation of Eusebius' "Ecclesiastical History" (New York; reprinted from London, 1838) is considered the best English version.
CRUZ, Sor Juana Inés de la, Mexican poet, b. in San Miguel de Neapartia, near the city of Mexico, 12 Nov., 1651; d. in Mexico, 17 April, 1695. At an age of five she could repeat, in order, all the numbers of the catechism, and at the age of eight composed a poem on the holy sacrament. Soon afterward she was sent to the city of Mexico, learned Latin and other branches rapidly, and asked her parents' permission to disguise herself as a student so that she could enter a nunnery. Not being allowed to do this, she continued her studies privately, and her literary accomplishments soon made her famous in Mexico. The vice-queen retained her as one of the ladies of the household. The viceroy, the Marquis de Mancera, wishing to test her learning and intelligence (she was then seventeen years old), invited several theologians, jurists, philosophers, and poets to a meeting, during which she had to answer, unprepared, many questions, and explain several difficult points on various scientific and literary subjects. The manner in which she acquitted herself astonished all present, and greatly increased her reputation. She was much admired in the viceroyal court for her beauty, but refused several proposals of marriage, and entered first the convent of San José, and subsequently that of San Juan de Dios, where she finally took the veil. She then devoted herself for twenty-seven years to her religious duties, as well as to her favorite studies of theology, interpretation of the Scriptures, logic, rhetoric, natural philosophy, mathematics, history, music, and poetry. In 1689 she gave up all studies and exchanged with her desiring duties in the convent, and sold her splendid library to help the poor. Two years afterward a terrible scourge desolated the city of Mexico, and Sister Juana Inés, while personally assisting other nuns suffering from the epidemic, became its victim and died. Her remains were visited with extraordinary ceremonies. She was generally known as "The Nun of Mexico," and was also called "The Tenth Muse." Her writings, mostly in verse, include "Amor es laberinto," a classical drama; "Los empeños de una sola," a comedy; "Ovillillos," a satirical poem; "El Neptuno alegórico," and two volumes entitled "Poesías sagradas y profanas."

CUADRA, Pedro Lucio (kwa'ah-droo), Chilian engineer, b. in the city of Santiago, 14 April, 1842. He studied in the university of his native city, and when twenty-six years of age was appointed to the scientific commission that the government appointed to make a geographical study of the Chilian territory, his personal efforts assuring the success of the commission's work. In 1874 the owners of the newly discovered silver mines at Caracoles, Bolivia, gave Cuadra the general superintendence of the works, and in 1876 he was appointed president of the Bank of Valparaiso. During Pinto's administration Cuadra was several times offered a portfolio in the cabinet, but declined it, and in 1892 he accepted that of finance under President Santa Maria, distinguishing himself by important reforms. Being a member of the cabinet that negotiated the treaty of peace with Spain, he used all his influence in favor of its negotiation, and King Alfonso XII. awarded him the Great Cross of Naval Merit. He was elected to congress in 1892, served six years, and was president of the senate in 1896.

CUAUCHTEMOTzin (kwah-tay-mo'tzeen), which means "Eagle's Eyesight," sometimes called Cuauchtemoc, Quauchtemotzin, Quauhtemoctec, Guatemoc, Guatimoc, or Guatimecin, thirteenth and last Mexican king (seventh monarch, according to other accounts), b. in 1495; d. in 1524. He was the son of Ahuitzotl, and married Tecuichapatzin, a daughter of Moctezuma (Moctezuma) and the widow of Cuitlahuati, his own uncle, whom he succeeded on the throne, being elected and crowned about the end of January, 1519, and kept up the old accounts, and at the age of eight composed a poem on the holy sacrament. Soon afterward she was sent to the city of Mexico, learned Latin and other branches rapidly, and asked her parents' permission to disguise herself as a student so that she could enter a nunnery. Not being allowed to do this, she continued her studies privately, and her literary accomplishments soon made her famous in Mexico. The vice-queen retained her as one of the ladies of the household. The viceroy, the Marquis de Mancera, wishing to test her learning and intelligence (she was then seventeen years old), invited several theologians, jurists, philosophers, and poets to a meeting, during which she had to answer, unprepared, many questions, and explain several difficult points on various scientific and literary subjects. The manner in which she acquitted herself astonished all present, and greatly increased her reputation. She was much admired in the viceroyal court for her beauty, but refused several proposals of marriage, and entered first the convent of San José, and subsequently that of San Juan de Dios, where she finally took the veil. She then devoted herself for twenty-seven years to her religious duties, as well as to her favorite studies of theology, interpretation of the Scriptures, logic, rhetoric, natural philosophy, mathematics, history, music, and poetry. In 1689 she gave up all studies and exchanged with her religious duties in the convent, and sold her splendid library to help the poor. Two years afterward a terrible scourge desolated the city of Mexico, and Sister Juana Inés, while personally assisting other nuns suffering from the epidemic, became its victim and died. The young emperor endured his torture calmly, and when the Texcoco chief groaned in his death-agony, reproved him, saying, "Do you think I am on a bed of roses?" A monument to Cuauhtemotzin, surmounted by a bronze statue, represented in the illustration, has been erected in the city of Mexico.

CUBA, Dionisio Vives, Count of, Spanish general, b. in the latter part of the 18th century; d. in 1840. He was captain-general of Cuba in 1824, when all Spanish possessions on the American continent were in danger of independence. He had but few troops under his command, but managed to maintain order and preserve the island of Cuba for Spain without troubles or any sort of violence. In recognition of his valuable services to the mother country, the government rewarded him with high honors, among them the title of Count of Cuba.

CUDEQUALA (coo-da-kah'-lah), Araucanian warrior, b. in the Mariguena valley, Chili, about 1555; d. near Purén, 12 Dec., 1587. While very young he entered the Araucanian army as a private, although he was a nobleman, and gradually rose to high rank, being promoted to the grade of general. The general-in-chief, Dayacura, gave him command of a strong army to attack the city of Angol, which he did without success, but then marched to the city of Arauco, besieged and entered it. Afterward he intended to attack Port Trinidad, this fortress commanded the passage from BioBio, but a body of Spanish troops under Francisco Hernandez came out and defeated Cudequala, who lost an arm and was otherwise severely wounded. This forced him to retire to the mountains. He was followed thither by the lieutenant-governor of Chili, who attempted an ambuscade, only to be discovered, defeated, and killed, with fifty of his men, 14 Nov., 1586.
the same day Cudequalla was elected general-in-

Chief by acclamation. In the following year, 1587, Thomas Cavendish, who commanded a predatory expedition of three ships against the Spanish colonies, landed at Quintero, but Cudequalla’s warriors attacked the English and forced them to sail away, and he dispersed the fleet. After some successful operations the Araucanian chief determined to take the city of Angol by surprise, for which he managed to have the Indian inhabitants prepared to set fire to the houses of the Spaniards at an appointed time during the night, while his 400 warriors, under his command, would go by the gate of the place. This was done, and, while the flames consumed many buildings, the frightened inmates ran about the streets only to be horribly dealt with at the hands of the Araucanians. The governor of Angol hastily gathered some troops, and after desperate fighting, Cudequalla retreated at daybreak. But this did not discourage the Indian general, who soon besieged Purrén and defeated a body of Spanish troops sent by the governor to re-enforce the place. Then he proposed to the besieged to surrender into his hands, and the governor, seeing that in five days they would have starved, immediately accepted the challenge, and on an appointed day the chiefs met in an open field, each being accompanied by a small number of officers and men. The encounter was very short, for the two opponents at once made a furious attack, riding at full gallop; but Cudequalla, with his keen eyesight, discovered that the Spaniards were running through with the Spaniards’ spear. Even when dying the Araucanian warrior would not admit defeat, and tried in vain to mount his horse again.

Cudworth, James, colonist, b. in England about 1612, d. there in 1682. He was an elder brother of Ralph Cudworth, famous among Cambridge Platonists, and came to America in 1634, settling in Plymouth. Later he removed to Scituate, where for several years he was prominent in public affairs, and one of the council of war. He was a member of the provincial government and commanded the Plymouth troops during the Indian war with King Philip, winning a military reputation second only to that of Miles Standish. He became unpopular on account of his opposition to the severe measures taken against the Quakers. In 1681 he was made deputy governor, and during the same year sent to England as an agent for the colony, but died soon after his arrival. Some of his letters on public business are still extant.

CueLLAR, José T. de (kwa’-yl-yar), Mexican author, b. at San Luis Potosi, 15 Aug., 1865. He studied at the San Carlos academy in Mexico, and afterward entered the diplomatic service. He was attached to the Mexican legation at Washington from 1856 till 1858, when he returned to Mexico to fill a place in the foreign office. He accompanied President Juárez to Paso del Norte in his official capacity. He was recalled to Washington in 1859 and subsequently elected a representative to congress. His appointment as chief officer or under-secretary of foreign affairs was made in August, 1866. Among Cuellar’s works are these comedies and dramas: “Deberes y sacrificios,” “Azares de una venganza,” “Natural y figura,” “Arte de amar,” “Cubrir las apariencias,” “Redención,” and “Un viaje á Oriente.” His novels include “Ensalada de pollos,” “Chucho el Nifio,” “Isolina la ex-fugitiva,” “Las jamonas,” “Las gentes que son así,” and “Gabriel el Cerrajero.” He has also written several poems.

Cuénécura (kwe-nay-coo’-rah), Araucanian soldier, b. in the province of Catiray, Chili, in 1578; d. in October, 1609. Being hereditary cacique of Catiray, and officer of the Araucanian army under the command of their great chief Caupolicán, he fought all his battles against the Spaniards, and finally succeeded in his command early in 1604. In 1605 he defeated the Spanish troops under the German commander, Lisperger, near Barba, directed three fierce attacks on that city, and took it, Lisperger having been killed during its defensive operations. In 1607 Cuénécura routed 8,000 Spaniards newly sent from Peru and marching in two columns, headed by Gens. Saravia and Pineda, and every man of that army was either killed or made a prisoner by the Indians. The captain that led the advance had with 2,000 men to attack him in 1606, but after a well-fought battle retreated. Cuénécura was wounded then, but directed another battle before he recovered, and, seeing that his condition prevented him from continuing the fight, being exhausted, he took his own life, immediately accepting the challenge, and on an appointed day the chiefs met in an open field, each being accompanied by a small number of officers and men. The encounter was very short, for the two opponents at once made a furious attack, riding at full gallop; but Cuénécura, with his keen eyesight, discovered that the Spaniards were running through with the Spaniards’ spear. Even when dying the Araucanian warrior would not admit defeat, and tried in vain to mount his horse again.

Cueva, Beatriz de la (kwe’-vah), wife of Pedro de Alvarado, the conqueror of Guatemala, b. in Spain early in the 16th century. In 1541, when Alvarado returned to Central America, after his second voyage to Spain in 1539, he married there Doña Beatriz, a sister of his first wife, Doña Francisca de la Cueva, who died in Vera Cruz in 1530. In 1540 Alvarado was engaged in several expeditions in Mexico, and while crossing the mountains was killed by a fall of his horse early in July, 1541. When this news reached Guatemala, the municipal council elected Doña Beatriz to succeed her husband in the government. On the following her inauguration she presided, with many other people, during the terrible earthquakes and floods that destroyed the city, 11 Sept., 1541. Ever since she has been generally called “Doña Beatriz la sin ventura.” (Dona Beatriz, the unfortunate).

Cuevas Dávalos, Alonso, Mexican prelate, b. in the city of Mexico, 25 Nov., 1590; d. 2 Sept., 1665. He was the first native Mexican elected to the archiepiscopal see of Mexico. He studied at the college of San Idefonso, won the doctor’s degree in theology, and then filled the chair of theology in the University of Mexico. He was sent to Puebla as first canon of the cathedral in 1635, and distinguished himself by his charitable work during an epidemic in 1642–3. Eight years afterward he was translated to the capital, and filled high offices both in the cathedral and in the university, after which he was promoted to the see of Oaxaca, where he succeeded in restoring peace among the revolted population of Tehuan tepe, the king of Spain thanking him by a special decree, 2 Oct., 1602. He received in June, 1664, his appointment to the see of Mexico, which he occupied until his death. He had been several important reforms, but did not live to finish them.

Cuffee, Paul, Indian preacher, b. in 1757; d. in Montauk, Long Island, 7 March, 1813. He was a member of the Shinnecock tribe of Indians on Long Island, and was the fourth missionary employed among them by the New York missionary society, preaching there thirteen years.

CUFFEE, Paul, philanthropist, b. on one of the Elizabeth isles, near New Bedford, Mass., in 1803; d. 1859. He was a negro born in Africa, who had been a slave, and his mother an Indian. He followed a seafaring life, became owner of a vessel, which he manned entirely with negroes, and acquired a large fortune. He was an influential member of the Society of Friends, and later contributed liberally to it. In the scheme of colonizing American freedmen on the western coast of Africa, corresponded with friends of the enterprise in England and Africa, visited the colony in his own ship in 1811 to study its advantages, and in 1815 carried out thirty-eight colored emigrants and provided means for establishing them in Africa. He applied to the British government for leave to land other companies of colored people in Sierra Leone, but died before the permission came.

CUIQUICITZATZIN (kwee-kwits-tses-teen'), two brothers of Tezoco, crowned in 1520. He was a brother of Cacamatzin, or Camatin, who, having determined to make war against the Spaniards, would not listen to the entreaties of envoys sent by Cortés. Subsequently the conqueror managed to have them killed by a native, and replaced by Cuicutitzatzin, but this king ruled his nation only three or four months, as Comaccatiz succeeded him in 1521. After serious trouble with the Spaniards, he was imprisoned and taken to Tlacuilo, and escaped thence to Tezoco, where his brothers had ruled. But the latter, thinking him to be a spy for the Spaniards, ordered his immediate execution.

CUIENTUR (kwee-en-toor), Araucanian cacique of the province of Naneo, Chili, b. there in 1578; d. in 1627. He entered the Araucanian army as a private, and was gradually raised to the rank of general after rendering great services to the Araucanians. In 1618 he succeeded Loncetoga in the command of their army, and one of his first operations was to defeat a Spanish detachment and take possession of their 400 horses. In the following year he routed the valiant Sanche of philosophical, and killed many Spanish (who was killed near that city, and afterward pillaged the whole province. He then attacked the town of San Felipe de Austria, ransacked other neighboring towns, and finally took up a position in the Cangrejos Pass, to oppose the Spanish troops. Commander Rebollo led the battle at Chimbo, but the latter was the result of a battle heavily favored by Cuentur. This Araucanian chief captured Nuculgnneau and killed every man of his garrison. He continued his operations till 1625, when, being tired of warfare, he resigned his command and retired to his own lands for the rest of his life. He used to call himself the eldest son of Fortune.

CUILLAMACHU (kwee-yah-mah-tchun), Araucanian soldier, b. in the Uthamapu valley, Chili, in 1534; d. in December, 1600. He was a cacique of Uthamapu, and the only person who, with the warriors of his tribe, the rest of the Araucanian army. Having taken part in many battles against the Spaniards, he was given the supreme command in 1538, and organized a large army at Lumaco. Two years later he attacked and took Fort Jesus, and then spread his forces about the districts near the Spanish settlements in 1543, causing them great troubles. In 1597 he took the important fortresses of Purén and Lumaco, and on 22 Nov., 1598, surprised in an ambush the governor of Chili, Loyola (a nephew of the founder of the Jesuit order), who was crossing the Curalava valley with his family, sixty officers, and three priests, the whole party perishing after a desperate resistance. Cuillamachu immediately ordered that not only all the Araucanians, but the Cunco and Quechua Indians, should be killed. The snows of the recede found outside of the fortified cities or towns; and during the year he closely invested the cities of Osorno, Valdivia, Villarrica, Imperial, Calafate, Angol, and Coya, as well as the fortress of Arauco. In the mean time he crossed Biobio river, burned the cities, and the Spaniards were left terrified and isolated. He then proceeded to every populated place in those provinces, and returned to his quarters with a large booty. The royal troops under Gen. Quiñones had several undiscernible encounters in 1598 with the Araucanians along the banks of the Biobio, especially at Yumbel, where 2,000 Indians under the cacique made a determined resistance against 2,000 Spanish soldiers. On 24 Nov., at daybreak, he crossed Curalaba river, at the head of 4,000 men, surprised the city of Valdivia, and obtained plunder valued at nearly two million dollars. He then set fire to the buildings, killed many of the people, and destroyed the ships in the harbor, and returned to his quarters, near the Biobio, with all the Spanish artillery and war material, and over 400 prisoners. In 1600 a Dutch expedition tried to land at Valdivia; but, after the cacique Cuillamachu was defeated in 1602 the Indian chief took possession of the city of Villarrica, which had been closely besieged for nearly three years, and the cities of Osorno and Imperial also surrendered to him in 1600. Cuillamachu was the most famous of the Araucanians generals, and the only one that succeeded in re-establishing independence in his country after it was conquered by the Spaniards. In his long career as a warrior he was wounded forty-four times. On one occasion the governor of Chili invited him to negotiate for peace; but he answered that he would never submit to a foreign power, as a drop of blood remained in the veins of his warriors.

CUILLAVILUL (kwee-yah-veo-loo), cacique of the Araucanian Indians called Pueblos, b. in the Yumbel district, Chili, in 1590; d. 3 Oct., 1612. He was noted for his bravery, gave continual trouble to the Spanish authorities in the many battles against Merlo, the governor of Chili, and against his successor, Juan Jaraquemada. In 1612 Cuillavilul received a letter from the king of Spain, Philip III., suggesting an arrangement for peace and establishment of the Christian religion; but he paid little attention to it, thinking it was intended to delude him and prepare his ruin, and at once directed new operations, but not long afterward was killed in a battle near Chilian.

CUILLAHUATZIN, or CUILLAHUATL (kwee-yah-wah-teen), tenth Mexican or Aztec king (twelfth king, according to other chroniclers), b. in 1490; d. 12 Oct., 1520. Being one of the sons of Axayacatl, he was also the lord of Tzapatlapán and a general of the Mexican army, when elected king upon the death of his brother, Motecuma II. His reign was marked by victories, advised other native princes to oppose any advance made by Cortés, and also sent ambassadors to Tlacaxco to ask aid from that republic. But he was unsuccessful in this attempt, after having caused Cortés the defeat and subsequent troubles that gave rise to the events of CULBERTSON, Matthew Simpson, clergyman, b. in Chambersburg, Pa., 18 Jan., 1818; d. in China in August, 1882. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy, graduated with the rank of second lieutenant of artillery at Rouse's Point during the Canada border disturbances, and as assistant professor of mathematics at the military academy. He resigned his commission, 15 April, 1841, studied theology at Princeton, and upon graduation in 1844 was ordained as a missionary to China, and labored in that country until his death. He was engaged for several years in preparing a revised Chinese translation of the Bible (1855). He published "Darkness in the Flowery Kingdom, or Religious Notions and Popular Superstitions in North China" (New York, 1877).

CULLUM, Shelby Moore, senator, b. in Monticello, Wayne co., Ky., 22 Nov., 1829. His father settled in Tazewell county, Ill., in 1830, where he became prominent among the pioneers of the state, a member of the legislature, and a trusted friend of Abraham Lincoln. The son received a classical education, began the study of law in Springfield, Ill., in 1833, and as soon as he was admitted to the bar was elected city attorney. He practiced law in Springfield, was a candidate for presidential elector on the Fillmore ticket in 1856, elected to the legislature in 1856 and 1860, chosen speaker in his second term, a member of the war commission that sat at Cairo in 1862, and a member of congress from Illinois from 4 Dec., 1863, till 9 March, 1871, representing the scenes of battle in western Illinois, was then returned to the legislature in 1872 and Gen. Logan in 1884. He was elected governor of Illinois in 1876, and re-elected in 1880, serving from 8 Jan., 1877, to 5 Feb., 1883, when he resigned, having been chosen U. S. senator as a republican, to succeed David Davis, independent democrat, for the term expiring on 3 March, 1889. Mr. Cullum has been prominently connected with the question of railroad regulation. As a member of the committee on representatives he appointed the committee in 1880 which drafted the stringent railroad law of Illinois, which was one of the first states to take action on the subject. During his service of six years as governor he became his duty to appoint the Illinois railroad commissioners, and to see that they secured the enforcement of the law by the courts and practically put in operation during his administration. As senator he has been zealous and active in endeavoring to secure national legislation upon the same subject, and in 1885, as chairman of the senate committee on interstate commerce, conducted an elaborate hearing on the question of the regulation of railroad corporations by national legislation. His report upon this subject, submitted to the senate, 18 Jan., 1886, is an elaborate review of the whole subject, and has attracted attention at home and abroad, resulting in the passage by the senate of the bill that bears his name, which was referred to a conference committee of the two houses.

CULPEPER, John, surveyor-general and political leader in the Carolinas, b. in England. He was a refugee from the southern or Clarendon colony, and in 1678 headed an insurrection in the northern or Albemarle colony in favor of popular liberties. The grievances that led to his uprising were the interference of the executive in elections, and the imposition of excessive taxes on commerce. Under his lead the people deposed the president and deputies of the proprietaries, seized the public funds, appointed new magistrates and judges, called a parliament, and took into the hands of the colonists the functions of government into their own hands. After the new government was organized, Culpeper was sent to England to negotiate a compromise. He was there indicted for high treason, but was acquitted, on the ground that there existed no regular government in Albemarle at the time of the rebellion. He returned to Carolina, and in 1680 laid out Charles Town (Charleston).

CULPEPER, or COLEPEPER, Thomas, Lord, colonial governor of Virginia, b. in England; d. there in 1719. He was one of the royal favorites to whom, in 1673, King Charles II. granted for the period of thirty-one years the entire territory of Virginia, deputing the royal colonists of the very titles of their lands. Culpeper, in 1675, purchased from the Earl of Arlington, his co-grantee, the latter's rights between the Rapahannock and Potomac rivers. He was appointed one of the commissioners for plantations in 1675, and proclaimed governor of Virginia for life. He came to the colony in 1680. Under his administration was passed an act of indemnity for offences committed during the rebellion under Gov. Berkeley; also an act to enable the governor to grant naturalization, and one to prevent the frequent meeting of slaves. Returning to England in 1683, in violation of his orders, he was arrested immediately on his arrival; and, as he had corruptly received presents from the assembly, a jury of Middlesex found that he had forfeited his commission. He was shrewd and capable, but enriched himself by bribery and extortion. His estates, consisting of lands on the Isle of Wight, manors in Kent, and the tract of the Northern Neck in Virginia, containing 5,200,000 acres, descended through his daughter, Catherine, who married Baron Fairfax, to her son, Lord Fairfax, patron of Washington.

CULTZHAOTL (cooltz-ha-oot-l), Aztec poet, b. in 1670; d. in 1421. He was the son of the Tlaxcalteo prince Xontle. His first work was a long poem entitled "Zempazochtli." The Court of Regla, as descendant and heir of Hernán Cortés, has preserved the original, a translation of which was made by Peredo, who calls Cultzhaotl the Aztec Virgil. His second work, "Huitzilopochtli," is considered superior to the first. Clavijero, a profound scholar, finds in it many features resembling those of Dante's "Divine Comedy." Cultzhaotl was the first that gave a vigorous character and form to tragedy in Mexico, and had the wardances replaced by dialogues and tableaux. The Aztec kings of the time led the performance of his tragedy, "Mihuatl"; but the noblemen thought the play was a satire on religion, and caused the poet to be imprisoned and subsequently buried alive, to the neck, in a field near Chapultepec. According to Netzahualcoyotl, a lady of the court, ward him in the place of government into their own hands. After the new government was organized, Culpeper was sent to England to negotiate a compromise. He was there indicted for high treason, but was acquitted, on the ground that there existed no regular government in Albemarle at the time of the rebellion. He returned to Carolina, and in 1680 laid out Charles Town (Charleston).

CULVER, Daniel, pioneer, b. in Maryland in 1783; d. in California in 1857. He was the first American that went to upper California, and the first that built a house in San Francisco (on the same ground now occupied by the Palace Hotel). He was also the first to reach the Santa Clara bar. At the beginning of the Mexican war, in 1847, Culver went to New Orleans, organized a company at his own expense, and joined the expedition under Gen. Scott. When the American navy had bombarded Vera Cruz, Culver advanced toward Jalapa and defeated a guerrilla band; but, having gone farther into the country, he was captured by the Mexican chief Father Jaranta, who was about to have him hanged at Plan de Barrancas when Sergeant Lincoln, of the volunteer force, saved him. He was then distinguished himself at the battle of Cerro Gordo, when he almost effected the capture of Gen. Santa Anna, and did take a richly caparisoned horse. He was dangerously wounded at the capture of the city of Mexico, returned to the United States, and again settled in California. He spent the rest of his life, and accumulated a fortune, a large part of which was bequeathed to charity.

CULVER, John Young, civil engineer, b. in New York city, 18 May, 1838. He studied surveying and architecture, after which he spent three years in general engineering. Subsequently he became assistant engineer in Central park, New York, and during the civil war was assistant secretary of the U. S. sanitary commission. He also served for a time on the defences south of the Potomac. In 1865 he returned to Central park, remaining there for a year, when he was appointed assistant engine in charge of the Brooklyn parks, and from 1873 till 1886 was chief engineer and superintendent. He has acted in the capacity of associate engineer to the Albany parks, to the parks and the riverside improvement at Cleveland, and the capital grounds in Nashville. He was a member of the first rapid transit commission in Brooklyn, and later engineer of the sixth rapid transit commission, besides being connected with a great variety of general railroad work and public improvement. Col. Culver has invented implements for improved road construction and for the transplanting of large trees. He is a member of the American society of civil engineers. For more than twenty years he has been a contributor to scientific, literary, and art journals, and he has also edited educational and sanitary journals.
CUMBERLAND

CUMBERLAND, Frederic William, Canadian architect, b. in London, England, in 1820; d. in Toronto, 5 Aug., 1881. He was educated at the Collegiate school, Dublin, and subsequently at King's college, London. After completing his course with distinction, he emigrated to Canada and in 1844 appointed to the engineering department of the Admiralty, and superintended the construction of the dry docks and sea-walling at Chatham, and assisted Sir William Denison and Capt. James, R. E., during 1845-7, in editing "The Professional Engineer," published by the Cosmos Board of Engineers. In 1847 he arrived in Toronto, Canada, and at once attained prominence as an architect and railway constructor. In 1852 he undertook the superintendence and construction of the Ontario, Simcoe and Huron railway (subsequently the Northern railway) to its terminus at Collingwood, on the Georgian bay, of which road he afterward became managing director. Having completed the construction, he resigned in 1854, and gave his attention solely to architectural work. He designed the plans of St. John the Baptist, the normal school, and Osgood hall, in Toronto, and that of the University of Toronto. The last named is said to be the finest specimen of Norman Gothic architecture on this continent. In 1861, at the time of the "Trent" affair, he organized in Toronto the resources of the mission, the normal school, and the church, and in 1868 the latter was chartered by the state. He represented Algoma in the legislature of Ontario in 1867, and in 1871 in the dominion parliament.

CUMMING, Sir Alexander, British officer, b. about 1790. He was sent in 1790 by the English government on a mission to the Creeks and Cherokees, the object of which was to counteract the designs of the French, who were endeavoring to win the friendship of those tribes, in pursuance of a scheme for the annexation of the interior regions in America lying between their colonies in Canada and the Mississippi. He was appointed envoy to the state of New Scotland and was appointed as envoy to the state of New Scotland in 1764. He was the first Presbyterian minister that preached within the bounds of Tennessee. He was ordained in 1763 as a member of the First Church in New York, and in 1766 became pastor of the church in New Castle in 1764. He was the first Presbyterian minister that preached within the bounds of Tennessee. He was ordained in 1750 as a member of Rev. Mr. Pemberton in New York, and in 1758 both pastors requested a dispensation on account of troubles in the church in respect to matters of ecclesiastical order. Mr. Cumming was relieved on 25 Oct., and on 25 Feb., 1761, was installed as a member of the church. He was removed in 1763 as a member of the Old South Church, Boston, where he remained until his death. He published his last work in 1761, and "Anecdotes of Rev. Mr. Croswell's Latest Letter," etc. (1769).

CUMMING, Gilbert W., lawyer, b. in Delaware county, N. Y., in 1817. He was apprenticed to the carriage-maker, but spent his spare hours in study. He began to study law in 1838, and became prominent in his profession. During the anti-rent troubles of 1845 he commanded a military regiment, and succeeded in restoring order. He removed, in 1833, to Janesville, Wis., and in 1858 to Chicago. In September, 1861, he raised the 31st Illinois regiment, and was appointed its colonel. He was afterward assigned to the command of a brigade, and did good service at Island Number Ten, New Madrid, and Corinth.

CUMMING, Kate, author, b. about 1835. She is of Scottish descent, and has resided in Mobile, Ala., since her childhood. During the civil war she was with one of the Confederate armies, collecting the wounded and assisting in organizing the field hospitals in the campaigns in Tennessee, Kentucky, and Georgia, when the army was retreating. Every evening she spent a few moments over her diary, recording all the incidents that had taken place around her. She published "Hospital Life in the Army of Tennessee" (Louisville, Ky., 1866).

CUMMING, William, soldier, b. in Georgia about 1790; d. in Augusta, Ga., in February, 1883. He studied at the Litchfield, Conn., law-school, but inherited a fortune and never practised. He was appointed major in the 8th infantry on 25 March, 1813, and was wounded in the battle of Chrysler's Field, 11 Nov. He was made adjutant-general, with the rank of colonel, on 16 Feb., 1814, being severely wounded at Lundy's Lane on 25 July, and retiring 2,800 men, directed the appointment of quartermaster-general, with the rank of brigadier-general, in April, 1818, and also that of major-general, tendered him by President Polk on 3 March, 1847. Col. Cumming was a leader of the Union party in the nullification struggle, and his opposition to the organization of South Carolina, on this issue was notorious. The two men, attended by a long train of friends in their own equipages, rushed from one point to another in the attempt to find a place of meeting, and loudly accused each other of treachery to their intentions to the officers of the law. They were widely caricatured, and their actions were watched with interest all over the country. They finally succeeded in meeting twice, and exchanged three shots, by one of which McDuffie was wounded in the hip and lame for life. His brother, Alfred, governor of Utah, b. about 1802; d. in Augusta, Ga., 9 Oct., 1873, was a sutler during the Mexican war. He had been superintendent of Indian affairs on the upper Missouri, and in 1857 President Buchanan appointed him governor of Utah territory, and sent him there with a force of 2,000 men, to clear him in the discharge of his functions, which constituted the famous "Utah Expedition" of that year. On 27 Nov. the governor issued a proclamation declaring the territory to be in a state of rebellion, and this document was sent to Salt Lake City by a Mormon prisoner, accompanied by a letter to Brigham Young, evincing a willingness to temporize. The expedition went into winter quarters at Camp Scott, on Black's Fork, and in March, 1858, Col. Thomas L. Kane arrived in the camp, having been sent by the president as special envoy to Brigham Young. The relations between Gov. Cumming and Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston, commander of the expedition, had become somewhat strained, and, soon after Col. Kane's arrival, that gentleman, taking offense at a fancied slight, wrote a challenge to Gen. Johnston with Gov. Cumming's consent. During the spring difficulties constantly arose, through a misunderstanding on Cumming's part, as to the power he possessed over the troops. On 8 March Judge Cradlebaugh made requisition for soldiers to protect his court, sitting at Provo, during the trial of the Mormons indicted for complicity in the Mountain Meadows massacre, and they were furnished by Gen. Johnston, whereupon Gov. Cumming protested against their use, and on 27 March issued a proclamation denouncing the general's action. The secretary of war afterward forbade Gen. Johnston to use troops for... such purposes. After the proclamation of pard on to the Mormons, in accordance with the temporizing policy adopted by Buchanan's administration, Gov. Cummings objected to the farther advance of the army, but, notwithstanding his produced, and had to work with much to preserve order. Gov. Cummings held his office till 1861, when he was succeeded by Stephen S. Harding,—Alfred's nephew, Alfred, b. in Augusta, Ga., 30 Jan., 1829, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1852. He was aide to Gen. Schuyler Colfax, in 1851–3, and was made lieutenant on 3 March, 1855, and captain in the 10th infantry, 20 July, 1856. He was on the Utah expedition of 1859–60, and on 19 Jan., 1861, resigned, and was soon commissioned lieutenant-colonel in the Confederate army. He rose to the rank of brigadier-general, and served until disabled by wounds received at the battle of Jonesboro, Ga., 31 Aug., 1864. After the war he became a planter near Rome, Ga.

CUMMINGS, Amon Jay, journalist, b. in Conkl ing, N. Y., in 1845. His father edited and published a weekly religious paper in Irvington, and the youth entered the printing-office at the age of twelve years. After attaining manhood, he travelled and worked at the call in many states of the Union and in Canada. He also visited Mexico, Centro-America, and the beginning of the civil war he was a compositor on the New York "Tribune," but soon joined a regiment of volunteers, and fought in the battles of Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville. Soon afterward he returned to work at the "Tribune," establishment, becoming successively night editor and editor, and finally editor of that paper. At present (1887) he is on the editorial staff of the New York "Sun." In 1885–6 he was president of the New York press club. Mr. Cummings is known as a ready extemporaneous speaker. In 1886 he was elected a representative in congress.

CUMMINGS, Andrew Boyd, naval officer,
b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 22 June, 1830; d. in New York, Va., 18 March, 1863. He entered the U. S. navy as midshipman in April, 1847, and was succceeded by Alonzo Hill, the first editor of the New York Times, until he became lieutenant-commander in July, 1862. During the passage of Forts Jackson and St. Philip, and the capture of New Orleans, he was executive officer of the "Richmond." During the subsequent engagement with the batteries at Fort Hudson he fell mortally wounded while cheering the men at their guns. He was removed to New Orleans, but died four days later. Admiral Porter said in a letter written at that time: "He was a gallant officer, and too good a man to lose." Admiral Farragut wrote: "Poor Cummings was a great loss, both to the country and to his family:"

CUMMINGS, Asa, clergyman, b. in Andover, Mass., 29 Sept., 1791; d. at sea, 5 June, 1856. He was for Aspinwall, on a visit to his daughter and for the benefit of his health. On the return voyage, soon after leaving the isthmus, he died. He published a "Memoir of Dr. Edward Payson" (Boston, 1846).

CUMMINGS, Ebenezer Edson, clergyman, b. in Claremont, N. H., 22 Aug., 1819; d. in Concor d, 22 Feb., 1886. He was graduated at Waterville (now Colby university) in 1838, and ordained pastor of the Baptist church in Salisbury, N. H., in September of the same year. From 1832–64 he was pastor of churches in Concord, N. H. He was especially known for the influence of his state interests of his state, having been president of the board of trustees of the New London institution from its beginning, and for some time a trustee of Colby university. In 1853 he received the degree of D. D. from Dartmouth. Dr. Cummings published several sermons, and left in manuscript "The Ban tist Mission of New Hampshire for the First Century of our History."

CUMMINGS, Jeremiah W., clergyman, b. in Washington, D. C., 5 April, 1838; d. in New York, 4 Jan., 1884. He studied at the College of the Propaganda, Rome, where he took the highest honors, and in 1848 returned to the United States.
He was first stationed at the old cathedral of St.
Patrick, on Mott street. In 1850 he built St.
Stephen's church, and was its pastor until his death. Father Cummings was a popular lecturer, and a promoter of sacred music. He published "Italian Legends" (New York, 1850); "Songs for Catholic Schools" (1862); "Spiritual Progress" (1865); and "The Silver Stole," and contributed to the "American Cyclopedia."

CUMMINGS, John, educator, b. in Woburn, Mass., 20 Feb., 1785; d. there, 8 June, 1867. He early established himself in the tanning business, developing his winter months to that occupation, while his summers were spent in farming. His hides were obtained from farmers through his own exertions in travelling on horseback to collect them, and bark was brought in from the adjacent country. About 1820 he began the manufacture of high grades of leather as a specialty, and gained reputation for the quality of his goods. He supplied through the different grades to the highest orders, until he became lieutenant-commander in July, 1802. During the passage of Forts Jackson and St. Philip, and the capture of New Orleans, he was executive officer of the "Richmond." During the subsequent engagement with the batteries at Fort Hudson he fell mortally wounded while cheering the men at their guns. He was removed to New Orleans, but died four days later. Admiral Porter said in a letter written at that time: "He was a gallant officer, and too good a man to lose." Admiral Farragut wrote: "Poor Cummings was a great loss, both to the country and to his family:"

CUMMINGS, Joseph, educator, b. in Falmouth county, Me., 3 March, 1817. He was graduated at Wesleyan university in 1840, and then taught at Amenia, N. Y., seminary, becoming its principal in 1843. In 1846 he joined the New England conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, and was stationed successively at Malden, Chelsea, Hanover street, and Bromfield street (Boston) churches. He then became professor of theology in the New England theological seminary in Boston, and later pastored the Congregational church in North Yarmouth, Me., holding that care from 1853 until 1857. Physical infirmities came compelled him to relinquish preaching, and he accepted the editorship of the "Christian Mirror," at that time the organ of the Maine missionary society. Some years later, owing to conflicting opinions on the slavery question, concerning which the Maine missionary society was unwilling to take a positive ground, the paper became his personal property, and he continued in editorial control of the "Mirror" until the close of 1855. A few months later he sailed for London, on a visit to his daughter and for the benefit of his health. On the return voyage, soon after leaving the isthmus, he died. He published a "Memoir of Dr. Edward Payson" (Boston, 1846).
CUMMINGS, George David, assistant P. E. bishop, b. in Kent county, Del., 11 Dec., 1829; d. 26 June, 1876. He was graduated at Dickinson college, Carlisle, Pa., in 1841, and entered the Methodist ministry, but subsequently took orders in the Protestant Episcopal church. Being ordained deacon in 1845 and priest in 1847, and becoming rector of churches in Virginia, Maryland, and Illinois. He was consecrated assistant bishop of Kentucky, 15 Nov., 1866, but soon became dissatisfied with the state of things in the Episcopal church, chiefly on account of the manner in which the actual work of the church was conducted in his diocese. He abandoned his office and took steps toward founding a new sect, designated by itself "The Reformed Episcopal church," becoming its first bishop. He was formally deposited from the Protestant Episcopal ministry, under the canon provided for similar cases, by the presiding bishop, the Rt. Rev. Benjamin Bosworth Smith.

CUMMINGS, Maria Susanna, author, b. in Salem, Mass., 9 April, 1827; d. in Dorchester, 1 Oct., 1866. She was the daughter of Judge David Cummings, and received her education at Mrs. Charles Sedgewick's academy in London. In 1850 she turned her attention to literature, and beside her novels contributed various articles to the "Atlantic Monthly" and other magazines. Her first book, "The Lamplighter" (Boston, 1854), achieved great popularity. A collection of her Poems and Sonnets was published in 1864. About 1850 she wrote a popular treatise in nine volumes, "The History of the World," and "The Christian World," (1860), and "Haunted Homes" (1867). In 1864 Miss Cummings was a writer of great power; her characters were drawn with skill, and there was always a motive in her productions aside from their general interest.

CUNARD, Sir Samuel, founder of the Cunard steamship line, b. in Halifax, N. S., 15 Nov., 1787; d. in England, 28 April, 1865. He was the son of a mechanic, and became a successful merchant in several kinds of business. In 1838 he formed the Cunard company, and made a contract with the British government to carry the mails for seven years between Liverpool, Halifax, and Boston. The "Britannia," "Acadia," "Caledonia," and "Columbia" steamships, of 1,200 tons register and 440 horse-power, were built for this service, and formed the first line of mail steamers on the Atlantic. Sir Samuel Cunard was created a baronet, 9 March, 1857.

His son, Sir Edward, b. in Halifax, N. S., 1 Jan., 1816; d. in New York, 6 April, 1869, was educated in his native province, and was for thirty years agent of the Cunard line of steamers at New York. He succeeded to his father's title.

CUNEQUEO (coo-nay-kyo), Araucanian heroine, b. in the Margaqua district, Chili, in the latter part of the 18th century; d. about 1612. While very young she married Quepotan, an Araucanian officer, and began her career as a warrior by accompanying her husband to fight the Spaniards. She distinguished herself during the long defence of Lican. After Quepotan had been killed, she resolved to avenge his death; and in 1590 was at the head of an army of Pulches, with which she attacked every Spanish settlement in the headland and put to death all Europeans taken prisoners by her troops. The governor of Chili, with a large force, went to meet her army, but Cunequeo, by remaining in well-chosen positions and ably directing attacks upon the Spaniards, forced him to retreat. Then she moved toward the fortress of Puechanguí, defeated and killed Maj. Aranda and part of his troops that had left the place to prevent her from advancing, but she failed to take the fortress, and was obliged to go into winter quarters near the city of Villarrica, which her warriors kept besieged until, early in 1591, its governor came out with a large number of men. She commanded her forces during several attacks, and did not leave the field until the Spanish artillery had decimated her ranks. After this campaign she retired to private life. Cunequeno always went on horseback among her officers, fought like the bravest of her warriors, and on several occasions killed Spanish soldiers with her own hands. Ereclía, the author of "La Aruaca," describes her against Gen. Tovar, is one of his great epics to a description of her prowess.

CUNHA BARBOSA, Januário da (coon-yah bar-bo' -sa), Brazilian statesman, b. 10 July, 1780; d. 23 Feb., 1846. He was chaplain of John VI, and afterward professor of moral philosophy. On 13 Dec., 1821, he established, in conjunction with Ledo, the "Reverbero Constitucional," a political journal, at Rio de Janeiro, favoring Brazilian independence. After this had been declared, Cunha was arrested, 7 Dec., 1822, and banished to France. To repair this injustice, he was appointed in 1824 captain of the imperial chapter. In 1826 he became a member of the assembly. In concert with Gen. Cunha, he founded the Historical and geographical society of Rio de Janeiro. He also edited a political journal favorable to the government, and an agricultural gazette, and was imperial historiographer and director of the national library. He left a small volume of poems.

CUNHA DE AZEVEDO COUTINHO, José Joaquim da (koon-yah de a-zeh-vay-doh koot-teen-yo), Brazilian bishop, b. in Santa Salvador do Coutinho, Rio Janeiro, 9 Sept., 1745; d. in Rio Janeiro, 12 Sept., 1821. After studying in the capital of his province, he finished his education at Coimbra, Portugal, and returned to his country. In 1784 he went to Lisbon as deputy to the Inquisition, and was appointed bishop of Per- nambuco in 1784, where he at once devoted himself to benevolent work, specially the building of hospitals, also founding a seminary for the instruction of priests, for which Queen Maria of Portugal gave him several estates that had belonged to the Jesuits. He was appointed bishop of Beja in 1814, and in 1817, as archbishop, bishop of Beja in 1817, and although he declined to be removed from his diocese, he was obliged to serve as president of the board in charge of monastic affairs. He died soon after his election as deputy to the Brazilian Cortes. He had distinguished himself by his patriotism during the Napoleonic wars, and left works highly esteemed in Brazil and Portugal, which have been translated into several languages.

CUNHA MATTOS, Raimundo José da (coon-yah-mah'to-so), Brazilian soldier, b. in province of Algarve, 2 Nov., 1770; d. in March, 1840. He entered the Portuguese army in 1790, served three years in the south of France, and eighteen years in Africa, then served in Rio Janeiro, and was afterward acting governor of St. Thomas. In 1813 he was appointed to Brazil, and was made first-lingy of Pernambuco, and subsequently governor of the province of Goiás. He published a work on the interior of Brazil (1836). Removing to Rio de Janeiro in 1826, he was elected to the legislature, directed the military academy of Rio in 1832, and was made commander-in-chief of the Brazilian army. He was secretary for life of the Industrial aid society, and one of the founders, and for several years vice-president, of the Historical society of Rio de Janeiro.

CURANTEO (soo-ran-te'y-o), Araucanian cacique of the Promancio tribe, b. in Porén, Chili, in 1756; d. in 1808. In 1806, under order of the Araucanian warriors, and they appointed him their generalissimo to direct the war against the Spaniards in 1760. He began operations by destroying several towns and settlements of the whites. At the head of 8,000 Indians, he fought a battle at Tucapel (1767) against the Spanish Gen. Gonzala, who, after a long and tenacious resistance, was forced to retreat to Chillán, and subsequently besieged by Curanteo. In 1768 he fought and won another important battle in the Arauco valley, but lost a leg in the engagement. In 1810, he was defeated by Angol with Gen. Ponte, governor of Chili, in 1768, he was badly defeated. From that time until 1772 Curanteo had many encounters with the Spaniards, his principal purpose being to damage the settlers rather than obtain victories in the field. In April, 1810, he was defeated by the Araucan army in one of the most terrible battles known in the history of Chili. In 1780 he won a battle against the Spanish army, whose commander signed a treaty of peace granting the Araucanian chief what he demanded. Curanteo retired to his native town, and, although his bed was covered with wounds, attained an advanced age.
CURRIE, James George, Canadian statesman, b. in Toronto, 24 Nov., 1827. He was educated at Niagara, Ontario, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1833. He was speaker of the Ontario assembly from 21 Dec., 1871, till 30 March, 1873, when he resigned and represented Niagara in the legislative council of Canada from 1862 till August, 1866. In 1875 he introduced measures in the Ontario legislature in favor of manhood suffrage in local parliamentary elections, for the establishment of cumulative voting in municipalities, and for the abolition of grand juries.

CURRY, Daniel, clergyman, b. New York, N. Y., 26 Nov., 1809. He was graduated at Wesleyan university, Middletown, Conn., in 1837, and in the same year became principal of the Troy conference academy. He was called to a professorship in the female college at Macon, Ga., in 1838, and in 1841 entered the Georgia conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, holding pastorates at Athens and Columbus. When the church separated into a northern and a southern branch, Mr. Curry joined the New York conference, and filled important stations in New Haven, Brooklyn, and Hartford. Wesleyan university gave him the degree of D. D. in 1832, and from 1854 till 1857 he was president of Indiana Asbury university, at Greencastle, Ind. He then resumed pastoral work till 1864, when he was chosen to the editorship of the New York "Christian Advocate," retaining it till 1876. He edited the "National Repository" in 1876-80, and resumed his ministerial duties till 1884, when he became chief editor of the "Methodist Review," having been an associate editor since 1831. Syracuse university gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1878. Besides about sixty articles in periodicals, Dr. Curry has published "New York: a Historical Sketch" (New York, 1853); "Life-Story of Bishop D. W. Clark" (1875); "Fragments, Religious and Theological" (1880); and "Platform Papers" (1880). He has also edited Southey's "Life of John Wesley" (1847).

CURRY, George Law, governor of Oregon, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 2 June, 1820; d. in Portland, Oregon, 28 July, 1875. His grandfather was a native of England, and his father, George Curry, commanded the Philadelphia "Washington Blues" as first lieutenant in the battle of Bladensburg in 1812. Young Curry removed with his family to Caracas, Venezuela, in 1824, but soon returned, residing near Johnstown, Pa., till his father's death in 1829. From 1831 till 1840 he lived with his uncle in Boston, where he was apprenticed to a jeweller. In 1838 he was president of the Mechanic apprentices' library, and delivered several addresses and poems before the association. He went to St. Louis in 1844 and connected himself with Joseph M. Field in the publication of the "Revelle." He removed to Oregon City, Oregon, in 1846, took charge of the "Oregon Spectator," the first newspaper published on the Pacific coast, and in 1848 founded the "Oregon Free Press." He was appointed secretary of the territory in 1853, and, after twice acting as governor for short periods, was appointed to that office in 1854, and held it till the admission of Oregon into the Union in 1859. His administration was marked by the rapid development of the territory, by severe war, one of which—in 1855—was the most bloody in the history of the northwest coast. Besides U. S. troops, about 2,500 volunteers were kept in the field for several months, and Gov. Curry distinguished himself by his services in wreaking a terrible vengeance on the Injurers of Oregon and Washington territories. In 1860 he came within one vote of an election to the U. S. senate. In 1866 he worked earnestly in behalf of the Northern Pacific railroad, which he had first advocated in St. Louis in 1845. He afterward retired to his farm on Willamette river. He was subsequently state land commissioner.

CURRY, Jabez Lamar Monroe, educator, b. in Lincoln county, Ga., 5 June, 1823. He removed with his father to Talladega county, Ala., in 1838, was graduated at the University of Georgia in 1847, and at Columbia in 1845. After entering on the practice of his profession in Talladega county, he served in the Mexican war as a private of Texas rangers in 1846, but resigned on account of his health. He was chosen to the Alabama legislature in 1847, 1852, and 1855, and in 1856 was an elector on the democratic ticket. He was then elected to Congress without opposition, as a state-rights democrat, and served from 7 Dec., 1857, till 21 Jan., 1861, when he resigned, having previously joined with the other Alabama representatives in supporting the immediate secession of the state. He was a deputy from Alabama to the provisional Confederate congress, a representative in the first Confederate congress, and in 1864-5 served in the Confederate army, under Gen. Joseph E. Johnston, as lieutenant-colonel of cavalry. At the close of the war he was ordained as a Baptist clergyman, was president of Howard college, Ala., in 1866-8, and professor of English, philosophy, and constitutional law in Richmond college, Va., in 1869-81. He was president of the foreign mission board of the southern Baptist church in 1874-85, and of the trustees of Richmond college in 1882-5. In 1881-5 Dr. Curry was general agent of the Peabody educational fund, and he has "labored in behalf of public-school education, higher, normal, and industrial, for all the people of both races." Dr. Curry is one of the most effective platform speakers in the country, and has declined numerous invitations to become a pastor, preferring to preach occasionally. An address made by him before the Evangelical alliance, urging the complete separation of church and state, was reprinted and distributed in England by the disestablishment party. In the spring of 1885 Dr. Curry was appointed U. S. minister to Spain, and in that capacity he has settled several important questions that have been pending for years. Mercer university, Georgia, gave him the degree of LL. D., 1867, and Rochester university that of D. D., in 1871. He is a contributor to the religious press, and has published speeches and pamphlets.

CURRY, Otway, journalist, b. in Greenfield, Ohio, 26 March, 1804; d. in Marysville, 17 Feb., 1855. He removed with his father to Joseph Valley, Ohio, in 1811, and his early education was interrupted by the war. He went to Lebanon in 1823, learned the carpenter's trade, and worked at it in various towns till 1829, at the same time writing poetry for the newspapers. He was then a farmer in Union county till 1839, and served in the legislature in 1836-7. He became one of the editors of the "Hesperian," at Columbus, Ohio, in 1838, and in 1839 began to study law at Marysville. He was again in the legislature in 1842, and in that year bought the "Greene County Torchlight," published in Xenia, Ohio. He returned to Marysville in 1845, and practised his profession till his death, except in 1853-4, when he edited the "Scioto Gazette," in Chillicothe. He published "Love of the Past," a poem (Cincinnati, 1848); see Coggsballe's "Poets and Poetry of the West.

CURTIN, Andrew Gregg, governor of Pennsylvania, b. in Bellefonte, Centre co., Pa., 22 April, 1815. His father, Roland Curtin, emigrated from Ireland in 1793, and in 1807 established new Bellefonte one of the first manufactories of iron in that region. Andrew studied law in Dickinson college law-school, was admitted to the bar in 1839, and soon became prominent. He early entered politics as a whig, laboring for Harrison's election in 1840, and making a successful canvass of the state for Clay in 1844. He was a presidential elector in 1848, and a candidate for elector on the whig ticket in 1852. In 1854 Gov. Pollock appointed him secretary of the commonwealth and ex-officio superintendent of common schools, and in the discharge of his duties Mr. Curtin did much toward reforming and perfecting the school system of the state. In his annual report of 1855 he recommended to the legislature the establishment of normal schools, and his suggestion was adopted. In 1860 he was the renominated candidate for governor. The democrats, though divided in national politics, were united in Pennsylvania, but Mr. Curtin was elected by a majority of 32,000. In his inaugural address he advocated the forcible suppression of secession, and throughout the contest that followed he was one of the "war governors" who were most earnest in their support of the national government. He responded promptly to the first call for troops, and when Gen. Patterson, who was in command in Pennsylvania, asked for twenty-five thousand more, they were immediately furnished. Gen. Patterson's requisition was afterward revoked by the secretary of war, on the ground that the troops were not needed; but Gov. Curtin, instead of disbanding them, obtained authority from the legislature to employ them at the state's expense, and hold them subject to the call of the national government. This body of men became known as the "Pennsylvania Reserve," and was accepted by the authorities at Washington a few weeks later. Gov. Curtin was unflagging in his efforts for the comfort of the soldiers, answering carefully the numerous letters sent him from the field, and originated a system of care and instruction for the children of those slain in battle, making them wards of the state. He thus became known in the ranks as "the soldiers' friend." Gov. Curtin's health began to fail in 1863, and he signified his intention of accepting a foreign mission that had been offered him as soon as his term should expire, but in the mean time he was re-nominated, and re-elected by 15,000 majority. In November, 1865, he returned to his state, and in that year declined another offer of a foreign mission. In 1869 Gen. Grant appointed him minister to Russia, and in 1868 and 1872 he was prominently mentioned as a candidate for vice-president. He returned home in August, 1872, supported Horace Greeley for the presidency, published his "Joan of the Holy Land," and joined the democratic party, by which he was elected to congress for three successive terms, serving from 1881 till 1887.

CURTIN, Jeremiah, linguist, b. in Milwaukee, Wis., about 1835. He had little education in childhood, but at the age of twenty or twenty-one prepared himself to enter Phillips Exeter academy, made extraordinary progress, and soon entered Harvard college, where he was graduated in 1863. By this time he had become noted among his classmates and acquaintances as the wonderful facility as a linguist. On leaving college he had acquired a good knowledge of French, Spanish, Portuguese, Italian, Rumanian, Dutch, Danish, Swedish, Icelandic, Gothic, German, and Finnish, besides Greek and Latin. He had also made considerable progress in Hebrew, and in 1877 he left the Hebrew department. He then proceeded to speak Russian. When Admiral Lissowsky's fleet visited this country in 1864, Curtin became acquainted with the officers and accompanied the expedition on its return to Russia. In St. Petersburg he obtained employment as a translator of polyglot telegraphy, but was subsequently appointed by Mr. Seward to the office of secretary of the U. S. legation, and he held this place till 1868. During this period he became familiar with the Polish, Bohemian, Lithuanian, Lettish, and Hungarian languages, and made a beginning in Turkish. From 1867 till 1877 he travelled through Europe and in Asia, apparently in the service of the Russian government. In 1873, at the celebration at Prague of the 500th anniversary of the birth of John Huss, he delivered the oration, speaking with great eloquence and force. During his travels in the Danube country he learned to speak Slovenian, Croatian, Servian, and Bulgarian. He lived for some time in the Caucasus, where he learned Mingrelian, Abkasian, and Armenian. At the beginning of the Russo-Turkish war in 1877, he addressed a petition to his country, and, after a year in London, returned to his native country. Since then he has been studying the languages of the American Indians, and has made valuable researches under the auspices of Maj. John W. Powell and the bureau of ethnology. He is said to be acquainted with more than fifty languages.

CURTIS, Alfred A., R. C. bishop, b. in Somerset county, Md., in 1838. He began his studies for the Protestant Episcopal church in 1854, supporting himself during his course by teaching. In 1856 he was ordained deacon and sent to St. John's parish, W. Va., where he was ordained priest. At the close of the year he had charge of Catoctin Furnace parish, Frederick co., Md. While there he received a call as assistant rector of St. Luke's, Baltimore, where he ministered until 1884, when he was sent to officiate at Chestertown, Md. He was recalled at the close of the year and placed in charge of Mount Calvary church, Baltimore, where he remained rector until December, 1870, when he resigned. He went to England in 1871, was received into the Roman Catholic church the same year by Cardinal Newman, returned to Baltimore, and entered the Seminary of St. Sulpice. He was ordained by Archbishop Bayley in 1874, being appointed his secretary and assistant at the cathedral, and he was created bishop of Wilmington in 1886.

Curtis, Alva, physician, b. in New Hampshire in 1797; d. in Ohio in 1881. He lectured in the Botanic medical college of Ohio for some time, and from 1837 till 1853 was about the Botanic co-medical Recorder," also of the "Journal of Education and of Physiological and Medical Reforms." Dr. Curtis published "Medical Discussions" (1833); "Lectures on Midwifery" (1838); "Theory and Practice of Medicine" (1842, republished in England); and "Medical Criticisms" (1836).

Curtis, Benjamin Robbins, jurist, b. in Watertown, Mass., 4 Nov., 1809; d. in Newport, R. I., 15 Sept., 1874. He was graduated at Harvard in 1829, admitted to the bar in 1832, and was practising for a short time in Northfield, Mass., removed to Boston. The extent and range of his attainments, his accuracy, and his logical mind, soon made him prominent in his profession. In 1851 President Fillmore appointed him to the U. S. supreme bench. In the celebrated "Dred Scott" case he retired from the decision of the court and made a powerful argument in support of his conclusions. He upheld the right of congress to prohibit slavery, and declared his dissent from "that part of the opinion of the majority of the court in which it is held that a person of African descent cannot be a citizen of the United States." On this memorable occasion only one other justice of the seven coincided with the opinion of Judge Curtis. He resigned in 1857, and resumed practice in Boston, frequently appearing before the supreme court at Washington, D. C. He was for two years a member of the Massachusetts legislature, but took little part in politics, devoting himself with earnestness to his profession. In the impeachment trial of President Johnson in 1868 Judge Curtis was one of the counsel for the defence. The answer to the articles of impeachment was read by him, and was largely his work. He opened the case in a speech that occupied two days in delivery, and that was commended for legal soundness and clearness. He was the democratic candidate for U. S. senator in 1874. He published "Reports of Cases in the Circuit Courts of the United States" (2 vols., Boston, 1854); "Decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States," with notes and a digest (22 vols., Boston); and "Digest of the Decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States," from the origin of the court to 1854. Of his "Memoir and Writings" (2 vols., Boston, 1880), the first volume contains a memoir by George Ticknor Curtis, and the second "Miscellaneous Writings," edited by his son, Benjamin R. Curtis. His brother, George Ticknor, lawyer, b. in Watertown, Mass., 28 Nov., 1817, was graduated at Harvard in 1838. He was admitted to the bar in 1836, and engaged in the practice of the law in Boston till 1862, when he removed to New York.

While in Boston, Mr. Curtis held the office of U. S. commissioner, and as such, in 1854, returned to his master a fugitive slave named Thomas Sims, for which act he was severely denounced by the abolitionists. He also served for two or three years in the Massachusetts legislature, but has allowed politics to interfere but little with his profession and his historical investigations. He has published a "Digest of English and American Admiralty Decisions" (Boston, 1839); volumes ii. and iii. of a "Digest of the Decisions of the Courts of Common Law and Admiralty in the United States" (3 vols., 1840-9); "Rights and Duties of Merchant Seamen" (1841); "American Conveyances" (1846); "Law of Copyright" (1847); "Law of Patents" (1849; 4th ed., 1873); "Equity Precedents" (1850); "Inventor's Manual," "Commentaries on the Jurisprudence, Practice, and Peculiar Jurisdiction of the Courts of the United States" (2 vols., 1854-8); "History of the Origin, Formation, and Adoption of the Constitution of the United States" (2 vols., 1855-8); "Life of Daniel Webster" (New York, 1870); "Life of James Buchanan" (1883); and "Creation or Evolution" (1887).

Curtis, Calvin, artist, b. in Stratford, Conn., 5 July, 1822. He entered the National Academy in 1841, and also under Daniel Huntington. After painting portraits in New York for some years, he went to Bridgeport, Conn., in 1850, and afterward to Stratford. His works include portraits of Chief-Justice Thomas B. Butler, Gen. W. U. Noble, Judge C. B. Beardsley, and Rev. Dr. Nathaniel Hewitt. Mr. Curtis has also given some time to landscape-painting. He has suffered from a spinal disease for thirty years, and it has been said that "every touch of his pencil has been attended with a twinge of nervous pain." the house, which had also undertaken to publish books, was found to be insolvent for a large amount, and Mr. Curtis sank his private fortune in the endeavor to save its creditors from loss, which he finally accomplished in 1873. In 1853 he began in "Harper's Monthly" the series of papers entitled "Frederick's Easy Chair," and in the succeeding year entered the lecture field, meeting with great success. He soon gained reputation as a popular orator, and in the presidential canvass of 1856 spoke in behalf of the republican candidates. Soon after the establishment of "Harper's Weekly," in 1857, he became its leading editor, a position which he still holds, and on the establishment of "Harper's Bazar" in 1867 he began a series of papers under the title of "Manners upon the Road," which was continued weekly until the spring of 1873. He was a delegate to the Republican national conventions of 1860 and 1864, and in the latter year was an unsuccessful candidate for congress in the 1st New York district. In 1862 he declined the office of consul-general in Egypt, offered him by President Lincoln. In 1867 he was elected a member at large to the constitutional convention of New York, in which he was chairman of the committee on education. In 1868 he was nominated a republican presidential elector, and in 1869 declined the republican nomination for secretary of state of New York. Mr. Curtis has always been an earnest advocate of large and successful experiments in the line of popular education, and in 1871 was appointed by President Grant one of a commission to draw up rules for the regulation of the civil service. He was elected chairman of the commission and of the advisory board in which he was subsequently merged, but resigned in March, 1873, on account of difference of views between him and the president in regard to the enforcement of the rules. He was a delegate to the National republican convention of 1876 that nominated President Hayes, and at the beginning of the administration was asked to select a foreign mission, which he declined, and he also declined the special offer of the mission to Germany. Mr. Curtis was chairman of a meeting of independent republicans that met in New York on 16 June, 1884, to take action against the nomination of James G. Blaine, made by the Chicago convention, and he subsequently supported the democratic candidate, Grover Cleveland. Since 1864 Mr. Curtis has been one of the regents of the University of the state of New York, and is now (1886) its vice-chancellor. He has published "Nil Notes of a Howadji" (New York, 1851); "The Howadji in Syria" (1852); "Lotus-Eating," letters originally written to the New York "Tribune" from various watering-places (1852); two volumes of selections from his contributions to "Putnam's Magazine," entitled "Potiphar Papers" (1853) and "True and I" (1856); and "Trumps," a novel, which had appeared in "Harper's Weekly" in 1838-9 (1862). —His half-brother, Joseph Bridgham, soldier, b. in Providence, R. I., 25 Oct., 1836; killed near Fredericksburg, Va., 13 Dec., 1862, was graduated at the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard in 1856. In 1857 he entered the New York Central park engineer corps, and in April, 1861, was appointed engineer, with the rank of captain, in the 9th New York volunteers. After that regiment was mustered out, he became, on 16 Sept., 1861, second lieutenant in the 4th Rhode Island Volunteers and was promoted to first lieutenant on 2 Oct. He served with Burnside in North Carolina, distinguished himself by his coolness and daring at the capture of Roanoke Island, 7 Feb., 1862, and on 9 June was appointed assistant adjutant-general on Gen. Rodman's staff. In August he was promoted, at Gen. Burnside's special request, to the lieutenant-colonelcy of the 4th Rhode Island regiment, joined the Army of the Potomac, and was with it in the succession of battles between the Rappahannock and Washington and the Shenandoah, and in the actions in which his regiment suffered so much that it was withdrawn from the field by the general's command, whereupon Col. Curtis took a musket and cartridge-box from a dead soldier and did duty as a private in a Pennsylvania regiment till the close of the battle. He was killed near Fredericksburg in command of his regiment, the colonel having been disabled by a wound. See a memoir by George William Curtis, in John R. Bartlett's "Rhode Island in the Rebellion" (1867). —Joseph Bridgham's brother. Edward, b. in Providence, R. I., 4 June, 1838, was graduated at Harvard in 1859, and received his medical degree from the University of Pennsylvania in 1864. He had entered the army as medical cadet on 8 Sept., 1861, became acting assistant surgeon on 5 May, 1863, assistant surgeon in 1864, and major in 1866. He commanded a hospital in the Army of the Shenandoah, and was discharged, 18 March, 1865. He resigned from the army in 1870, and began practice in New York city. During the later years of his army service he was in charge of the microscopic section of the medical museum, and was especially engaged in developing the art of civil-service reform, and in 1876 became medical director of the Equitable life assurance society, retiring from active practice. Dr. Curtis has published a "Catalogue of the Microscopical Section of the U. S. Army Medical Museum" (Washington, 1867), "Almanac on General Medical Technology" (New York, 1880). —Another brother, John Green, became, in 1873, adjunct professor of anatomy in the College of physicians and surgeons, in 1878, and in 1873 was given the chair of materia medica and therapeutics, becoming professor emeritus in 1886. He was made assistant surgeon to the New York eye and ear infirmary surgeon in 1874, and in 1876 became medical director of the Equitable life assurance society, retiring from active practice. He has published numerous articles on vegetation and kindred subjects, and is the author of a report on the "Hygiene of Massachusetts." (1849), and earlier reports to cover a Confederate register on the registration of births, marriages, and deaths. He is noted as the discoverer of colloidion.

CURTIS, Newton Martin, soldier, b. in De Peyster, St. Lawrence co., N. Y., 21 May, 1833. He was educated at common schools, and at Gouver- nenneurs academy from 1834 till 1838. He became a prominent democrat, was postmaster of his native town in 1857-61, and democratic candidate for assembly in 1860. He enrolled a volunteer company on 14 April, 1861, was commissioned captain in the 16th New York regiment on 7 May, and served in the Army of the Potomac. He became lieutenant-colonel and then colonel of the 142d New York infantry, and during the battle of Cold Harbor was assigned to the command of a brigade whose leader had been killed in the action. He was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers, 29 Oct., 1864, and for his services at the capture of Fort Fisher was promoted on the field to brigadier-general of volunteers, and was also thanked by the legislature of New York. He was brevetted major-general of volunteers, 13 March, 1865, and assigned to duty as chief of staff to Gen. E. O. C. Ord. On 1 July, 1865, he was given the command of southwestern Virginia, with headquarters at Lynchburg, and was mustered out on 15 Jan., 1866. He was collector of customs in the district of Oswego, N. Y., in 1866-7, special agent of the U. S. treasury from 1867-9, inspector of the Armory in 1880, and a member of the legislature in 1888-9, having been elected a republican. He was president of the state agricultural society in 1880, and has been secretary and trustee of the state agricultural station since its organization in that year.

CURTIS, Samuel Ryan, soldier, b. in New York state, 3 Feb., 1807; d. in Council Bluffs, Iowa, 26 Dec., 1866. He removed when a child to Ohio, and was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1831, but resigned from the army in 1832, and became a civil engineer, superintending the building of the Muskingum river improvements in 1837-9. He then studied law, and practiced in Ohio from 1841 till 1846. He had become a captain of militia in 1833, was lieutenant-colonel in 1837-42, colonel in 1843-45, and in 1848 was made adjutant-general of Ohio for the special purpose of organizing the state's quota of volunteers for the Mexican war. He served in that war as colonel of the 2d Ohio regiment, and was commandant of Camargo, a large military depot, holding it on 18 Feb., 1847, against Gen. Urrea, and then pursuing the enemy by forced marches through the mountains to Ramos, Mexico, thus opening Gen. Taylor's communications. After the discharge of his regiment he served on Gen. Wool's staff, and as governor of Saltillo, Mexico, in 1847-8. He then engaged in engineering in the west, and in 1856 settled as a lawyer in Indiana. He resigned from the treasury in 1857-8, and from the state government in 1858. He was one of the members of the congress in 1861 to become colonel of the 2d Iowa regiment, and on 17 May was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers, being on the first list to the senate for confirmation. He took charge of the large camp of instruction near St. Louis in August and September, 1861, commanded the southwestern district of Missouri from 26 Dec., 1861, till February, 1862, and the army of the southwest till August, 1862. On 6-8 March, at Pea Ridge, Ark., he gained a decisive victory over a Confederate force under Gen. Price and McCulloch. He was promoted to major-general of volunteers on 21 March, 1862, and from 14 July till 29 August occupied Helena, Ark., having marched over one thousand miles through wildnesses and swamps. While on leave of absence, from 29 Aug. to 24 Sept., 1862, he became president of the Pacific railroad convention in Chicago. He was at the head of the Department of the Missouri from September, 1862, till May, 1863, and of that of Kansas from 1 Jan., 1864, till 7 Feb., 1865, commanding at Fort Leavenworth during the Pike raid of October, 1864, and aiding in the defeat and pursuit of Gen. Price's army. He commanded the Department of the Northwest from 16 Feb. till 24 July, 1865, was U. S. commissioner to negotiate treaties with various Indian tribes from August till November, 1865, and to examine the Union Army in 1866.

CURTIS, Thomas, clergyman, b. in England about 1780; d. in 1858. He came to the United States in 1829, was pastor for some years of the Wentworth street Baptist church in Charleston, S. C., and subsequently established a young ladies' school at Limestone Spring. Dr. Curtis was a man of extensive knowledge and very powerful as a preacher. While in England he was the publisher of the "Encyclopedia Metropolitana." He perished in a burning steamer on the Potomac river.

-CURTIS, William Edmund, jurist, b. in Litchfield, Conn., in 1824; d. in Watertown, Conn., 6 July, 1880. He was graduated at Trinity in 1848, admitted to the bar in 1847, and practised in New York city, where he rose rapidly in his profession. In 1871 he was elected judge of the New York supreme court, and at the time of his death was chief justice of the superior court. He was commissioner of the board of education, and for four years its president, and also vice-president of the geographical society. Judge Curtis removed the degree of 1877. At the request of the political party he was elected to congress as a republican, and served two terms and a part of a third, from 1837 till 1861, being a member of the committees on military affairs and the Pacific railroad. He was also a delegate from Iowa to the peace congress at Washum in 1861. He resigned from congress in 1861 to become colonel of the 2d Iowa regiment, and on 17 May was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers, being on the first list to the senate for confirmation. CURTISS, Samuel Ives, educator, b. in Union, Conn., 5 Feb., 1844. He was graduated at Amherst in 1867, and at Union theological seminary in 1870, engaged in missionary work in New York, and in 1870-72 was connected with the Fifth avenue Presbyterian church. He travelled in Ireland and Scotland in 1872-3, was ordained by the New York presbytery in 1874, and in 1874-8 was pastor of the American chapel at Leipzig, of which he was one of the founders. While in Leipzig he attended lectures at the university, receiving the degree of Ph. D. in 1876, and was afterward made a licentiate in Berlin university. Iowa college gave him the degree of D. D. in 1878, and in the same year he became professor of biblical literature in the Congregational theological seminary, Chicago. In 1879 he was transferred to the chair of Old Testament literature and interpretation. He is the author of "The Name Mauhabe," his doctor's thesis (Leipzig, 1876); a translation of Bickell's "Outlines of Hebrew Grammar" (1877); of Delitzsch's "Messianic Prophecies" (Edinburgh, 1880); and "Old-Testament History of Redemption" (1881); "The Lehmuw" (1867); "Aeolic and Augustan versification of doli oilique thoro Elohistec origine," his licentiate thesis (Berlin, 1879); "Ingersoll and Moses" (Chicago, 1879); and contributions in the "Current Discussions in Theology" (1868 et seq.).

CURWEN, Samuel, loyalist, b. in Salem, Mass., 28 Dec., 1752; died there, 9 April, 1802. He was graduated at Harvard in 1735, and studied for the ministry, but became a merchant in his native place. In the winter of 1774-5 he was a captain in Sir William Pepperell's expedition against Louisburg. In 1779 he became an impost officer for Essex county, Mass., and in 1783 was judge of the admiralty court. From 1775 until 1784, as a loyalist, he resided abroad, returning to his native place in the autumn of 1784. His "Journal and Letters" (New York, 1849) contains interesting and valuable information concerning the lives of loyalist exiles while abroad.

CUSHING, Caleb, statesman, b. in Salisbury, Mass., 1719; d. in Newburyport, Mass., 2 Jan., 1739. He was graduated at Harvard in 1717, and for two years was a tutor in mathematics and natural philosophy. He then studied law, was admitted to the bar, and settled in Newburyport. He rose rapidly in his profession, and, although busily engaged with his profession, found time to devote to literature and politics, and was a frequent contributor to periodicals. In 1725 he was elected a representative to the lower house of the Massachusetts legislature, and in 1728 a member of the state senate. At this time he belonged to the then republican party. In 1729 Mr. Cushing visited Europe, and remained abroad two years. In 1733 he was again elected a representative from Newburyport to the Massachusetts legislature for two years, but in 1734 was elected from the Essex north district of Massachusetts a representative to congress, and served for four consecutive terms, until 1748. He supported the nomination of John Quincy Adams for the presidency, and was a strong advocate of the Federalist party. In 1747 he was one of the few northern whigs that continued to support the Federalist party, and because of his continued support was classed as a democrat. Soon afterward he was nominated for secretary of the treasury, but President Adams refused to confirm him. He was subsequently confirmed as commissioner to China, and made the first treaty between that country and the United States. On his return he was again elected a representative in the Massachusetts legislature. In 1747 he raised a regiment for the Mexican war at his own expense, became its colonel, and was subsequently made brigadier-general. While still in Mexico he was nominated by the democratic party of his state for governor, but failed in the election. From 1850 to 1853 he was again a member of the legislature of his native state, and, at the expiration of his term, was appointed associate justice of the supreme court. In 1853 President Pierce appointed him U.S. attorney-general, from which he retired in 1857. In 1857, 1858, and 1859 he again served in the legislature of Massachusetts. In April, 1860, he was president of the Democratic national convention in Charleston, S. C., and was among the seceders from that body who met in Baltimore. At the close of 1860 he was sent to Charleston, and from there he retired in 1867. In 1867, 1868, 1858, and 1859 he again served in the legislature of South Carolina; but his mission effected nothing. Mr. Cushing was frequently employed during the civil war in the departments at Washington, and in 1868 was appointed one of the three commissioner to revise and codify the laws of congress. In 1868 he was sent to Bogotá to arrange a diplomatic difficulty. In 1872 he was one of the counsel for the United States at the Geneva conference for the settlement of the Alabama claims, and in 1873 was nominated for the office of chief judge of the Supreme Court of New York. His nomination was subsequently withdrawn. A year later he was nominated and confirmed as minister to Spain, whence he returned home in 1877. His publications include a "History of the Town of Newbury-port" (1836); "The Practical Principles of Political Economy" (1836); "The Historical and Politi-Review of the Late Revolution in France" (2 vols., Boston, 1838); "Reminiscences of Spain" (2 vols., Boston, 1838); "Growth and Territorial Progress of the United States" (1839); "Life of William H.
Harrison" (Boston, 1840); and "The Treaty of Washington" (New York, 1850).

He manifested in early childhood a love for archaelog-ical pursuits, and at the age of eight years began collect fossils and minerals, made complete inventory of all the birds in his garden by heart, and in the woods. He learned from observation that wherever Indian encampments had been long established the soil and vegetation had undergone a change, which materially assisted him in his search for relics. At the age of fifteen he had discovered the process of making arrow-heads from flint by pressure with bone. In 1870 his father removed to Medina, N.
Y., where the son's researches found new ground and a greater wealth of material. In the town of Shelby were ancient remains of fortifications rich in archeology! (hey, with historical and residential burial-grounds, and camp sites in the counties of Madison and Onondaga, were carefully searched, as well as the Hamilton group of rocks. In the spring of 1875 he became a student in Cornell university, but spent most of his time as assistant to Dr. Charles Rau in the preparation of the Indian collections of the National museum for the Centennial exhibition at Philadelphia, and was curator of the entire collection until the close of the exhibition, when he was appointed curator of the ethnological department of the National museum. During the summer of 1876 he visited the state of New York, and joined Maj. J. W. Powell in his expedition of 1879 to New Mexico, as assistant ethnologist of the U. S. bureau of ethnology, of the Smithsonian institution. The expedition spent two months among the Zuñi Indians, and Mr. Cushing, at his own request, was left there.
He adopted the costume, habits, and life of the race, and for three years lived strictly the life of an Indian among the Indians, studying their habits, language, and history. During the second year of his sojourn he had so far made himself one of the tribe, and gained the esteem of the chiefs, that he was formally adopted and initiated into the sacred esoteric society of priests, the "Priesthood of the Bow." In 1882 he visited the east with a party of six Zuñis, who came for the purpose of taluding the Bible, the knowledge of Zuñi and etched. In September of the same year he returned to Zuñi; but, in the spring of 1884, failing health obliged his return for two years to the east.

He brought with him three Indians to aid him in the preparation of a dictionary and grammar of the Zuñi language, and translations of myth and beast stories, hero legends, songs, and rituals. Mr.
Cushing's publications and contributions to periodical literature include "Antiquities of Orleans County" (Washington, 1874); "Zuñi Fetiches" (1881); "The Religion of the Zuñi Indians with Notes on the Mythic and Mythic Systems" (1882); "The Nation of the Willows" (1882); "Adventures in Zuñi" (1883); "Studies of Ancient Pueblo Ceramic Art, as Illustrative of Zuñi Culture-Growth" (1884); and "Zuñi Breadstuff" (1885).

Cushing, Jonathan Peter, educator, b. in Rochester, N. Y., 12 March, 1798; d. in Raleigh, N. C., 25 April, 1885. In his boyhood he was apprenticed; but, by skilfully managing the proceeds of his overwork, he purchased a portion of his time, and immediately entered Phillips Exeter academy.
By working every day was by teaching, he paid his way through college, being graduated at Dartmouth in 1817. His health failed, and he went south, became a tutor in Hampden Sydney college in the November following his graduation, and professor of natural philosophy and literature a year later. This post was held for two years, when he became the president of the college.
By his exertions, the institution, which had been so disorganized and broken down, was built up again; but the labor and reponsibility of the enterprise exhausted his strength and hastened his death.

Cushing, Luther Stearns, jurist, b. in Lunenburg, Mass., 22 June, 1803; d. in Boston, 22 June, 1860. He was the only graduate at the Harvard law-school in 1823. For some years after leaving college he was associated with Charles Sumner and George S. Hillard in the editorship of "The American Jurist and Law Magazine" in Boston, when in 1832 he was made clerk of the .house of representatives, an office which he held for fourteen years. In 1844 he was chosen a member of the legislature, then for four years was judge of the court of common pleas in Boston, after which he became reporter of the decisions of the supreme court of the commonwealth, and prepared twelve volumes (55 to 66 inclusive) of law reports, extending from 1850 to the time of his death. In 1848 he became dean of the law school in Harvard law-school, and filled the chair until his death. His name is best known in connection with his "Manual of Parliamentary Practice" (Boston, 1844), which immediately became an authority for proceedings in deliberative assemblies.
He also published a "Treatise on Trustee Process" (1837); "Treatise on Remedial Law" (1837); Enlish translation of Sarigny's "Recht des Besitzes," law of possession (1838); translation of Pothier's "De la vente," contract of sale (1839); translation of Mattermaier on the "Effect of Drunkenez on Criminal Responsibility" (1841); translation of Domat's "Les lois civiles dans leur ordre naturel" (1850); "Reports of Controverted Election Cases in Massachusetts" (1852); "Introduction to the Study of Roman Civil Law" (1854); and "Lex Pertinace" and "Acta Pertinentiales," a comprehensive work on parliamentary law (1856).

Cushing, Nathaniel, soldier, b. in Pembroke, Mass., 8 April, 1753; d. in Marietta, Ohio, in August, 1814. He joined the forces that went from Massachusetts in 1775, became a lieutenant in Brewer's regiment in July, and at the capture of a captaincy in 1777, organized a supprise, and captured forty of the De Lancey loyalists in May, 1780, after many fruitless attempts had been made by others. He participated in many engagements, and received in 1788 the brevet of major. At the close of the war he removed to Belpre, Ohio.

CUSHING, Thomas, statesman, b. in Boston, 1744; d. there, 1784. He was the son of a wealthy merchant, in whose counting-house Samuel Adams was for a short time employed. He fell under the influence of Adams, and presently became prominent among the popular leaders who were preparing the way for the Revolution. In 1771, he was elected to the Massachusetts assembly, and immediately afterward, when James Otis, who had been chosen speaker, was refused by Gov. Bernard, Mr. Cushing was chosen speaker in his stead. He was speaker of the house until 1774, and as such occupied, in the eyes of the British, a prominence greater than his abilities entitled him to. Dr. Johnson, in one of his sily pamphlets about American affairs, asserted that one of the objects of the Revolution was to place a diadem on the head of Thomas Cushing. He was not fitted for the leadership, and on several occasions showed himself weak-kneed. In 1772, along with Hancock, he opposed the formation of committees of correspondence, and afterward refused to serve on one to which he had been appointed. At the same time he is described by John Adams as possessing a mind for procuring intelligence, which made him useful to the patriot leaders. He was elected in June, 1774, to the first Continental congress, and in February, 1775, to the second. He was one of those whom the king instructed Gage, in April, 1775, to seize and send over to England, if he could find them. In July, 1775, when Massachusetts formed a new government, Mr. Cushing was chosen a member of the council. In the Continental congress he opposed a declaration of independence, and consequently, in the third annual election of delegates, 10 Jan., 1776, he did not receive a single vote. John Adams was elected instead. In 1783 and several following years he was lieutenant-governor of Massachusetts. He was a member of the convention, held in January and February, 1788, that ratified the Federal constitution.

CUSHING, Thomas Humphrey, soldier, b. in 1755; d. in New London, Conn., 19 Oct., 1822. He served during the Revolutionary war, beginning as a sergeant, was in Arnold's naval battle on Lake Champlain, and for his bravery was successively advanced until in July, 1812, he had reached a brigadier-generalship. In January, 1816, he was appointed collector of customs in New London. Some time after this he became involved in a quarrel with William J. Lewis, member of congress from Virginia, and the ball from Mr. Lewis's weapon struck Gen. Cushing's watch. The differences between the two gentlemen were amicably adjusted, and Lewis, stepping up to the general, said: "I congratulate you, general, on having a watch that will keep time from eternity."

CUSHING, Thomas Parkman, merchant, b. in Massachusetts, 1788; d. in Boston, 23 Nov., 1854. He carried on business in Boston, and bequeathed the bulk of his fortune, supposed to amount to $150,000, for the maintenance of two schools in his native town.

CUSHING, William, jurist, b. in Scituate, Mass., 1 March, 1792; d. there, 13 Sept., 1810. He was graduated at Harvard in 1791, studied law with Jeremy Gridley, became attorney-general of Massachusetts, was appointed judge of probate of Lincoln county, Me., in 1798, became judge of the Massachusetts superior court in 1772, chief justice in 1777, and in 1780 was chosen the first chief justice of Massachusetts under the state constitution. At the beginning of the Revolution he stood almost alone among the superior officials in supporting the cause of independence. His grandfather and his father (both named John) were judges of the superior court, and his father, whom he succeeded as chief justice, presided over the trial of British soldiers for the Boston massacre of 5 March, 1770. On 27 Sept., 1789, Judge Cushing was appointed an associate justice of the U. S. supreme court, and President Washington nominated him chief justice in 1796, but he declined. He was one of the founders of the American academy of arts and sciences in 1780. In 1788 he was vice-president of the Massachusetts convention that ratified the federal constitution.
yards of the "Albemarle," before he discovered. Casting off the boat that was in tow, he ordered its crew to attack a picket-post near by, while, with a full head of steam, he drove the launch straight at the huge bulk of the iron-clad, whose crew rushed to quarters and at once opened fire. The launch replied effectively with her howitzer. A rush of water behind the vessel, but the launch was driven over them, and by the time she had received her death-wound from the "Albemarle's" guns Cushing had coolly swung the torpedo-boat under the great ship's overhang and exploded the charge. A large hole was blown in the iron-clad's side, her mainmast sank at her moorings, and was never raised. Telling his companions to look out for themselves, Cushing left his sinking launch and swam down stream, reaching the bank, thoroughly exhausted, half a mile below. As soon as he recovered his strength he plunged into the dense swamp, and after much toil and tedious wading came out upon the shore of a creek, where, with his usual good luck, he found a picket-boat, and at 11 P.M. the following night reached a U.S. gun-boat at the mouth of the river. Of the gallant fellow who was swept away, the only escape besides himself. Two were drowned, and most of the others captured. Lieut. Cushing did not expect to return alive from this enterprise, whether he succeeded in sinking the "Albemarle" or not, and before setting out he had visited Massachusetts in order to bid his friends goodbye. Five times the secretary of the navy officially wrote him commendatory letters, and for the "Albemarle" affair he received the thanks of congress, and was promoted lieutenant-commander, 27 Oct., 1864. At Fort Fisher, under a constant and heavy fire, he was present during the attack on the fort. Continued the work for six hours till he had completed it. At the final assault on Fort Fisher he led a force of sailors and marines from the "Monticello" in an attack on the sea-front of the fort, and amid an unceasing fire at short range, which cut down his men in windrows as he crossed a hundred yards of sand, rallied his men, and sent such efficient assistance to the troops that before midnight the fort was surrendered. After the war he served in the Pacific and Asiatic squadrons, being in command of the steamer "Lancaster" in 1866–7, and of the "Maumee," in the Asiatic squadron, in 1868–9. On the return of the "Maumee" to the United States, Lieut.-Com. Cushing was advanced to the rank of commander, 31 Jan., 1872, being the youngest officer of that rank in the navy. He was allowed leave of absence, but his health, which had been impaired by over-exertion, failed completely, and he died of brain fever.

CUSHMAN, Charlotte Saunders, actress, b. in Boston, Mass., 23 July, 1816; d. there, 18 Feb., 1879. She was a descendant in the eighth generation from Robert Cushman, but her father rose from poverty to be a successful West India merchant, but lost his fortune, and died, leaving his family in straitened circumstances. Charlotte was a remarkably bright, sportive child, excelling her schoolmates and developing a voice of remarkable power and richness. She was also a very good actress. Cushing introduced Miss Cushman, who sang with her in two of her concerts. Through Mrs. Wood's influence she became an articed pupil to James G. Maeder, that lady's musical director, and under his instruction made her first appearance in opera in the Tremont theatre as the Countess Almaviva in the "Marriage of Figaro" with great success, and her second as Lucy Bertram in "Guy Manring." She went with his company to New Orleans, where her voice, which had been strained by the soprano parts assigned to her, suddenly failed. Seeking the counsel of James H. Caldwell, manager of the principal theatre of New Orleans, she was advised by him and by Barton, the tragedian, to become an actress, and given the part of Lady Macbeth to study, in which she made her appearance with complete success in 1833. Going to New York, she declined a trial at the Park theatre, to enter into a three years' engagement with Thomas Hamblin, of the Bowery theatre, where she appeared for a season in leading tragic roles. Miss Cushman brought her mother, who had supported the family by keeping a boarding-house, to New York; but soon after this the theatre was burned, and her wardrobe, for which she was in debt, was destroyed. Miss Cushman then secured an engagement in Albany, where she acted for five months, and made many acquaintances among politicians through her relative, Gov. Marcy, then in the U.S. senate. Convinced that she had not served a proper apprenticeship in her art, she applied to the manager of the Park theatre for any place that might be vacant, was engaged to do general utility business, and soon made her mark as a leading actress. This engagement lasted from 1837 till 1840. In 1842 she assumed the management of the Walnut street theatre in Philadelphia, which she retained till 1844, when she accompanied Mr. Macready on a tour in the northern states, in the course of which she undertook the higher range of tragic parts with great success. She was an ardent student, and rapidly added new characters to her list, such as Elvira, Bianca, Helen McGregor, Emilia, Queen Katherine, Cardinal Woolsey, Ophelia, Pauline, Viola, and Katherine in "Taming of the Shrew." She was powerful and electric in tragedy, masterful in the depicting of every passion, great in Shakespearean characters, and in her lighter days was distinguished as a performer in high comedy parts. On 26 Oct., 1844, Miss Cushman sailed for England. In London she immediately achieved a triumphant success in the parts of Lady Macbeth, Rosalind, Mrs. Haller, Blanche in "Fazio," and Emilia. She sent for her family, and began her second season at the Haymarket as Romeo, a part she had chosen in order to bring out her sister as Juliet. The power of her impersonation created a sensation in London, and afterward in Dublin, while her sister's grace and beauty added to the success. She played other male companion parts with her sister, achieved a great success as Julia in "The Hunchback," Meg Merrilies, a part that she had first performed at the Park theatre, New...

York, in 1841, Nancy Sykes, Lady Gay Spanker, and other characters, constantly added to her professional reputation, and made warm friends in the intellectual society of England. In August, 1849, she returned to the United States and played throughout the country. She took her farthest lead in 1852 at Brecon. The following May, 1854, she visited friends in England, and travelled on the continent, but began playing again in December, 1858. Her house in Mayfair became a centre of artistic and literary society, and during the dramatic season she shared with undiminished popularity in London and the provinces, while part of her winters she passed in Rome. In 1857 she returned to the United States and performed during the winter and the spring of 1858, and returned to Rome, establishing herself in a spacious permanent winter home in January, 1859. In 1860 she again acted in New York, and appeared on several occasions for the benefit of the Sanitary commission. During the last six years of her life Miss Cushman developed a remarkable ability as a dramatic reader, giving scenes from Shakespeare, ballad reading, and select portions of the Bible with a success not less decided than her early historic triumphs. In 1871, after a residence in Europe, she resumed her career in the United States as a reader, besides fulfilling several dramatic engagements. Her farewell appearance was announced on Tuesday of this week, and her participation in the performance was marked by her peculiar and individual style. Her final performance in New York at Booth's theatre, where she played the part of Lady Macbeth, was signalized by social and literary demonstrations. She took a similar demonstrative farewell in the same character in Philadelphia and other cities, and her engagements in Boston, at the Globe theatre, on 15 May, 1875. After a reading-tour to Rochester, Buffalo, and Syracuse, she retired with a large fortune to her villa at Newport, where she lived with a final illness, and in October went to Boston, and placed herself under medical treatment. An obelisk copied from Cleopatra's Needle was placed over her tomb in Mount Auburn cemetery in 1880. See "Charlotte Cushman, her Letters and Memories of her Life," edited by Emma Stedman, the sculptor, who was her intimate companion at home for several years (Boston, 1879).—Her sister, Susan Webb, b. in Boston, Mass., 17 March, 1822; d. in Liverpool, England, 10 May, 1859, made her début on the stage in April, 1837, at the Park theatre, New York city, as Laura Castelli in Epes Sargent's play, "The Genoese," and achieved an immediate success. She played Desdemona to George Vandenhoff's Othello, Grace Harkaway to her sister's Lady Gay Spanker, and other prominent parts in New York and Philadelphia, and made a remarkable success in "Satán in Paris." In England her impersonation of Ophelia was regarded as of the first rank, her Juliet ran 300 nights, and in her old and many new characters her acting was greatly admired for its grace and delicacy. In 1847 she retired from the stage, and in March, 1848, married Dr. James Skinner, member of Liverpool, the distinguished chemist and author.

CUSHMAN, Elisha, clergyman, b. in Kingston, Mass., 2 May, 1788; d. in Hartford, Conn., 26 Oct., 1838. He abandoned the carpenter's trade to become a preacher at the age of twenty, was licensed by the Baptist church in Kingston after a short course of study, and ordained a pastor in Hartford. He took a prominent part in establishing the Connecticut Baptist missionary society in 1814, which was reorganized as the Baptist convention in 1822, and in 1823 founded and edited a denominational journal called the "Christian Secretary." In 1825 he resigned his charge in Hartford to become pastor of a church in Philadelphia, but returned to Connecticut in 1829, and after preaching in Fairfield became pastor of the church in New Haven in 1831. In 1833 he removed to Perrysville, Mahoning county, Ohio, where he died. The failure of the New England, in 1838, returned to Hartford a few weeks before his death, for the purpose of resuming the editorship of the "Christian Secretary." at Southampton, Cushman, at the solicitation of the adventurers, altered the agreement on his own responsibility, abandoning the two days a week for their private affairs that had been reserved to the colonists in the original contract. Robert Cushman, who was given the office of assistant govern- or, embarked with his family on the "Speedwell" or "Mayflower," and the family began the voyage together; but when the "Mayflower" sailed again alone on 6 Sept., with only a part of the company, he remained behind to act as their financial agent in England and send them supplies. In 1621 he published a pamphlet on "Emigration to America," urging the advantages of that country for settlement, and in July he sailed for New England in the "Fortune," taking with him his only son, Thomas, and arriving 21 Nov. He returned to Europe to manage the business of the colonists there, but left his son in the family of Gov. Bradford. Before his departure he preached on the "Sin and Danger of Self-Love," 9 Dec., 1621, noted as the first discourse delivered in New England that was published (London, 1622). It was reprinted in Boston in 1724, in 1780, and, with a biog- raphical sketch by Judge John Sewall, in 1785 (Plymouth). It is also contained in the "Cushman Genealogy," and was photo-lithographed from one of the three existing examples in 1870. On 18 Dec., 1621, he sailed for England, and continued as agent for the colonists in London. On the voyage he was captured and plundered by the French, and taken to France, but released after two weeks' de- tention. On his arrival in England he published an eloquent vindication of the colonial enterprise, and an appeal for Christian missions to the North American Indians. In 1623, with Edward Wins- low, he urged the settlement of territory on Cape Ann, where a new band of Puritans made the first permanent settlement within the limits of the Massachusetts bay colony. — His son, Thomas, b. in England in 1608; d. in Plymouth, Mass., 11 Dec., 1692. He married Mary, third daughter of Israel, who died in 1693. He was always the confidential friend of Gov. Bradford, and became ruling elder of the church on the death of Brewster in 1649. His wife survived him, and was the last of the "Mayflower" passengers, dying in 1699 at the age of ninety years. A large granite monument to the memory of the first Cum- shans was erected at Plymouth, Mass., by their de- scendants in 1858.

CUSTER, Nicholas, Indian chief, b. in Oneida, N.Y., in 1756; d. in Tuscarora village, near Niagara, N.Y., 20 Oct., 1840. His Indian name was "Kayh- natho." In the war of the Revolution he served on the American side five years, and at one time saved the life of Gen. Lafayette. Cushman belonged to the Tuscarora tribe. — His nephew, David, published a pamphlet with four illustrations, entitled "Sketches of the Ancient History of the Six Na- tions" (Lockport, N.Y., 1848).

CUSTER, George Armstrong, soldier, b. in New Rumley, Harrison co., Ohio, 5 Dec., 1839; d. in Montana, 25 June, 1876. He was graduated at the U.S. military academy in June, 1861, and re- ported for duty with the 3d division of cavalry, with which he fought the brilliant battle of Woodstock on 9 Oct., where he was confronted by his former classmate at West Point, the Confederate Gen. Rosser. He drove the enemy twenty-six miles, capturing everything they had on wheels except one gun. At Cedar Creek he confronted the enemy from the first attack in the morning until the battle ended. The 3d division recaptured, before the day was over, guns and colors that had been taken from the army earlier in the fight, together with Confederate dead and cannon. After this brilliant success Gen. Custer was sent to Washington in charge of the captured colors, and recommended for promotion. In the spring of 1865, when Gen. Sheridan moved his cavalry toward Richmond again, the 8th division fought alone the battle of Waynesboro. In this engagement were carried 11 guns, 200 wagons, 1,600 prisoners, and 17 battle-flags were captured. On reaching Richmond Station, Gen. Custer found that Gen. Early had rallied from his retreat at Waynesboro and was preparing for another attack. He therefore sent a regiment to meet him at once. Gen. Early was nearly captured, his command destroyed, and a campaign ended in which he lost his army, every piece of artillery, and all his trains. For gallant and meritorious services at the battles of Five Forks and Dinwiddie Court-House, Gen. Custer was brevetted brigadier-general, U. S. army, to date from 13 March, 1865. In a general order addressed to his troops, dated at Appomattox Court-House, 9 April, 1865, Gen. Custer said: "During the past six months, though in most instances confederate soldiers have been destroyed, you have captured, in open battle 111 pieces of field artillery, 63 battle-flags, and upward of 10,000 prisoners of war, including seven general officers. Within the past ten days, and included in the above, you have captured 40 field-pieces of artillery. You have never lost a gun, never lost a color, and never been defeated; and, notwithstanding the numerous engagements in which you have borne a prominent part, including those memorable battles of the Shenandoah, you have captured every piece of artillery which the enemy has been able to evacuate."

Gen. Custer received the first flag of truce from the Army of Northern Virginia, and was present at the surrender at Appomattox Court-House. He was brevetted major-general for his services in the last campaign, and appointed major-general of volunteers, to date from 15 April, 1865. He participated in all but one of the battles of the Army of the Potomac. After the grand review he was ordered to Texas, to command a division of cavalry. In November, 1865, he was made chief of cavalry, and remained on this duty until March, 1866, when he was mustered out of the volunteer service, to date from February, 1866. He then applied to the government for permission to accept from President Juarez the place of chief of Mexican cavalry in the struggle against Maximilian. President Johnson declined to give the necessary leave of absence, and Gen. Custer decided to accept the lieutenant-colonelcy of the 7th cavalry, his appointment dating from 28 July, 1866. He joined his regiment at Fort Riley, Kansas, in November, 1866, and served on the plains until 1871. On 27 Nov., he fought the battle of Washita, in Indian territory, and inflicted such a defeat upon the Indians that the entire tribe of Cheyennes were compelled to return to their reservation. He was ordered, with his regiment, to Kentucky, in 1871, where he remained until 1875. In the spring of that year he was sent to New Mexico, Dakota, and from there accompanied an expedition to the Yellowstone. On 4 Aug., he fought the Sioux, with his regiment, on the Yellowstone, near the mouth of Tongue river, and on the 11th had another engagement three miles below this mouth of the Big Horn. In July, 1874, the government ordered an expedition, commanded by Gen. Custer, into the Black Hills, which resulted in a hitherto unexplored region being opened to miners and frontiersmen. On 15 May, 1876, Gen. Custer commanded his regiment in a campaign against the confederated Sioux tribes. The Indians were discovered encamped on the Little Big Horn river, in a region almost unknown. Eleven tribes, numbering nearly 9,000, had their villages on and in the vicinity of the Little Big Horn. The government expedition, numbering 200 cavalry, while Gen. Custer, with 272 troops, charged on the village from another direction. They were, met by overwhelming numbers, and Gen. Custer, with his entire command, was slain. The officers and men were interred upon the battle-field, and in 1877 it was made a national cemetery. A monument, erected to the memory of all who fell was erected by the U. S. government on the spot where Gen. Custer made his last stand. In 1877 his remains were removed to the cemetery at West Point, N. Y.

He was of medium height, broad-shouldered, lithe, and active, with a weight never above 170 pounds. His eyes were blue, his hair and moustache of golden tint. He was a man of immense strength and endurance, and, as he used neither liquors nor tobacco, his physical condition was perfect. He used to ride through the streets of Washington with twenty-five horses behind him, and on one occasion the horses were shot under him in battle. At the age of twenty-three he was made a brigadier-general, at twenty-five a major-general. The close of the war reduced his command from thousands to hundreds; but his enthusiastic devotion to duty was not diminished, and his former spirit and energy of his mind in his Indian service just as it had been during the civil war. He reverenced religion, he showed deference to the aged, he honored womankind, he was fond of children, and devoted to animals. His domestic life was characterized by a simplicity, joyous contentment, and fondness for home that was surprising when it is remembered that, out of the thirty-seven years of his brief life, fourteen were spent in active warfare. One of his friends wrote his history under his name in one sentence, "This is not history," in 1871 Gen. Custer began to contribute articles on frontier life to the "Galaxy," which were published in book-form under the title "My Life on the Plains" (New York, 1874). He was engaged on a series of "War Memoirs" for the "Galaxy" at the time of his death. He occasionally contributed articles on hunting to "Turf, Field, and Farm" and "Forest and Stream." His life has been written by Frederick Whittaker (New York, 1878). —His wife, Elizabeth Bacon, whom he married in February, 1864, was with him at the front during the last year of the war, and also accompanied him in his nine years of service on the western frontier. She has published "Boots and Saddles, or Life with Gen. Custer in Dakota" (New York, 1885), and is now (1887) at work upon a volume of reminiscences of the general's service in Texas and Kansas.
of his brother in the famous cavalry charges, and in the fight at Namozine Church. 2 April, 1863, he captured a Confederate flag. At Sailor's Creek, 6 April, he captured a second flag, but was shot by the standard-bearer and severely wounded in the face. He was preparing to charge again, when stopped by his father and told to return to the lines and have his wound dressed. As he paid no attention to this request, it became necessary for Gen. Custer to order him under arrest before he could check his ardor. He received a medal from congress for the capture of the colors at Sailor's Creek. In the spring of 1863 he accompanied Gen. Custer to Texas and served on the staff until mustered out of service in November. He received the brevets of captain, major, and lieutenant-colonel. On 28 Feb., 1866, he was appointed second lieutenant in the 1st infantry of the regular army, and on 23 July was promoted to a first lieutenancy in his brother's regiment, the 7th cavalty, with which he served on frontier duty until he fell beside his brother in the battle of the Little Big Horn. When he was asked his opinion of his brother's last fight, he said, "Gen. Custer said:

"If you want to know my opinion of Tom, I can only say that I think he should be the general and I the captain."

CUSTINE, Adam Philip (kus-teen'), Count de, French soldier. b. in Metz, 4 Feb., 1740; d. in Paris, 1793. As a captain in the seven years' war under Frederick the Great, he became a colonel in 1782. He took part in the Revolutionary war, and was quartermaster-general of the French forces in America in 1778–83. He was present at the surrender at Yorktown, and on his return to France in 1785, was made aide-de-camp and governor of Toulon. In 1789 he was appointed to the states-general by the nobility of Metz, and advocated the cause of reform. He subsequently commanded the army of the north, received in June, 1792, the command of the army of the Rhine, and after one success again took command of the northern army in May, 1793, from which, however, he was soon recalled by the committee of safety and placed at the bar of the revolutionary tribunal, and, notwithstanding a spangled bonnet, was sentenced to be guillotined.

CUSTIS, George Washington}

CUTHBERT, Alfred, senator, b. in Savannah, Ga., about 1781; d. near Monticello, Ga., 9 July, 1856. He was graduated at Princeton college in 1803, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began to practise at Monticello, Jasper co., Ga.
He was first elected to the state legislature, then a representative from Georgia in the 13th and 14th congresses, serving till 1816, when he resigned.
He was again elected to the 17th, 18th, and 19th congresses, serving from 3 Dec., 1821, till 3 March, 1827. He was elected U. S. senator from Georgia in place of John Forsyth, who resigned 27 June, 1834, and was re-elected for a full term, serving from 12 Jan., 1835, till 3 March, 1843.

CUTHBERT, James Hazard, clergyman, b. in Beaufort, S. C., 19 Dec., 1823. He was graduated at Princeton in 1843, studied theology under his uncle, Rev. Richard Fuller, D. D., and became in 1847 pastor of the Wentworth street Baptist church, Charleston, S. C. In 1855 he was called to the pastorate of the 1st Baptist church, Philadelphia, Pa., where he remained until the beginning of the civil war in 1861. Returning to the south, he preached for some years in Augusta, Ga., and in 1869 became pastor of the 1st Baptist church in Washington, D. C., where he still remains (1880).
He has received the degree of D. D. from Wake Forest college, N. C. He is the author of "The Life of Richard Fuller, D. D." (New York, 1879).

CUTHBERT, John A., jurist, b. in Savannah, Ga., 3 June, 1788; d. near Mobile, Ala., 22 Sept., 1881. His father was a colonel in the Revolutionary army. He was graduated at Princeton in 1805, and in 1809 became a law student in New York. In 1810 he was elected to the legislature of Georgia, from Liberty county, which he continued to represent for years. During the war of 1812 he commanded a volunteer company, of which he was colonel, to protect the coast. In 1818 Georgia elected her representatives in congress on one general ticket, and Cuthbert was thus chosen. At that time the Missouri question occupied the attention of congress, and Judge Cuthbert took an active and zealous part in maintaining the sovereignty of the state. In 1821 he became editor, and subsequently proprietor, of "The Federal Union," a paper published at Milledgeville, Ga., and in 1837 removed to Mobile to practise his profession. In 1840 he was elected judge of the county court of Mobile, and in 1852 appointed judge of the circuit court.

CUTLER, Benjamin Clarke, clergyman, b. in Roxbury, Mass., 6 Feb., 1798; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 10 Feb., 1863. He was for some time a clerk in the mercantile house of Messrs. Andrews & Co., Boston. He was graduated at Brown in 1822, studied theology under the direction of Bishop Griswold, and by him was ordained deacon in November, 1822. His first settlement was in Quincy, Mass., where he remained about seven years, but left on account of failing health, and spent the winter of 1829-30, in Vermont and New Hampshire. He returned to New England on horseback, and subsequently passed a year as rector of the Episcopal church in Leesburg, Va. In the summer of 1832 he took charge of the first city mission of the Episcopal church in New York; and in April, 1836, accepted a call to St. John's, in the South, where he spent the last thirty years of his life. In 1833 he received the degree of D. D. from Columbia. He left a volume of sermons (Philadelphia, 1857).

CUTLER, Elbridge Jefferson, educator, b. in Holliston, Middlesex co., Mass., 28 Dec., 1821; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 57 Dec., 1870. In 1845 he was appointed professor of modern languages at Harvard, a chair which he held at the time of his death. He was a brilliant writer, and an able though generous critic. His published works were "War Poems" (Boston, 1867) and "Stella" (1868). An obituary notice of Elbridge E. Cutler was published by Andrew P. Peabody (Cambridge, 1872).

CUTLER, Enos, soldier, b. in Brookfield, Mass., 1 Nov., 1781; d. in Salem, 14 July, 1860. He was graduated at Brown in 1800, and was a tutor there for one year. He studied law, and, being called to the bar, settled in Cincinnati. He joined the army, and was appointed lieutenant in the 7th infantry in 1808, rising by successive promotions to be colonel of the 4th infantry in 1836. He resigned on 90 Nov., 1839. He saw service in the war of 1812, in the first Seminole campaign with Gen. Jackson, and in the Creek war.

CUTLER, Ephraim, pioneer, b. in Edgerton, Martha's Vineyard, Mass., in 1707; d. in Ames- toew, Ohio, in 1833. His early life was spent in Connecticut on a farm, where he acquired a knowledge of agriculture. He moved to Brook, Mass., in 1789; was appointed agent of the Ohio company, and soon afterward engaged in mercantile business until 1794. Finding his ventures unprofitable, he removed to Ohio, where he had an interest in some land. His journey thither required more than three months, and was delayed by privations of every kind, adventure, and sickness. On his arrival in Ohio, Gov. St. Clair appointed him judge of quarter sessions and judge of common pleas. In 1797 Judge Cutler exchanged his possessions for an estate in the township of Ames, where he spent the remainder of his life. He erected a log cabin in the wilderness, planted a few acres of corn, and re- assumed the duties of his judgship, periodically making his way through the wilds to Marietta to attend court. He says that during seven years, in which he held the office of judge, he traveled 1,000 miles, not sufficient, but in a single instance, to pay the weekly board." He early interested himself in education, and stimulated the people of Ames and Dover townships to establish a public library. The necessary funds were obtained by the sale of six farms procured by his father in 1813. The library also at this time was incorporated and held to be the first incorporated public library in the west. Toward the close of his life Judge Cutler wrote: "More than sixty individuals have grown to maturity within this circle, two have become professors in colleges, three are ministers of the gospel, one of them a bishop, at the head of them Thomas Ewing, several judges of courts, and one general." His last public service was in 1839 as a delegate to the whig convention at Harrisburg. He was the author of a "History of the First Settlement of Amestown in Athens County, Ohio" and "The First Settlement of Athens County," etc., both published in Hildreth's "Pioneer Settlers.

CUTLER, Hannah Maria Tracy, physician, b. in Becket, Berkshire co., Mass., 25 Dec., 1815. She is a daughter of John Conant, and was edu- cated in the city of New York. She returned to New York in 1842, and in 1843 she married the Rev. J. M. Tracy, who died in 1843. Subsequently she prepared herself for teaching, and was matron of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum at Cleveland, Ohio, in 1848-9. In July, 1851, she visited England as a newspaper corre- spondent at the same time a delegate from the United States at the peace congress in London, and while in England delivered the first lectures ever given there on the legal rights of women. In 1852 she married Samuel Cutler and removed to Illinois, where she labored assiduously for the interests of women and the rights relating to women. She was president of the Western union aid commission, Chicago, Ill., in 1862-4. In 1873 she visited France, in company with her son, J. M. Tracy, artist, and remained there till 1875. After her graduation as a physician at the Homoeopathic Medical College in Cleveland, Ohio, in 1879, she settled at Cobden, Ill., where she has practiced with success. She is the author of "Woman as she Was, Is, and Should be" (New York, 1846); "Phillipia, or a Woman's Question" (Dwight, Ill., 1866); and "The Fortunes of Michael Doyle, or Home Rule for Ireland" (Chicago, 1886).

CUTLER, Henry Stephen, musician, b. in Boston, Mass., 7 Oct., 1824. He was organist and choir-master in Trinity church, New York, from 1860 till 1868. He compiled "The Psalter, with Chants" (Boston, 1858); "Trinity Psalter" (New York, 1863); and "Trinity Anthems" (1868). The last named contains several of his own compositions. In 1864 he received the honorary degree of Doctor in Music from Columbia.

CUTLER, Lizzie Pettit, author, b. in Milton, Albermarle co., N. C. In 1789, she was instructed until her fourteenth year at a seminary in Charlotteville, Va., after which her education was continued very irregularly. Her first novel, "Light and Darkness" (New York, 1855), was re-published in London and translated into French. This was followed by "A Family Held by Mystery," "The Laws of Southern Life" (1856), and "The Stars of the Crowd, or Men and Women of the Day" (1858). As Miss Pettit (her maiden name), she gave, in 1860, a series of public readings. About 1850 she married Mr. Cutler, a New York lawyer.
CUTLER, Lyndsay, soldier, b. in Maine about 1806; d. in Milwaukee, Wis., 30 July, 1866. He offered his services to the government at the beginning of the civil war, and was given command of the 9th Wisconsin regiment, which he speedily brought into a state of discipline, and rendered one of the best in the service. Subsequently he was placed in command of the "Iron Brigade" (originally Meredith's), of the Army of the Potomac, to which his regiment was attached, and won the promotion of brigadier- and afterward major-general. He was twice wounded.

MANASSEH, Manasseh, clergyman, b. in Killingly, Conn., 3 May, 1742; d. in Hamilton, Mass., 28 July, 1803. He was graduated at Yale in 1765, after which he engaged in the whaling business, and opened a store in Edgartown, Martha's Vineyard. Meanwhile he continued his studies, principally legal, and was admitted to the Massachusetts bar in 1767. He conducted a few cases in the court of common pleas, but, finding the profession uncongenial, he gave it up and removed to Dedham, where he studied theology under the direction of the Rev. Thomas Balch, whose daughter he married. He was ordained pastor of the church there on 13 June, 1771, and remained associated with this organization until the close of the revolutionary war. After the death of Lexington he addressed the minute-men, then mustering in Ipswich, and accompanied them on horseback to Cambridge, where he saw the British as they retreated into Boston. He received a commission as chaplain in September, 1778, and served under Col. Ebenezer Francis in the 11th Massachusetts regiment. For his gallantry in the action in Rhode Island, on 28 Aug., 1778, he was presented with a fine horse by his commander. Toward the close of the war, when the physician of the Hamlet parish was employed in the army, and the people were without proper medical advice, Mr. Cutler at once applied himself to the study of medicine, and soon mastered the science sufficiently to practise. For several years thereafter his attention was divided between the physical and spiritual welfare of his congregation. Soon after the battle of Lexington he addressed the minute-men, then mustering in Ipswich, and accompanied them on horseback to Cambridge, where he saw the British as they retreated into Boston. He received a commission as chaplain in September, 1778, and served under Col. Ebenezer Francis in the 11th Massachusetts regiment. For his gallantry in the action in Rhode Island, on 28 Aug., 1778, he was presented with a fine horse by his commander.

CUTLER, Timothy, clergyman, b. in Charlestown, Mass., in 1803; d. in Boston, in August, 1875. He was graduated at Harvard in 1801, became pastor of a Congregational society in Stratford, Conn., in 1810, and served as a missionary as a preacher. Yale college having become established in New Haven, Mr. Cutler was appointed rector in 1719, and entered upon his duties with zeal and energy. It was not long, however, before the new rector, having read some standard church works in the said college library, as those of Barrow, Patrick, South, Sheldon, etc., was persuaded that Presbyterian and Congregational ordination was invalid. A discussion was held on this subject in the college library in October, 1722, when the rector Mr. Johnson, of Stratford, upheld the divine right of episcopacy. Of course, Mr. Cutler could not remain in Yale college, and the trustees promptly voted his dismissal. He thereupon, in company with Mr. John- son, migrated to England, in November, 1722, was ordained by the bishop of Norwich, in March, 1723, and received the degree of D. D. from both Oxford and Cambridge. He was appointed missionary by the Propagation society, returned to America, and took charge of Christ church, Boston, which he held for two years, when he was called to preach to the number of about 200. Dr. Cutler continued in this place during his long and useful life, always a consistent churchman, yet rarely engaging in controversy. He published several single sermons, and was one of the most influential and learned of the Episcopal clergy in colonial days.

CUTTER, John, colonial governor of New Hampshire, b. in Wales in 1623; d. in Portsmouth, N. H., 27 March, 1811. He came to this country with his brothers, Richard and Robert, before 1646. Richard, b. in 1627, settled on the Isles of Shoals and became a fisherman but afterward removed to Portsmouth. Robert, b. in 1628, became a noted ship-builder in Kittery, where John established himself in Portsmouth as a merchant, becoming also a farmer and a mill-owner, and acquired a large property among the planters of the Massachusetts. In 1655 he was sent as deputy to the general court, and was one of a committee from Portsmouth appointed under the jurisdiction of Massachusetts and against the claims of Capt. John Mason. He was appointed president of the province by Charles II. in 1679, and became a member of the British House of Commons, where he was succeeded by Richard Waldron. The decendants of these brothers (now who spell the name Cutts) include all the families on both sides of the Piscataqua.—Charles, senator, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., 31 Jan., 1719; d. in Fairfax county, Va., 25 Jan., 1748. He is descended from John Cutt, who was his great-grandfather. He was graduated at Harvard in 1789, studied law with Judge Pickering, and was admitted to the bar. In 1804 he was elected to the New Hampshire legiscature, becoming speaker of that body during the same year. He was elected senator from the New Hampshire, served from 3 Dec., 1810, till 3 March, 1813, and subsequently was appointed senator to fill a vacancy during a recess of the legislature, holding office from 24 May till 21 June, 1813. From 1813 to 1824 he was secretary of the U. S. senate.—Richard, politician, b. on Cutts island, near Saco, Me., 22 June, 1771; d. in Washington, D. C., 7 April, 1845. He was a first cousin of Charles, and was descended from Robert. He was graduated at Harvard in 1790, after which he studied law, but was diverted to business, was extensively engaged in commerce, and spent some time in Europe. On his return he became a member of the Massachusetts legislature, serving in 1799 and in 1800. He was elected as a democrat to congress, and with subsequent re-elections served consecutively till his death, till 3 March, 1813, but was finally defeated by Cyrus King, when a candidate for the 13th congress. In June, 1813, he was appointed superintendent-general of military supplies, an office which he continued to fill until it was abolished, in March, 1817, when he was appointed second comtroller of the treasury, remaining as such until 1829. He continued to reside in Washington in retirement until his death. In 1804 he married Anna Payne, sister of President Madison's wife.—His son, James Madison, b. on Cutts island, near Saco, Me., 29 July, 1803; d. in Washington, D. C., 11 May, 1863. He was educated in Washington, and was destined for the bar, but the war of 1812 swept away much of his father's property, and young Cutts, then a student in William Wirt's ofcice, was forced to leave school, and in November, 1812, was appointed in the treasury department, becoming chief clerk in the second comptroller's office, and ultimately, during Buchanan's administration, second comptroller. This office he held until his death, through the administration of President Lincoln. He died on 11 June, 1866, having been a member of Congress for several years. Soon after his death, Col. Robert Williams, U. S. A.—Another son, Richard Dominicus, surveyor, b. in Washington, D. C., 21 Sept., 1817; d. there, 13 Dec., 1882. He was educated at Georgetown college, and entered the coast survey in 1840, remaining in its service for over forty years. His first efforts were directed toward raising the standard of topographical work, which he accomplished with eminent success. Of late years the higher scientific work of the survey has occupied his attention, and his operations have extended over nearly the whole of the country. The shores of the Chesapeake, the coasts of the Pacific, the plains of Texas, and the mountains of New England equally bear testimony to his professional ability. To him the navigators of the Pacific coast and the Gulf, from San Francisco, San Diego, and Monterey bays, and some other minor harbors on the coast. In 1855 he was appointed U. S. surveyor upon the International fisheries commission for the settlement of the limits of the fishing-grounds between the United States and the British possessions in North America. In the civil war he was on the staff of Gen. Henry W. Halleck, and received the brevet rank of brigadier-general of volunteers in March, 1865. In 1873 he was one of the U. S. commissioners to the Vienna international exposition, and in 1883 he attended the International marine conference in Rome, which was convened for the purpose of considering a universal prime meridian and the unification of time. He held at his death the office of assistant superintendent of the coast survey, having direct charge of the office and topography. In 1854 he married Martha Jefferson Hackley, granddaughter of Thomas Mann Randolph, of Tuckahoe, Ga.

CUTTER, Ammi Ruhama, physician, b. in North Yarmouth, Me., 4 March, 1735; d. in Portsmouth, N. H., 9 Dec., 1810. His father, the first minister of that town, was chaplain of a New England regiment at the siege of Louisburg in 1745. His son was graduated at Harvard in 1739, and afterward studied medicine with Dr. Clement Jackson, of Portsmouth. He was surgeon of Col. Robert Roger's rangers until they were disbanded, and in 1759 surgeon of the New Hampshire troops in the successful expedition against Louisburg. He was physician-general of the eastern department, stationed at Fishkill from April, 1777, until the beginning of 1778, when he resumed practice at Portsmouth. He attended parts of the New Hampshire constitutional convention, a Whig, and long president of the New Hampshire medical society.

CUTTER, Calvin, physician, b. in Jaffrey, N. H., 1807; d. in Greene, Me., 28 March, 1880. He was a pupil at the New Ipswich academy, and afterward taught in Wilton, N. H., and Asl. He studied medicine in 1829 he studied medicine, and practised his profession in Rochester, N. H., from 1831 till 1833, in Nashua from 1834 till 1837, and in Dover from 1838 till 1841. Between 1842 and 1856 Dr. Cutter visited twenty-nine states of the Union, delivering medical lectures. In 1847 he began the compilation of "Cutter's Physiology," a text-book for schools and colleges, of which prior to 1871, about 500,000 copies had been sold. It has been translated into several oriental languages. In 1856 Dr. Cutter was chosen to convey a supply of Sharpe's rifles to Kansas, a hazardous task, which was successfully performed by him. He led into Kansas the Worcester armed company of sixty men, and also the force known as "Jim Lane's army," which he commanded for nearly a year. He was president of the military council in Kansas, and instrumental in the capture of Col. Titus. In 1861 Dr. Cutter became surgeon of the 21st Massachusetts infantry, and served in the national army nearly three years. He was twice wounded, and made prisoner at Bull Run. During most of his term of service he had charge of the medical depot of the 9th army corps as surgeon-in-chief.

CUTTER, Charles L., author, b. 14 March, 1837. He was graduated at Harvard in 1855, and appointed librarian of the Boston Athenæum in January, 1869, an office that he now (1886) holds. He has prepared a new classification for libraries, and written "Rules for a Printed Dictionary Catalogue" (Waltham, Mass., 1864), "Boston Athenæum: How to get Books, with an Explanation of the New Way of marking Books" (Boston, 1882); and edited "Catalogue of the Library of the Boston Athenæum, 1897-71" (6 vols., Boston, 1877-73). Since January 1881 he has edited the "Library Journal" of New York.

CUTTER, George Washington, poet, b. in Massachusetts in 1801; d. in Washington, D. C., 24 Dec., 1865. He studied law, and followed his profession with success in Kentucky until about 1845. In 1816 he was appointed officer in the mounted infantry, of which he became captain, and which subsequently was included in the 3d Kentucky volunteers under Col. McKee. Later he married Miss Drake, an actress of Cincinnati, and for a time made his home in Covington, Ky. Afterward he became involved in politics, and was known favorably as an eloquent orator. His services were rewarded with a clerkship in the treasury department, an office that he retained during several administrations. "The Song of Steam," "The Song of the Lightning," and "E Pluribus Unum," are his well-known poems. He also edited the "Cincinnati Press" and the "Press and other Poems" "Cincinnati, 1849." "Song of Steam and other Poems" (1837); and "Poems, National and Patriotic" (Philadelphia, 1857).

CUTTING, Francis Brockholst, jurist, b. in New York city in 1805; d. there, 26 June, 1870. He studied at Columbia, was admitted to the bar, and rapidly rose to distinction in his profession. In 1836 he was elected a member of the state legislature, as a democrat. From 1840 until 1853 he devoted himself to his large and lucrative practice in his native city, and from 1853 till 1855 represented one of its districts in congress, where he was a war democrat. On the renomination of Abraham Lincoln for the presidency, he aided in his re-election, and thereafter was active in supporting the cause of the Union. After the war Mr. Cutting retired from the bar, but quietly pursued his profession.

CUTTING, Hiram Adolphus, geologist, b. in Concord, N.H., 23 Dec., 1832. After years spent in teaching the natural sciences in the Vermont Methodist seminary at Montpelier, and in Norwich university, he was appointed in 1871 curator of the state cabinet of natural history, and in 1872 became state geologist of Vermont. In 1880 he was made secretary of the Board of agriculture, and in 1881 fish commissioner. He has made numerous experiments on the growth of plants, the means and proper methods of fertilizing the soil, and various observations on insects. His publications include "Mining in Vermont" (Montpelier, 1872); "Meteorological Tables and Climatology of Vermont" (1877); "Microscopic Revelations" (1878); "Farm Pests, including Insects, Fungi, and Animals" (Manchester, 1879); "Notes on Building Stones, also on Plant Growth" (Montpelier, 1885); "Lectures on Plants, Fertilization, Insects, Forestry, Farm Homes," etc. (1882); "Lectures on Milk, Fertilization," etc. (1884); "Scientific Lectures" (1884); "Farm Lectures" (1884); and also "Reports of Geologist and Curator of State Cabinet" (1874-80); "Biennial Reports of Fish Commissioners of Vermont" (1881-2 et seq.); and "Vermont Agricultural Reports" (1889 et seq.). Prof. Cutting has for many years lectured during the winter months on "The Bible: its History and Scientific Relations," "God in Creation," etc.

CUTTING, James Ambrose, inventor, b. in Massachusetts in 1814; d. in Worcester, Mass., 31 July, 1867. His early years were spent in Haverhill, Mass., where he lived in straitened circumstances. He invented a new bee-hive, and for the patent reservation of the patent, he moved to Boston, where he then devised several improved processes, but deriving no important benefit from them, and soon lost all his property. Afterward turning his attention to the new art of making daguerreotypes, he discovered the process of making pictures on glass, which after his own name he called ambrotypes. This he at once patented, and then disposed of his rights, both in this country and abroad. He established an aquarium in Boston, and subsequently the aquatic gardens.

CUTTING, Samuel Griswold, educator, b. in Windsor, Vt., 19 Jan., 1815; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 7 Feb., 1882. He was graduated at the University of Vermont, and in 1838 was ordained pastor of the Baptist church in West Boylston, Mass., but soon removed to Southbridge, Mass., where he remained eight years as pastor of the Baptist church in that place. In 1845 he assumed editorial charge of the "Baptist Advocate" in New York, changing its name to the "New York Recorder." He was the hands of the paper at once rose in character and greatly increased in circulation. In 1850 he retired from the "Recorder," and was for a short time secretary of the American and Foreign Bible society. From 1840 till 1852 he was editor of the "Christian Review," and from 1851 till 1858 was on the editorial staff of the "Watchman and Reflector," published in Boston. In the last-named year he was recalled to the editorship of the "New York Recorder." In 1855, in consultation with Dr. Edward Bright, he bought the New York "Baptist Register," consolidating it with the "Recorder," and changing the name to "The Examiner.' In the same year he was called to the professorship of rhetoric and history in the University of Rochester, a chair which he held until 1868. He was the first secretary of the Baptist educational commission, an association formed in 1867 "to promote education and the increase of the Baptist church in the community," and in 1870 the scope of this commission was enlarged by affixing "American" to its name and extending its care to the interests of higher education in general. Of this enlarged commission Dr. Cutting remained secretary. This organization, having accomplished its object, dissolved its existence in 1876. From September, 1876, till May, 1879, Dr. Cutting was corresponding secretary of the American Baptist home mission society. He was the author of "Historical Vicissitudes" (Boston, 1859); "Struggles and Triumphs of Religious Liberty" (New York, 1879); and "Ancient Baptistries" (published posthumously). Several of his poems, as well as many occasional discourses, were printed. He received the degree of D. D. from the University of Vermont.

Cuity, E. H., brother superior, b. in Loughborough, Leicester, England, in 1811; d. at Grand Coteau in 1833. She entered the novitiate of the Society of the Sacred Heart in Paris at the age of seventeen, and on becoming a professed nun, in 1839, asked to be sent on the American mission. She was named superior of the Grand Coteau convent after her arrival, and afterward was made superior of all the convents of her order in the west of the United States.

Cuyler, Sir Cornelius, soldier, b. in Albany, N. Y., about 1740; d. at St. John's Lodge, Hertfordshire, England, 5 March, 1819. In May, 1768, he joined the 55th regiment of foot (British) as an ensign, and was present at the reduction of Ticonderoga in that year, and of Montreal in 1760. Serving through the old French war, he became captain in the 48th foot, 1 March, 1764, and was aide-de-camp to Gen. Sir William Howe from July, 1775, till 15 Jan., 1776, when he was promoted major of the 55th regiment. He continued on Gen. Howe's staff, and was at the battles of Long Island, Brandywine, and Germantown. He was made major-colonel, 16 Nov., 1777, and commanded his regiment at the battle of Monmouth. After the conclusion of peace he was transferred to the West Indies, where he was quartermaster-general of the British forces, and was afterward in chief command. He attained the full rank of general in 1799.

Cuyler, Cornelius C., clergyman, b. in Albany, N. Y., 15 Feb., 1783; d. 31 Aug., 1850. His ancestors were among the early Dutch settlers of the neighborhood, and so common was the name Cornelius among them that those who bore it were obliged to adopt distinguishing initials to prevent mistakes. This accounted for the middle "C." of Dr. Cuyler's name. In 1806 he was graduated at Union, and began to study theology under Drs. Livingston and Bassett. In 1809 he was ordained pastor of the Reformed Dutch church in Poughkent, N. Y., where he remained for two years, strengthening and uniting a congregation which he found in a weak and almost divided condition. As a preacher he was exceptionally successful, and several revivals occurred under his ministry. An invitation from the 3d Presbyterian church of Philadelphia was accepted in 1834, and the pastoral relation then assumed continued during the remainder of his life. For many years he was president of the board of trustees of Jefferson medical college. In 1838 he received the degree of S. T. D. from Union. Besides a large number of sermons, published separately, he was the author of "A Narrative of a Revival of Religion in the Reformed Dutch Church, Poughkeepsie, 1815," and three tracts issued by the Presbyterian board of publication. Their titles are "The Parity of the Ministry," "Who shall dwell in Heaven?" and "Who shall dwell in Heaven?" He also wrote for the religious press, notably a series of essays on the Atone m, published in the "Journal and Telegraph," of Albany.

Cuyler, John E., surgeon, U. S. army, b. in Georgia, about 1816; d. in Morristown, N. J., 26 April, 1884. He entered the army as assistant surgeon in 1834, being among the first to pass the rigid examination instituted in 1833. He was actively engaged in the Creek war of 1838, and the Seminole war of 1840, and served with distinction through the Mexican war, receiving promotion to major and surgeon on 16 Feb., 1847. From 1848 till 1855 he served at West Point. As senior medical officer at Fort Monroe, during the first years of the civil war, his services were invaluable in organizing the medical department of the army, and he was promoted to lieutenant-colonel, 1862, brevetted brigadier-general on 13 March, 1865, and promoted to the rank of colonel on 26 June, 1876. After the war he was medical director of important departments until his retirement, 30 June, 1882.

Cuyler, Theodore Ledyard, clergyman, b. in Aurora, N. Y., 10 July, 1822, of which town his great-grandfather, Gen. Benjamin Ledyard, was the founder. He was graduated at Princeton in 1841, and at the Princeton theological seminary in 1846. Two years afterward he was ordained into the Presbyterian ministry, and for a short time was pastor of the church in Trenton, N. J. Shortly afterward he was installed pastor of the 3d Presbyterian church in Trenton, N. J., and remained there until 1858, when he accepted an invitation from the Market street Reformed Dutch church in the city of New York. During the seven years of his ministry to this congregation he was the remarkable and wide-spread religious revival of 1858. In the impressive services connected with this awakening Dr. Cuyler took a prominent part. In April, 1860, he was invited by the Layaf-ette avenue Presbyterian church, Brooklyn, N. Y., to become its first pastor, and under his charge the church rapidly grew to be one of the largest and most prosperous in the denomination, and it has twice outgrown its spacious buildings and sent out "colonies." As a preacher he has been remarkably influential, and nearly 3,500 members have been borne on the rolls of his church. He is a regular writer for the religious press, to which he has contributed nearly 3,000 articles, many of which have been republished and translated into foreign languages. He has also written a large number of tracts on topics of interest to young people, "Stray Arrows" (New York, 1851); "The Cedar Christian" (1863); "The Empty Crib" (1868); "Heart Life" (1871); "Thought Hives" (1872); "Pointed Papers" (1876); "From the Nile to Norway." (1881); "God's Light on Dark Clouds" (1882); "With the Land technicians to the Point" (spare-minute series, Boston, 1884). A large volume of miscellaneous articles on religious topics has been published in Dutch, and still another in Swedish.
DABLON, Claudius, clergyman, b. in Dieppe, France; d. in Canada in 1700. He arrived in New France in 1655, and was immediately sent among the Onondagas. In 1661 he accompanied Druillettes on his expedition to Hudson bay. He was next with Marquette on Lake Superior in 1668, after the latter had founded the mission of Sault St. Mary, and was appointed superior of all the missions in 1670. He edited the "Relation" of 1671-2, and compiled other narratives, which are still in manuscript. He is also the author of a description of Marquette's journey, published in the "Discovery and Exploration of the Mississippi Valley," by John Gilmary Shea (New York, 1838).

DABNEY, Charles William, consul, b. in Alexandria, Va., 10 March, 1794; d. in Fayal, Azores, 13 March, 1871. In 1861 he was U.S. consul at Fiyal, and won the affections of the islanders in a remarkable degree by his efforts for their welfare. In the famines that visited the island from time to time during his residence, some of which were very severe, he furnished the inhabitants with food, assisted them to replant their fields, advised and suggested the culture of new and more varied crops, encouraged the dependent, and restrained the out-sanguine. During the whole of his residence in the island he acted the part of a wise and judicious father to the people, and whenever he went, their blessings and gratitude were manifested.

DABNEY, Richard, author, b. in Louisa county, Va., in 1787; d. there in November, 1825. His name was originally the same as that of the historian D'Aubigné. He applied himself to the acquisition of Greek, and Latin, and acquired a remarkable proficiency in those languages, and was employed as a teacher in a school in Richmond. At the burning of the theatre in December, 1811, he sustained severe injuries. In 1812 he published a volume of "Poems, Original and Translated," of which an improved edition was printed in Philadelphia in 1815. The collection contained spirited and elegant translations from Euripides, Alcæus, Sappho, Martial, Seneca, and Petrarch. The second edition was published by Matthew Carey, who employed Dabney for a few years. Carey's political trials and imprisonment, and the dark years of the "Sides," is supposed to have been in great part written by Dabney. In a few years he returned to Virginia and taught a class of boys. The painful injuries received at a fire, together with the use of opium, taken to allay his sufferings, and indulgence in intoxicating drinks, caused his early death. His nephew, Robert Lewis, clergyman, b. in Louisa county, Va., 5 March, 1830. He studied at Hampden-Sidney college, and was graduated at the University of Virginia in 1842. After teaching for two years, he studied at the Union theological seminary in Virginia, was licensed to preach in 1846, ordained by the Lexington presbytery in July, 1847, and became pastor of Tinkling Spring church in Augusta county, Va., where he remained for six years. In 1853 he accepted the professorship of Hebrew in Bath, Virginia, and remained until 1888, except during the civil war, when he was actively engaged in the Confederate service as chaplain of the 18th Virginia regiment, and afterward as chief of staff to Gen. T. Jackson. In 1888 he was elected to the chair of moral philosophy in the University of Texas. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him by Hampden college in 1853, and that of LL. D. by the Southwestern Presbyterian university, Tenn., in 1877, and simultaneously by Hampden Sidney college. Besides being a voluminous contributor to periodical literature, Dr. Dabney has published "Life of Rev. Dr. F. S. Sampson" (Richmond, 1854); "Life of Gen. T. J. (Stonewall) Jackson" (London, 1864); "Sacred Rhetoric" (Richmond, 1866); "Defence of Virginia and the South" (New York, 1868); "Sensualistic Philosophy of the Nineteenth Century Considered" (1876); "A Course of Systematic and Polemic Theology" (St. Louis, 1878); and "The Christian Sabbath" (Philadelphia, 1881)—Charles William, son of Robert Lewis, chemist, b. in Hampden-Sidney, Va., 19 June, 1855. He was graduated at Hampden-Sidney college in 1873, and, after teaching for a year, spent some time at the University of Virginia, following special studies, principally scientific. In 1877 he became professor of chemistry and of mineralogy in Emory and Henry college, but relinquished this chair at the end of a year and visited Germany, where in 1880 he received the degree of Ph. D. from the University of Göttingen. In October, 1880, he became state chemist of North Carolina, at Raleigh, and of the North Carolina agricultural experiment station, and to these offices was added, in November, 1886, that of director of the North Carolina weather service. He has edited numerous technical circulars giving valuable scientific information to farmers, and prepared several small handbooks. From 1881 till 1886, Dr. Dabney is a member of several scientific societies, and has been secretary of the American association of official agricultural chemists, editing in that capacity the reports of their proceedings. He has discovered numerous minerals in North Carolina not previously known in that state, such as tin and arsenic ores, and he has published scientific investigations in the "American Chemical Journal." DA COSTA, Jacob M., physician, b. in the island of St. Thomas, West Indies, 7 Feb., 1833. His literary and classical education was received in Germany, where he held a position as teacher in the University of Giessen, and as medical professor in the University of Berlin. He was later appointed professor of hygiene at the University of Giessen, and in 1850 he was made a member of the Royal Society of Physicians in London. His published works include: "The Principles of Hygiene," "The Diseases of the Skin," and "A Treatise on the Pathology and Therapeutics of the Eye." He was also a member of the Medical Society of London.

DADD, George H., of about 1813. He was a native of England, but removed to the United States in 1838. He was a veterinary surgeon, and was a successful practitioner. He published several works on veterinary medicine, including "A Treatise on the Diseases of Horses," "A Treatise on the Diseases of Cattle," and "A Treatise on the Diseases of Sheep." He was a member of the American Veterinary Medical Association, and was also a member of the New York Academy of Sciences.
DADE, Francis Langhorn, soldier, b. in Virginia; killed by Indians near Fort King, Fla., 28 Dec., 1835. He was appointed third lieutenant in the 12th in 1836. On 29 Dec., 1837, became first lieutenant in 1816, captain in 1818, and brevet major in 1828. When killed he was on the march to Fort King with a detachment, which was nearly destroyed by a treacherous attack of the Seminole Indians. A beautiful monument was erected at West Point to his memory and that of his command.

DAGG, John L., educator, b. in Middleburg, Loudon co., Va., 18 Feb., 1794; d. in Haynesville, Ala., 11 June, 1884. He was ordained to the Baptist ministry in 1817, preached for some years in Virginia, and in 1823 removed to Philadelphia, Pa., where he became pastor of the First Baptist church. Retiring from the pastorate in 1833 on account of a diseased throat, he thenceforth devoted himself to teaching and authorship. In 1836 he took charge of the Alabama female seminary at Tuscaloosa, and in 1844 was made president of Mercer university atuan in Philadelphia, giving instruction in theology in addition to his duties as president. In 1856 he resigned the presidency of Mercer university. His published works are "Manual of Theology"; "Treatise on Church Order"; "Elements of Moral Science"; "Evidence of Christianity"; "Several Pamphlets," including "The More Excellent Way"; "An Interpretation of John III. 5"; "An Essay in Defence of Strict Communion"; and "A Decisive Argument against Infant Baptism," furnished by Ohio "Text-Books."

DAGGETT, David, jurist, b. in Attleborough, Mass., 31 Dec., 1764; d. in New Haven, Conn., 12 April, 1851. He was graduated at Yale in 1788, studied and practised law in New Haven, became state's attorney in 1811, mayor of the city in 1828, and held other public offices. From 1801 till 1813 he was a member of the Connecticut legislature, serving in 1794 as speaker, and from 1797 till 1804 and 1809 till 1813 as a member of the council or upper house. He voted as a presidential elector for Charles C. Finckley in 1804 and 1808, and for Dearborn in 1812. He served as a U.S. senator in the place of Chauncey Goodrich, who resigned, and served from 24 May, 1813, till 3 March, 1819, when he returned to his extensive practice at the bar in Connecticut. From 1828 till 1832 he was a judge of the Connecticut supreme court, and then chief judge till 1834, when he reached the age of seventy years, and was retired under the statute. He became an instructor in the New Haven law-school in 1824, and was professor of jurisprudence from 1826 until he was compelled by the infirmities of age to resign the chair. A sketch of his life by the Rev. Samuel W. Dunton, D. D., appeared in 1851. His son, Oliver Ellsworth, clergyman, b. in New Haven, Conn., 14 Jan., 1810; d. in Hartford, Conn., 1 Sept., 1850, was graduated at Yale in 1832, studied in the law-school, and, after serving as an advocate and attornet-adorn, passed admittance to the bar in 1831, spent two years in the divinity-school. From 1837 till 1843 he was pastor of the South church in Hartford, Conn., and of the Congregational church in Canandaigua, N. Y., from 1843 till 1867. In September of the latter year he was chosen professor of divinity at Yale, where he remained till 1870, officiating during the same period as pastor of the college church. From 1871 till 1877 he was minister of the Congregational church in New London, Conn., after which he resided in Hartford. He published sermons and magazine articles, assisted in compiling a book of psalms and hymns (1845), and left a small volume of poems, printed posthumously.

DAGGETT, Nathaniel, clergyman, b. in Attleborough, Mass., 8 Sept., 1727; d. in New Haven, Conn., 25 Nov., 1780. His grandfather was the great-grandfather of David Daggett. He was graduated at Yale in 1748, studied theology, was ordained pastor of the Presbyterian church in Smithtown, L. I., in 1751, and in 1756 became professor of divinity at Yale, where he continued till his death. When President Oliphant resigned in 1766, he was chosen president pro tempore, in which capacity he officiated until 1777, when he was succeeded by Dr. Ezra Stiles. When the British attacked New Haven in July, 1779, Dr. Daggett took part in the defence with a shot-gun, but was taken prisoner, and compelled by the enemy to act as a guide, and repeatedly pricked with bayonets until his strength failed, and he never fully recovered. He published several sermons and an account of the famous dark day in New England (1790).

DAHlgren, John Adolph, naval officer, b. in New Haven, Conn., 18 July, 1830, and was graduated at the United States Naval academy, 1849, and made midshipman in 1850, 1852. In 1853, he was made a midshipman with the rank of lieutenant, in 1854, and was made lieutenant in 1856, 1857, and 1858, and passed midshipman in 1859. He was commissioned lieutenant in 1857, and in the same year his hitherto exceptionally fine sight became so impaired by incessant labor as to threaten entire loss of vision, and an absolute rest was needed. During this period of enforced inaction Lieut. Dahlgren resided on a farm. In 1842 he resumed duty, and in 1843 went to the Mediterranean in the frigate "Cumberland," returning late in 1845 to the United States, the cruise having been shortened by the prospect of a war with Mexico. In January, 1847, Lieut. Dahlgren was assigned to ordnance duty at Washington, although he desired, and made an effort to obtain, active duty at sea. Then began those labors as an ordnance officer which for sixteen years demanded the most extraordinary energy, and which finally made Dahlgren chief of ordnance, and gave him the world's recognition as a man of science and inventive genius. He saw almost at once the defects in gunnery then existing, and soon offered the remedy in the style of cannon known by his name, which for so many years constituted the naval armament of the United States. It was proposed by him in 1850, and the first gun according to his design was cast in May of that year. These guns are of iron, cast solid, and are distinguished from the earlier ones for the earlier ships by a surface of nineteen and eleven-inch calibre; but Dahlgren also invented a rifled cannon, and introduced boat-howitzers with iron carriages, which were unsurpassed for combined lightness and accuracy. Under the sole direction of Lieut. Dahlgren, the ordnance department at Washington acquired the most extensive additions, including the foundry for cannon, gun-carriage shops, the experimental battery, and equipment of all kinds. He was made commander in 1853, and, in order to introduce innovations that completely revolutionized the style of guns for the Union Navy, his first and foremost concern was the eleven-inch gun, which was then considered too heavy for use at sea, he was permitted to equip the sloop-of-war "Plymouth" entirely as he wished. The experimental cruises of this vessel lasted from 1857 till 1858. He was on ordnance duty in the Washington Yard in 1857-8, and on 22 April, 1861, after the resignation of Franklin Buchanan, who entered the Confederate service, was given command of the yard, which was not only of great importance on account of naval resources, but also as the key of the defenses of Washington on the left. Com­mander Dahlgren hastened to secure the only route left to the capital by the Potomac river, and, when Alexandria was seized, he moved down the left wing of the column under Col. Ellsworth. He was appointed chief of the ordnance bureau on 18 July, 1862, and shortly afterward promoted to be captain, his commission being antedated to 16 July. On 7 Feb., 1863, he was made a rear-admiral, receiving at the same time the thanks of congress, and ten years additional on the active list, which, however, he did not live to enjoy. In July, 1863, he was ordered to relieve Admiral Dupont in the command of the South Atlantic blockading squadron. In July, August, and September of that year he co-operated with the land forces under Gen. Gillmore in various attacks on the defenses of Charleston, and succeeded, by silencing Fort Sumter and the batteries on Morris island, in obtaining for the monitors a safe anchorage inside the bar, thus putting a stop to blockade-running. His failure to take Charleston provoked some hostile criticism, but his operations had the continuous approval of the naval department. He led a successful expedition up St. John's river in February, 1864, to aid in throwing a military force into Florida, co-operated with Sherman in the capture of Savannah, on 23 Dec., and entered Charleston with Gen. Schimmelpennin on its evacuation in February, 1865. He was again chief of the ordnance bureau in 1868-70, and a few months before his death was relieved at his own request and appointed to the command of the Washington navy-yard. His death was the result of a heart-disease, a sequel of great personal bravery, dignified in manner, and of exemplary character. He published many scientific works on ordnance, which have been used as textbooks in the navy. They include "Thirty-two-pounder Practice for Rangers" (1850); "System of Boat-Armament in the U.S. Navy" (1853; French translation, 1855); "Naval Percussion Locks and Primers" (1852); "Ordnance Memoranda" (1853); "Shells and Shell-Guns," explaining his own system (1856); and various reports on ordnance, armored vessels, and batteries. He died on 26 March, 1864, at Norfolk, Va., in 1842; d. near King and Queen's Court-House, Va., 4 March, 1864, removed to Washington with his father in 1848. In the intervals of study he spent his time in the navy-yard, where he became familiar with the construction and use of artillery, and was taught by the sailors to swim and row. He began the study of civil engineering in 1858, and in 1860 began also to study law in Philadelphia; but, at the beginning of the civil war, he returned to Washington, and just after the first battle of Bull Run was sent by his father to place him in charge of the navy-yard and take charge of the batteries at Alexandria. He then became a special aide to Gen. Sigel, and served through Frémont's mountain campaign and through Pope's campaign, acting as Sigel's chief of artillery at the second battle of Bull Run. In November, 1862, he attacked Fredericksburg at the head of a small body of 70 men. He held the town for three hours, returning with 31 prisoners, and for his gallantry was detailed as special aide to Gen. Burnside's staff. He was afterward on Gen. Hooker's staff, distinguished himself at Chancellorsville, and as aide to Gen. Meade performed much important service in the Gettysburg campaign at the head of a hundred picked men. On the retreat of the enemy from Gettysburg he led the charge into Hagerstown, and was severely wounded in the foot. His leg was amputated, and for a time his life was danger; but he recovered, was promoted to colonel for his gallantry, and, though obliged to walk on crutches, returned at once to active service. He lost his life in a raid planned by him, in concert with Gen. Kilpatrick, to release the Union prisoners at Libby prison and Belle Isle. A memorial to him, written by his father, was revised and published by his stepmother (Philadelphia, 1872).—Admiral Dahlgren's second wife, Madeleine Vinton, b. in Galipolis, Ohio, about 1835, is a daughter of Samuel F. Vinton, for over twenty years a leader of the whig party. At an early age she married Daniel Converse Goldard, of Zanesville, who died, leaving two children. She married Admiral Dahlgren on 2 Aug., 1865, and has three children of this marriage. As early as 1859 she published sketches and poems under the pen-name of "Connor." In 1870-2 she actively opposed the movement for female suffrage, and drew up a petition to congress, which was extensively signed, asking that the right to vote should not be extended to women. The literary society of Washington, of which she was one of the founders, held its meetings in her home, and she was elected its vice-president. She was for some time president of "The Ladies' Catholic Missionary Society of Washington," and has built the chapel of "St. Joseph's of the Sacred Heart of Jesus," in South Mountain, near Mrs. Dahlgren's works included "Ideologies" (Philadelphia, 1859); "Thoughts on Female Suffrage" (Washington, 1871); "South Sea Sketches" (Boston, 1881); "Etiquette of Social Life in Washington" (Philadelphia, 1881); "South Mountain Magic" (1888); "A Washington Win-May, 1878. He was the eldest of four children, and, until he was seventeen years of age, worked on his father's farm. He then walked, about seventy-five miles, to New York, and began life as an office-boy. In 1858 he established the firm of Thomas S. Dakin & Co., commission agents, continuing it until 1861, when he engaged in the oil trade, and became the first president of the Gulick. In 1870 he retired from business. He was elected captain in the 13th regiment, Brooklyn, in 1862, and served in the Virginia campaign as a member of the staff of Gen. Crook, who then commanded the 9th brigade. After the war he became major-general of militia, and was widely known as a member of the American rifle team. He especially practised shooting at long range, and took part in the first international contest at Creedmoor in September, 1874, when the Irish team, under Maj. Leech, was defeated by the American team. In the following year the Americans again defeated the Irish team at Dolly Mount, Ireland, when Gen. Dakin made the remarkable score of 165 in a possible 180. He was afterward elected a member of the legion of honor of France. In the international match in 1875 the Americans defeated teams from Ireland, Scotland, Australia, and Canada, their success was mainly due to the instructions of Gen. Dakin. In the first day's shooting he made the highest score, 208. He also took part in the Irish-American return match of the same year, when his score was again the highest, reaching 208. He was the only rifleman that shot in every international contest held either in this country or in Europe. He was a director in the National and several other rifle associations. In 1876 he was the democratic nominee for congressman in the 11th congressional district, but was defeated by a small majority.

DALCHO, Frederick, physician, b. in London, England, in 1770; d. in Charleston, S. C., 24 Nov., 1836. His father, a distinguished officer under Frederick the Great, had retired to England for his health, and at his death Frederick came to Baltimore, Md., at the invitation of his uncle, who had removed to that place a few years before. Here he received a classical education, and then studied medicine, giving special attention to botany. He then entered the medical department of the army, and at the fall of Charleston harbor, but, in consequence of some difficulty with his brother officers, resigned in 1799, and practised in Charleston, where he was active in establishing the botanical garden. About 1807 he left his practice and became one of the editors of the Charleston “Courier,” a daily Federal newspaper. He began to be interested in theological studies in 1811, was ordained deacon in the Protestant Episcopal church in 1814, and priest in 1818. On 23 Feb., 1819, he became assistant minister of St. Michael's church, Charleston, where he remained until his death. A monument, erected to his memory by the vestry, stands near the south door of the church. Dr. Dalcho published “The Evidence of the Divinity of Our Saviour” (Charleston, 1820); “Historical Account of the Protestant Episcopal Church in South Carolina,” and “Aiman Rezon,” for the use of freemasons (1822).

DALE, James Wilkinson, author, b. in Cantwell's Bridge (now Odessa), Del., 16 Oct., 1812; d. in Media, Pa., 19 April, 1881. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, in 1831, at the head of his class, and began the study of John, but abandoned it for that of theology, which he pursued at Andover and Princeton. He wished to become a missionary, and was appointed by the Ameri can board to a station in India; but financial embarrassments prevented his departure, and to fit himself more thoroughly for mission work he entered the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania, where he received his degree in 1883. He had been ordained at Andover in 1887, and, after supplying pulpits in Philadelphia, was agent of the American Bible society in 1888–45. He then held pastorates at Ridley, Middletown, Media, and Wayne, Pa., till 1876, when he retired and devoted himself to literature. Dr. Dale was at one time a leader in the temperance movement in Media. The University of Pennsylvania gave him the degree of D.D. in 1888. His principal work is an exhaustive "Inquiry into the Meaning of Berrvce as determined by Usage," including "Classic Baptism" (Philadelphia, 1887); "Judaic Baptism" (1869); "Johannic Baptism" (1871); and "Christic and Patriotic Baptism" (1874). Dr. Dale's conclusions are adverse to the views of the Baptists on the subject; but the work is considered an authorized work by scholars of all other denominations, and has received from them the highest praise. A memorial of Dr. Dale was written by the Rev. James Roberts, D.D. (Philadelphia, printed privately, 1886).

DALE, Richard, naval officer, b. near Norfolk, Va., 6 Nov., 1756; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 26 Feb., 1826. He entered the merchant service at the age of twelve, and at nineteen commanded a ship. In 1776 he became a lieutenant in the Virginia navy, and was soon afterward captured and confined in a prison-ship at Norfolk, where some royalist school-mates persuaded him to embark on an English cruiser against the vessels of his state. He was wounded in an engagement with the last American frigate, and, while confined to his bed in Norfolk, resolved "never again to put himself in the way of the bullets of his own countrymen." After the Declaration of Independence he became a midshipman on the American brig "Lexington," which was captured on the coast of France by the English cutter "Alert" in 1777. Dale was thrown into Mill prison, at Plymouth, with the rest of the officers and crew of the "Lexington," on a charge of high treason, but escaped, with many of his fellow-prisoners, in February, 1778, was recaptured, escaped again, disguised as a British naval officer, and reached France, where he joined John Paul Jones' squadron as master's mate. Jones soon made him first lieutenant of the "Bon Homme Richard," and in that capacity he fought with distinction in the famous battle with the "Serapis," on 23 Sept., 1779, and received a severe splinter wound. After the sinking of the "Bon Homme Richard" in that engagement, Dale served with Jones in the "Alliance," and afterward in the "Ariel." He returned to Philadelphia on 28 Feb., 1781, was placed on the list of lieutenants in the navy, and joined the "Trumbull," which was captured in August of that year by the "Iris" and the "Monk." Dale received his third wound in the engagement. He was exchanged in November, obtained leave of absence, and served on letters of marque and in the merchant service till the close of the war. He was appointed captain in 1787, but, with the exception of a short cruise in the "Ganges," during the troubles with France, was not in active service till 1801, when he was given command of a squadron and ordered to the Mediterranean during the hostilities with Turkey. He was greatly hampered by his instructions, so that no serious enterprise could be attempted, he prevented the Tripolitans from making any captures during his command. He returned to the United States in April, 1802, and was again ordered to the Mediterranean, but, becoming dissatisfied, he resigned his commission on 17 Dec., and, having gained a competency, spent the rest of his life in retirement. Dale enjoyed the distinction of having been praised by Lord Nelson, who, after critically watching the seamanship of the commodore's squadron, said that there was in the handling of his ships a nucleus of trouble for the navy of Great Britain. The prediction was soon verified. Two of Com. Dale's sons held commissions in the navy.

DALE, Samuel, pioneer, b. in Rockbridge county, Va., in 1722; d. in Lauderdale county, Miss., 24 May, 1841. His parents were Pennsylvanians of Scotch-Irish extraction. Samuel went with them in 1775 to the forks of Clinch river, Va., and in 1783 to the vicinity of the present town of Greensborough, Ga. In both these places the family lived with others in a stockade, being exposed to frequent attacks from Indians, and young Dale thus became familiar with savage warfare. After the death of his parents in 1791 he enlisted in 1793 as a scout in the service of the United States, and soon became a famous Indian fighter, being known as "Big Sam." His most notable exploit was his "canoe fight," a struggle in a canoe with seven Indians, all of whom he killed. This remarkable contest took place on 13 Nov., 1813, at Randon's landing, on the Alabama river, and all its circumstances were afterward verified before the Alabama legislature. "Pho-chah-cha," a noted wrestler and the most famous ball-player of his clan, is thus described by Dale:

"He paused a moment in expectation of my attack, but, finding me motionless, he stepped backward to the bow of the canoe, shook himself, gave the war whoop of his tribe, and cried out, 'Sam tholocco, lana dahmska, ia-lanesta-lisha-lioso-lanesta!' 'Big Sam, I am a man; I am coming, come on!' As he said this, with a terrific yell he bounded over the dead body of his comrade, and directed a blow at my head with his rifle, which dislocated my left shoulder, I dashed the bayonet into him. It glanced around his ribs, and, the point hitching to his backbone, I pressed him down. As I pulled the weapon out, he put his hands upon the sides of the canoe and endeavored to rise, crying out, 'Tar-cha-cha is a man; he is not afraid to die!' I drove my bayonet through his heart. Dale commanded a battalion of Kentucky volunteers against the Creeks in February, 1814, and in December carried despatches for Gen. Jackson from Georgia to New Orleans in eight days with only one horse. After the death of Dale's Ferry, Ala., was appointed colonel of militia, held various local offices, and was a delegate in 1816 to the convention that divided the territory of Mississippi. He was a member of the first general assembly of the Alabama territory in 1817, of the state legislature in 1819-20 and 1824-5, and of that of Mississippi in 1836. In 1821 he was one of a commission to locate a public road from Tuscaloosa through Pensacola to Blakely and Fort Claiborne, and, on the completion of his duty, was made a county judge and given a life-pension. In 1831 he was appointed by the secretary of war, together with Col. George S. Gaines, to remove the Choctaw Indians to their new home on the Arkansas and Red rivers. See "Life and Times of Gen. Sam. Dale," from notes taken under his direction, by John F. H. Claiborne (New York, 1860).

DALE, Sir Thomas, colonial governor of Virginia; d. near Bantam, East Indies, early in 1620. He had been a soldier of distinction in the Low Countries, and had been knighted by King James I. in June, 1606. The London company, before the retirement of Lord Delaware, had sent him to Virginia with supplies, and on his arrival in the Chesapeake he assumed the government. He found the colony, then consisting of about 200 men, in great despondency over the departure of Delaware, and gave them new cause for sorrow by his administration of the government, which he carried on under a code (chiefly compiled from the rules of war of the United Provinces) sent to Virginia, without the company's authority, by its treasurer, Thomas Smythe. Notwithstanding this introduction of martial law, Dale has received praise for his vigor and industry. Seeing the feeble state of the colony, he wrote at once to England for aid; and in August, 1611, a new fleet reached Jamestown under Sir Thomas Gates, who relieved Dale in the government. Dale continued to reside in Virginia, and lived on in the colony after Gates returned to England. He died in a place of asylum and was buried in the Church of the Flying Dutchman.

On Gates's return to England in March, 1614, the government was again left with Dale, and he administered it till 1616, when he sailed for home in the same vessel with the governor and John Logan, who had been married during his term of office. Dale was in Holland in February, 1617, and in January, 1619, made commander of the East India fleet, participating in an engagement with the Dutch near Bantam. The climate at this port proved fatal to him, however, and he died, probably from fever, in November, 1620, at the age of forty-two.

DALE, William Johnson, physician, b. in Gloucester, Mass., 5 Sept., 1815. His grandfather, William Johnson, fought at Bunker Hill; his paternal grandfather, Ebenezer, at Lexington; and his father, Ebenezer, was a surgeon in the war of 1812. He was graduated at Harvard in 1837, at his medical school in 1840, and began practice in Boston. In June, 1861, he was commissioned surgeon-general of Massachusetts, holding the rank of colonel, and in December of that year was appointed acting assistant surgeon of the U. S. army, which places he held later, but forever after was on duty in Boston, Mass., during the civil war, and had general supervision of all matters connected with the medical staff and the care and treatment of the sick and wounded that were sent home. In October, 1863, he was raised to the rank of brigadier-general, in recognition of his services, the U. S. authorities gave his name to a general hospital established at Worcester, Mass., opened in September, 1865. He is a member of the Massachusetts medical society, and was its anniversary chairman.

DALLHOUSIE, George Ramsay, Earl of, Scotch general, b. in 1770; d. at Dalhousie castle, near Edinburgh, Scotland, 21 March, 1838. He entered the British army as a cornet in the guards, raised a company, and was made lieutenant-colonel at Martinique, and served in Ireland, during the rebellion of 1798, in the expedition to the Helder, at Belleisle and Minorca, and under Sir Ralph Abercrombie in Egypt, attaining the rank of major-general in 1805. He subsequently fought at the Scheldt and at Flushing, and through the Peninsular war, distinguishing himself at the battles of Vittoria and the Pyrenees. In 1815 he was raised to the peerage as Baron Ramsay. In 1816 he was sent to Nova Scotia as commander-in-chief of the forces, and after the death of the Duke of Richmond, in 1819, was appointed governor-general of British North America. During his administration efforts to effect a union of the provinces were continued, provoking the intense hostility of the French population, and ceaseless disputes took place between the executive and the assembly respecting civil list and the powers of the crown in Canada in September, 1828, and served in India as commander-in-chief, but returned to Scotland with broken health in 1829.

DALL, Charles Henry Appleton (Dal), clergyman, b. in Baltimore, Md., 12 Feb., 1816; d. in Calcutta, British India, 18 July, 1886. He was educated in the Boston public and Latin schools, and was graduated at Harvard in 1837, and at Harvard divinity-school in 1840. In November, 1841, he was ordained an evangelist of the Unitarian church in St. Louis, and afterwards removed to Baltimore, Md., Portsmouth, N. H., Needham, Mass., and Toronto, Canada. Failing health, from excessive pastoral duties, with a preference for missionary work, induced him to take up that occupation as his life labor. He became the first foreign missionary of the Unitarian church in Siam, and in 1853 sailed for Calcutta. There he instituted the first girls' school for natives, the first school for homeless and friendless children, and the first children's temperance society. Mr. Dall was elected a member of the American oriental society and the Asiatic society of Bengal, and a foreign associate of the Hungarian Unitarian consistory. He was the author of many tracts, educational and moral, for circulation in British India, a small work on the Suez canal, many hymns and devotional poems, and notes of travel contributed to periodicals in the United States and India. The number of pamphlets written by Mr. Dall in India exceeded one hundred, and many of them were several times reprinted in response to a demand from the natives for whose instruction they were intended.—His wife, Caroline Wells, daughter of Mark Healy, b. in Boston, Mass., 22 June, 1822, was educated at private schools and academies, after which she became a teacher, and in 1840 was made vice-principal of the then celebrated "Miss English's school for young ladies," in Georgetown, D. C. In September, 1844, she married Mr. Dall, who, although occupied thenceforth with duties incident to the life of a clergyman's wife, she continued her studies and literary activity. Her early work was especially devoted to reform topics, principally the opening of new fields of labor to women. Mrs. Dall's later labor has been chiefly with her family. Critical. In 1877 she received the degree of L.L. D. from Alfred university. She has published many books, among which are "Essays and Sketches" (Boston, 1849); "Historical Pictures Retouched, a Volume of Miscellanies" (1859); "Woman's Right to Labor" (1860); "Life of Dr. Marie Zakrewska, being a Practical Illustration of 'Woman's Right to Labor'" (1860); "Woman's Rights under the Law" (1861); "Marriage; A Name and a Popular Lecture on Health" (1864); "The College, the Market, and the Court, or Woman's Relation to Education, Employment, and Citizenship" (1867); "Egypt's Place in History" (1868); "Fatty Gray's Journey to the Cotton Islands" (1868); "Women's National Association, or One Last Glimpse of Charlotte Temple and Eliza Wharton" (1875); "My First Holiday, or Letters Home from Colorado, Utah, and California" (1881); and "What We Really Know about Shakespeare" (1885).—Their son, William Healey, naturalist, b. in Boston, Mass., 21 Aug., 1845, was educated at the Boston public schools, and then became a special pupil in natural sciences under Louis Agassiz, and in anatomy and medicine under Jeffries Wyman and Daniel Brainerd. In 1865 he was appointed lieutenant in the International telegraph expedition he in this capacity visited Alaska in 1865–8. From 1871 till 1880 he was assistant to the U. S. coast survey, and under its direction spent the years 1871 till 1874, and 1884 in that district. His work, beside the exploration and description of the geography, included the anthropology, natural history, and geology of the coast and adjacent regions. From the field-work and collections have resulted maps, memoirs, coast pilot, and papers on these subjects or branches of them. From 1884 till 1886 he was paleontologist to the U. S. geological survey, and since 1889 he has been honorary curator of the department of mollusks in the U. S. national museum. In this office he has made studies of recent and fossil mollusks of the world, and especially of North America, from which new information has been derived concerning the brachiopoda, pelecypoda, gastropoda, and the mollusk fauna of the deep sea. These studies have grown out of those devoted to the fauna of northwestern America and eastern Siberia. Mr. Dall has been honored with elections to nearly all of the scientific societies in this country, and to many abroad. In 1885 he was elected president of the American association for the advancement of science, and presided over the sections of biology and anthropology. His scientific papers include about two hundred titles. Among the separate books are "Alaska and its Resources" (Boston, 1870); "Tribes of the Extreme Northwest" (Washington, 1877); "Coast Pilot of Alaska, Appendix L, Meteorology and Bibliography" (1879); "The Currents and Temperatures of Bering Sea and the Adjacent Waters" (1882); "Pacific Coast Pilot, and Islands of Alaska, Dixon Entrance to Yakutat Bay, with the Inland Passage" (1888); "Prehistoric America," by the Marquis de Nadailhac, edited (New York, 1885); and "Report on the Mollusca Brachiopoda and Pelecypoda" of the Blake dredging expedition in the West Indies (Cambridge, 1886).

HALLS, Alexander James, statesman, born on the island of Jamaica, 21 June, 1759; d. in Trenton, N. J., 14 Jan., 1817. He was the son of a Scottish physician who emigrated to Jamaica about 1730. The son was educated in Edinburgh and at Westminster under James Elphinston, the friend of Dr. Johnson, whose acquaintance and that of Dr. Franklin he made while a student. He then studied law in London, returned to Jamaica in 1780, and, upon the remarriage of his father and his exclusion from the inheritance of his father's estate, removed in April, 1783, to Philadelphia. He took the oath of allegiance to the commonwealth of Pennsylvania in June, 1783, was admitted to the bar in July, 1785, and a few years later was admitted to practice in the United States courts, and became eminently successful as a lawyer in Philadelphia. He was for a time editor of the "Columbian Magazine." In January, 1791, he was appointed secretary of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and in December, 1798, his commission was renewed. While in this office he prepared an edition of the laws of Pennsylvania, with notes. He also compiled four volumes of "Reports of Cases ruled and adjudged by the Courts of the United States and of Pennsylvania, before and since the Revolution" (Philadelphia, 1790–1807). He accompanied an armed force to Pittsburg, in the capacity of paymaster-general, in 1794. He was again appointed secretary of state in December, 1796, and held the office until Thomas Jefferson became president in 1801 and appointed him, as an ardent supporter of the republican party, U. S. district attorney for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, which office he held till 1817, when he was called into the cabinet as secretary of the treasury by President Madison. When he entered upon this office, 6 Oct., 1814, the government was seriously embarrassed in its finances through the war with Great Britain, and the committee of ways and means in charge of the revenue was referred to Mr. Dall for suggestions as to the best mode of raising money for the requirements of the government, and of sustaining the public credit. In a masterly report he showed that the money required could not be raised by taxation alone, but must be obtained in part by loans. He proposed for the purpose of raising a loan the establishment of a government bank. The house, in committee of the whole, reported in favor of the bank on 24 Oct., 1814, and a bill was passed on 20 Jan., 1815, but was vetoed by President Madison. Having been interrogated as to the probable effect of a large issue of treasury notes, Secretary Dallas made a reply that had much influence in restoring public confidence and arousing the spirit of patriotism. On 3 April, 1816, an act to incorporate a national bank was passed by Congress, and Madison was induced to sign it. In the same year Mr. Dallas resigned his seat in the House of Representatives, and in 1817 was appointed by President Monroe to the ministry of France. After March, 1815, he discharged the duties of secretary of war in addition to the direction of the treasury department, and superintended the reduction of the army consequent upon the restoration of peace. Having contributed, to the extent of his ability, to extricate the government from its financial difficulties, and having seen the United States bank firmly established, he retired from office in November, 1816, and returned to the practice of law in Philadelphia, but died a few weeks afterward. Besides his system and his treasury reports, he published "Features of Jay's Treaty" (Philadelphia, 1795); "Speeches on the Trial of Blount"; "Address to the Society of Constitutional Republicans" (1805); and "Exposition of the Causes and Character of the War of 1812" (1813). He left unfinished a "History of Pennsylvania." The third edition of his "Reports of Cases," with notes by Thomas J. Wharton, appeared in Philadelphia in 1830.—His son, Alexander James, naval officer, b. in 1791; d. in Callao bay, Peru, 3 June, 1844, was appointed a midshipman on 22 Nov., 1805, became a lieutenant on 13 June, 1810, commander on 5 March, 1817, and captain on 24 April, 1828. He served under Rodgers on board the "President" in 1812, and afterward under Chauncey on Lake Ontario, and was with Porter for the extermination of pirates in the West Indies.—Another son, George Mifflin, statesman, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 10 July, 1792; d. there, 31 Dec., 1864, was graduated with first-class honors at Princeton in 1810, and then studied law in his father's office, being admitted to the bar in 1813. The same year he received the appointment of private secretary to Albert Gallatin, and accompanied him on his mission to Russia, to negotiate a treaty of peace with England. On his return to this country in the following year, he assisted his father for some months in his duties as secretary of the treasury, and then began the practice of law in New York city, and was solicitor of the U.S. Bank. In 1817 he was appointed deputy attorney-general for Philadelphia county. Taking an active part in politics, and supporting the candidacy of Gen. Jackson for the presidency in 1824 and 1828, Mr. Dallas was in 1829 elected mayor, and, on the elevation of Gen. Jackson to the presidency in 1829, was appointed U.S. attorney for that district. He retained this office till 1831, when he was elected to the U.S. Senate in the place of Isaac D. Barnard, who had resigned. He took a prominent part in the debates of that body until the expiration of his term, in 1838, when he declined a re-election, returned to the practice of the law, and filled the office of attorney-general of Pennsylvania from 1838 till 1835. In 1837 President Van Buren appointed him minister to Russia, which post he resigned in October, 1839, when he was recalled, at his own request, and again resumed legal practice. George M. Dallas and James Buchanan were for many years rival leaders of the democratic party in Pennsylvania, and aspirants for the presidency of the United States. In May, 1844, the democratic convention at Baltimore nominated him for vice-president of the United States on the ticket with James K. Polk for president. The democratic candidates were elected by an electoral vote of 170 out of 225. The questions of the time were the tariff and the annexation of Texas. Mr. Polk's election caused the admission of Texas to the Union just before the close of Mr. Tyler's term of office, but the subject of the tariff was left for the new administration. The appointment of his rival, Buchanan, as secretary of state, left Mr. Dallas without influence on the policy of the administration; but the tie in the senate on the free-trade tariff of 1846, and its adoption by his casting vote, gave him prominence. A bill that levied duties on imports for the purpose of revenue only, abandoning the protective policy, was passed by the house of representatives in 1846, but when it reached the senate that body was evenly divided, so that the decision rested with the vice-president.

In giving his vote Mr. Dallas said that, though the bill was defective, he believed that proof had been furnished that a majority of the people desired a change, to a great extent, in principle, if not fundamentally: but in giving the casting vote for a low tariff he violated pledges made to the protectionists of Pennsylvania, and norbienced the vote of the state for his party in the presidential election. His term expired in 1849. In 1856 Mr. Dallas succeeded Mr. Buchanan as minister to Great Britain, and continued in that post from 4 Feb., 1856, until the appointment by President Lincoln of Charles A. Davenport, who served from 16 May, 1861. At the very beginning of his diplomatic service in England he was called to act upon the Central American question, and the request made by the United States to the British government that Sir John Crampton, the British minister to the United States, should be recalled. Both these delicate questions were managed by Mr. Dallas in a conciliatory spirit, but without any sacrifice of national dignity, and both were settled amicably. At the close of his diplomatic career Mr. Dallas returned to private life and took no further part in public affairs, to express condemnation of secession. Many of his speeches were published, among them "An Essay on the Expediency of erecting any Monument to Washington except that involved in the Preservation of the Union" (1811); "A Vindication of President Monroe for authorizing Gen. Jackson to pursue the Hostile Indians into Florida" (1819); "Speech in the Senate on Nullification and the Tariff" (1831); "Eulogy on Andrew Jackson" (1845); "Speech on giving his Casting Vote on the Tariff of 1846" (1846); "Speech of the President's Casting Vote in a Series of Letters" (1846); "Speech to the Citizens of Pittsburg on the War, Slavery, and the Tariff" (1847); "Speech to the Citizens of Philadelphia on the Necessity of maintaining the Union, the Constitution, and the Compromise" (1850). A "Speech from London," written while he was minister there, in 1856-'60, was edited and published by his daughter Julia (Philadelphia, 1869).—The third son of Alexander James was a lawyer and judge in Pittsburg, Pa.—The son of George M., Philip Mifflin, b. in 1823; d. in Philadelphia, Oct. 16, 1889, when he was recalled, at his own request, and again resumed legal practice. H. A. Dall. son, Alexander Robert Charles, after serving with distinction as a British officer through the Peninsular war and at the battle of Waterloo (where his cousin Charles was wounded), entered the Anglican priesthood, following his cousin's example, and became chaplain in some of the missionary establishments in the west of Ireland. He was the author of many popular devotional books.—Another distinguished member of the family in Great Britain was Sir George, a political author, in London in 1750; d. in 1839. His principal publication was a work entitled "Thoughts on Our Present Situation, with Remarks on the Policy of a War with France" (1793).

DALLING, Sir John, British soldier, d. in 1798. He served under Loudoun as major of infantry in 1737, was engaged at Louisburg in 1758, and commanded a body of light infantry under Gen. Wolfe at Quebec in 1759. He was made lieutenant-colonel of the 43d foot in 1760, and commanded the regiment at the siege of Havana in August, 1762. In 1767 he was appointed lieutenant-governor, and a few years later general in Jamaica. He was promoted major-general in 1777, conducted an expedition against the Spanish colonies in 1780, became lieutenant-general in 1782, and was made general in 1783.

DALSHEIMER, Allee, poet, b. in New Orleans, 1845; d. there, 15 Jan., 1890. Her maiden name was Solomon. She received her education in the city schools, and in 1865 became a teacher, in her examination as to qualifications standing at the head of 230 applicants. She married, in 1887, Mr. Dalsheimer, a lawyer, and gave up teaching but resided in 1873, when she became principal of the girls' department of a school under the management of the Hebrew educational society, where she remained until 1878. Her writings consist of numerous sketches, short stories, and poems, all of which appeared in the daily papers of New Orleans under the pseudonym of "Salvia Dale," but have never been collected and published in book-form. Of her poems, those entitled "Motherhood" and "Twilight Shadows" are among the best.

DANA, E. R. B., b. in Newfoundland, d. in Harbor Grace, Newfoundland, in April, 1889. He was nominated bishop on the creation of the see in 1886, and was consecrated the same year.

DALTON, John Call, physiologist, b. in Chelmsford, Mass., 2 Feb., 1835. He was graduated at Harvard in 1854, and at the medical department of that university in 1847. His attention was at once directed to physiology, and in 1851 he obtained the annual prize offered by the American medical association by his essay on "Corpus Lu-tem." Subsequently his researches on the anatomy of the placenta, the physiology of the cerebellum, intestinal digestion, and other experimental observations, embodied in his treatise on physiology, gained for him a reputation as one of the first of modern physiologists. He became professor of physiology in the medical department of the University of Buffalo, and was the first in the United States to teach that subject with illustrations by experiments on animals. This chair he resigned in 1854, and accepted a similar professorship in the Vermont medical college in Woodstock, where he remained until 1866. From 1866 till 1861 he filled the chair of physiology in the Long Island college hospital in Brooklyn. During the winter of 1854-5 he lectured on physiology at the College of physicians and surgeons, New York, temporarily filling the place of Dr. Alonzo Clark. In 1863 he was elected to that professorship, which he continued to fill until his resignation in 1888. In 1884 he again succeeded Dr. Clark as president of the College of physicians and surgeons. During the civil war he was a surgeon in the national service, going to Washington in 1861 in that capacity with the 7th New York. Subsequently he was appointed surgeon of volunteers, and held important offices in the medical corps until his resignation in March, 1864. Dr. Dalton has been an active member of many medical societies, and held prominent offices in them. In 1864 he was elected a member of the National academy of sciences. His contributions to the literature of physiology have been numerous since 1851. He has published articles in the "American Journal of the Medical Sciences," the "Transactions of the New York Academy of Sciences," the "American Medical Monthly," and other medical journals in New York; and also many valuable articles in his specialties in the American and other cyclopædias. He has published in book-form "A Treatise on Human Physiology" (New York, 1869; 4th ed., 1880); and a treatise on Physiology and Hygiene for Schools, Families, and Colleges" (1868); "The Experimental Method of Medicine" (1882); "Doctrines of the Circulation" (1884); and "Topographical Anatomy of the Brain" (1885).— His brother, Edward Barry, physician, b. in Lowell, 21 Sept., 1844; d. in Boston Cal., 13 May, 1872, was graduated at Harvard in 1855, and at the College of physicians and surgeons, New York, in 1858. Dr. Dalton then settled in New York, and was resident physician of St. Luke's hospital when the civil war began. He at one time volunteered and served as a surgeon in the army corps, and as medical director of the Department of Virginia. In March, 1864, he was transferred to the Army of the Potomac, where he remained throughout the campaign of that year, from the Wilderness to City Point, having charge of all the hospitals, and paying visits to the hospitals. At City Point he was made chief medical officer of the depot field-hospitals, Army of the Potomac, till the final campaign in March and April, 1865, when he accompanied the troops as medical director of the 9th army corps. After his discharge he was successively appointed lieutenant-colonel and colonel of volunteers. In March, 1866, he was appointed sanitary superintendent of the New York metropolitan board of health, in which office he remained until his resignation in January, 1869. In 1869 he originated the present city ambulance system for the transportation of the sick and injured. His health had then begun to fail, and, after trying various resorts, he finally visited California, where he died from consumption. He published papers on "The Dis- porter kidney in Bartet's "Supra-renal Capsules" (1890); "The Metropolitan Board of Health" (1868); and "Reports of the Sanitary Superintendent of the Metropolitan Board of Health" from 1880 to 1899.

DALTON, Tristran, senator, b. in the part of the town of Newbury that afterward became Newburyport, Mass., 28 May, 1738; d. in Boston, Mass., 30 May, 1817. He was prepared for college in Dummer academy, Byfield, under Samuel Moody, and graduated at Harvard in 1755. He then studied law, but engaged in mercantile pursuits with his father-in-law, Robert Hooper, and attended to his large estate, called Spring Hill, in West Newbury. He was an ardent patriot, and a leader of the scenes of Daly has also, among others, composed many notable men. He was distinguished for his elegance of manners and scholarly accomplishments, and entertained Washington, Adams, Talleyrand, and other famous persons at Spring Hill. He was a delegate from Massachusetts to the convention, when he opened the Ninth Avenue theatre on Twenty-fourth street. This building was destroyed by fire in 1878, and three weeks later he opened another theatre, formerly the "Globe," in Broadway, under the name of "Daly's theatre". In 1879, he established his "Daly's theatre" in Broadway, near Thirtieth street, and once in Germany and France, where the merits of his management and training were warmly acknowledged. His career as a dramatic author began in 1882, with an adaptation from the German of Montal's "Deborah," and since then he has produced original plays among them "Divorce," "Pique," "Horizon," "Under the Gaslight," and many adaptations from French and German authors. Most of his productions have won popular success also. Among his most successful pieces was the "Grand Opera House" in New York. His noted achievement is the organization of combinations of players, complete scenic presentations, and elevation of dramatic purposes. He is an enthusiastic and hard worker in his profession, devoting all his time to the success of his theatre, a great reader, and a well-informed student of the dramatic literature of many nations.

Daly, Charles Patrick, jurist, b. in New York city, 31 Oct., 1810. He received a little schooling, early went to sea before the mast, serving three years, and later became a mechanic's apprentice. Afterward he studied law in his native city, was admitted to the bar in 1839, elected a member of the legislature in 1843, became justice of the court of common pleas in 1844, first judge in 1857, and chief justice from 1871 to 1886, his term expired before he had served the full term of his sentence. He was reelected by a vessel bound for New York, where he settled and where his family soon followed him. When Robert was about thirty-three years of age he removed to Rochester. He was a millwright, unusually skillful and ingenious, and many of the flour-mills in the city of Rochester were built under his supervision. He invented and introduced the "elevator system" in handling and storing grain, which is now in general use.
DAMEN, Arnold, clergyman, b. in Holland about 1800. After entering the Society of Jesus, he came to the United States, and the development of the West is often considered to be largely his work. In 1837 he erected a Jesuit establishment in Chicago; he also built the great Church of the Holy Trinity, and founded the College of St. Ignatius in the same city. His success as a missionary has been very great. As a priest, he holds the ranks very high in the religious body to which he belongs.

D’AMICO, Carlos A. (da-am-e’-ko), Argentine statesman, b. in Buenos Ayres in 1844. At the age of twenty-one he was graduated in law at the university of his native city, and opened an office in Buenos Ayres. At the same time he took an active part in politics, affiliating himself in the national autonomist party, of which he is still one of the chief supporters. In 1868, when the allied armies, having repelled the forces of Lopez, were about to invade Paraguay, D’Amico accepted a commission in a regiment of national guards, was present at all the battles of the allied armies on Paraguayan territory, and rose to the rank of major. He then returned to his law practice, but soon was elected secretary of the federal senate, and in 1877 to the government of Buenos Ayres. In October, 1880, he was appointed secretary of state of the government of the state of Buenos Ayres, which he held until, in 1888, he was called to the federal senate as senator for Buenos Ayres. At the expiration of the term of Gov. Rocha, in 1888, D’Amico was chosen governor of the state of Buenos Ayres. He is, perhaps, the most popular orator of the Argentine republic, and in the chamber of deputies, as well as in the senate, uses his gifts to defend the interests of his native state and the federation in general. As minister of the state government, he initiated measures granting increased facilities for communications with Europe and the countries of both Americas, and fostering emigration and the public-school system. He was one of the originators of the railroad to Mendoza, destined to make the Andes more accessible. In 1862, when he became governor he pushed the progress of this favorite city still more energetically, and its growth and embellishment made rapid strides. Under his administration were either begun or completed the palace of the government, the ministerial buildings, the house of congress, the progreso bank, and a great number of public-school buildings. His term as governor will expire in the latter part of 1887.

DAMON, David, clergyman, b. in East Sudbury (now Wayland), Mass., 12 Sept., 1798; d. in Reading, Mass., in 1843. His father was a farmer, and unable to support his family, so that David was dependent for his education entirely upon his own exertions. He prepared himself for college at Phillips Andover academy, and was graduated at Harvard in 1811. He was one of the founders of the Harvard literary society in 1807–10, and the first president. He was the third scholar in a class of which Edward Everett and N. L. Frothingham were the first and second. He studied theology at Andover, but was not graduated, was licensed to preach 22 Nov., 1813, ordained 1 Feb., 1815, and installed as pastor of the Unitarian church in Lunenburg, Mass. He occupied various parishes in New England until 1835, when he settled in East Cambridge, Mass. In January, 1841, he delivered the annual sermon before the legislature of Massachusetts, and in May of the same year the Dudleian lecture at Harvard at the request of President D. T. Austin. He was the first person to share the honor of being called upon him by his alma mater in 1843. His death was caused by apoplexy, which attacked him while he was officiating at the funeral of his friend, Edmund Parker. His publications consisted principally of sermons and addresses.

DAMON, Howard Franklin, physician, b. in Scituate, Mass., in 1833; d. in Boston, 17 Sept., 1884. He was graduated at Harvard in 1858, and at the medical department of that institution in 1861. He was physician and superintendent of the Boston dispensary in 1862–2, and was afterward admitting physician to the city hospital, and physician to the department of skin diseases among outdoor patients. He was a member of the American medical association, of the Boston society for medical improvement, the Boston microscopical society, and was corresponding member of the New York dermatological society. He was the author of "Leucocytocemia," a Boylston prize essay (Boston, 1864); "Photographs of Skin Diseases" (Boston, 1870); "Neuroses of the Skin" (Philadelphia, 1888); "Structural Lesions of the Skin" (Philadelphia, 1889); and "Signs and Symptoms in Skin Diseases" (1870).

DAMPIER, William, navigator, b. in East Coker, Somersethshire, about 1632; the place and date of his death are unknown. Early in life he was left an orphan, when he was taken from school and placed on the coast of Newfound-land, and on his return he engaged as a common sailor on a vessel sailing for the East Indies. He served in the Dutch war during 1673 under Sir Edward Sprague, but failing health led him to settle in the country. In 1674 he became under-manager of an estate in Jamaica, but soon engaged in the coasting trade, and made two voyages to the bay of Campeachy, where he also remained for some time with the logwood-cutters as a common workman, and subsequently published an account of his exploits during his voyage from Jamaica, and then sailed to England, but again returned to the West Indies during the following year, when he was persuaded to join a party of buccaneers, with whom he crossed the isthmus of Panama, and spent 1680 on the Peruviam coast, for which he successfully returned in 1681. In 1682, when he became governor he pushed the progress of his favorite city still more energetically, and its growth and embellishment made rapid strides. Under his administration were either begun or completed the palace of the government, the ministerial buildings, the house of congress, the progreso bank, and a great number of public-school buildings. His term as governor will expire in the latter part of 1887.

quenty he entered the British navy, and commanded the "Roebuck." He was sent on a voyage discovery and sailed to Brazil, and thence to Australia, where he spent some time in exploration and circumnavigated the island, to which he gave the name of New Britain. He left archipelago and the strait between Papua and New Britain were named for him at this time.
After other discoveries, he returned by a new route to Ceram, in the Moluccas, and in February, 1701, arrived off the island of Ascension, where his vessel sprang a leak and founder. After a short voyage in the English Channel, however, during the latter part of the year. He had command of a ship in the South sea about 1705, and sailed with Capt. Stradling, whose vessel founder at sea. Later Damperac accompanied Woodes Rogers in his voyage around the world during 1785-11 in the capacity of pilot.
On this expedition Guayaquil was taken. He published "A Voyage around the World," and a supplement to it, describing the countries of Tonquín, Malaca, etc.; "Two Voyages to Campeche"; "A Discourse of Trade Winds, etc., in the Torrid Zone." (1707); and "A View of the islands of New Holland." (1709). The best edition of this collected voyages is in four volumes (London, 1729).

DAMROSC, Leopold, musician, b. in Posen, Prussia, 22 Oct., 1833; d. in New York city, 15 Feb., 1889. At the age of nine he began to study the violin, but was obliged to practise at the house of friends, on account of the opposition of his parents. Acceding to their wishes, he entered the University of Berlin, was graduated with high honors, and received a diploma as doctor of medicine. After a short period of leisure moment was given to music. He studied the violin under Ries, and thenceforth was the pupil of Dehn and Bohme.

After his graduation, Dr. Damrosc devoted his time and energies to the study of music, and his fame as a violinist soon reached the large cities of Germany, where he appeared with success. Shortly afterward he went to Weimar, and was cordially received by Liszt, who appointed him solo-violinist in the Ducal orchestra, of which he was the director. Liszt dedicated one of his symphonic poems, "Le Triomphe Funèbre de Tasse," to Dr. Damrosch, an honor extended to two others only—Wagner and Berlioz.

Dr. Damrosch's first appearance as a conductor was at the Philharmonic concerts in Breslau in 1859, where he was highly successful, and conducted everything that he appeared with success. In these concerts he gave a judicious mixture of popular and classic as well as modern pieces, and in 1862 founded a symphonic society in that city, with an orchestra of eighty performers, modelled after the Gewandhaus concerts of Leipzig. The fame of this society soon extended throughout Germany, and several of the performances were directed by Liszt. Wagner also accepted the invitation to conduct his own manuscript compositions in the winter of 1867.
In 1871 Dr. Damrosch came to New York upon the invitation of the Arion society, and made his first appearance, on 8 May, 1871, at Steinway hall, as conductor, composer, and violinist.
He founded the Oratorio society in 1873. The societies that had previously existed had failed, from various causes, and the only organizations of note in New York were the Old Harmonic society and the Church-Music association. The work was begun with enthusiasm, and in the year of its organization the first concert was given, with a programme consisting of selections from Bach, Händel, Palestina, etc. The growth of the society was so rapid that in the following year the first oratorio, Händel's "Samson," was performed with full orchestra, and on Christmas evening of that year the "Messi-iah" was given with great effect. It performed Bach's, Beethoven's, Brahms's, Händel's, Haydn's, Mendelssohn's, Mozart's, Palestrina's, and other great works, many of which had never been given in the United States. In 1877 Dr. Damrosch, in connection with a number of persons interested in the cultivation of orchestral music, established the Symphony society. Although a separate or-organization, it has been closely connected with the Oratorio society by the joint performance of several notable works. The co-operation of these societies reached its climax in the great "musical festival," which was held in the armory of the 7th regiment in New York, 13 till 23 December, 1884. The chorus numbered 1,200, the main body being the Oratorio society, which was augmented by v ious choral societies from neighboring towns. An additional chorus of 1,000 young ladies from the Normal college and 250 boys from the church choirs took part. On the afternoon of the last day the orchestra was composed of 250 pieces, and a large number of artists were selected for soloists by Dr.
Damrosch. Among the choral works performed were Händel's "Dettingen Te Deum" and "Messiah"; Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel" (first time); Mozart's "Grande Messa des Mortes" (first time), and Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony." The audicence numbered from 8,000 to 10,000 at each concert, and the enthusiasm for the project of this enterprise resulted in an ovation on the last night.
The degree of Doctor of Music was conferred upon him by Columbia University December 15, 1884.
Dr. Damrosch travelled extensively through the west with his orchestra, meeting everywhere with great success. Italian opera, which, through its "star" system and small repertory, had been losing its hold upon American audiences, recovered its esteem in 1884, when Dr. Damrosch proposed German opera to the directors of the new Metropolitan opera-house.
In one month, September, 1884, he engaged his company, and began the most remarkable series of operatic performances ever held in this country.
The company comprised some of the greatest artists of the German opera-houses, and, in contrast with the hitherto prevailing mode, every part, even the smallest, was carefully presented. Twelve of the operas performed were comparative novelties, the most important of which were Wagner's "Tann-häuser," "Lohengrin," and 'r"Die Walküre," and Beethoven's "Fidelio." This proved to be Dr.
Damrosch's last effort. He conducted every performance except during the last week of his life, when he took a severe cold, from which he never recovered. His musical compositions include several violin concertos "" and some identified with the title "Festival Overture." He had thorough command over the modern resources of instrumentation, and his musical ideas are characterized by great mo-tility and refinement. His violin compositions are prized by violinists as valuable additions to the literature of that instrument. It was as a conductor, however, that he gained his greatest celebrity. He possessed strong personal magnetism, united with power to impart his ideas, which made him an ideal conductor. His aim was always to produce every means of composition. Through his gentle bearing and high culture he gained many warm friends. Never seeking for immediate fame or personal success, he found that high truth which he extended in his art.—His son, Walter Johannes, b. in Bresle, in Jan., 1862, received his musical education chiefly from his father, but also had instruction from other noted musicians. During the great music festival given by Dr. Damrosch in May, 1881, he first acted as conductor in drilling several sections of the large chorus, one in New York, and another in Newark, N. J. The latter, consisting chiefly of members of the Harmonic society, elected him to be their conductor. Under his leadership this society regained its former reputation, and during this time a series of concerts was given, in which such works as Rubinstein's 'Tales of Beulah,' Berlioz's 'Damnation de Faust,' and Verdi's 'Requiem' were performed. He was then only nineteen years of age, but showed marked ability in drilling large masses. During Dr. Damrosch’s last illness his son was suddenly called upon to conduct the German opera, which he did with success, and after his father’s death was appointed to be assistant director and conductor at the Metropolitan opera-house, and also to succeed him as conductor of the Symphony and Oratorio societies. One of his first achievements was the successful performance of “Parsifal,” perhaps the most difficult of Wagner's operas, for the first time in the United States, in March, 1886, by the Oratorio and Symphony societies. During his visit to Europe in the summer of 1886 he was invited by the Deutsche Tonkünstler-Verein, of which Dr. Franz Liszt was president, to conduct some of his father's compositions at Sondershausen, Thuringia. Carl Goldmark's opera “Merlin” was produced for the first time in the United States under his direction, at the Metropolitan opera-house, 3 Jan., 1887.

The death of Andrew, editor, b. in Hinsdale, N. H., 8 Aug., 1819. He is a descendant of Jacob, eldest son of Richard Dana, progenitor of most of those who bear the name in the United States. His boyhood was spent in Buffalo, N. Y., where he worked in a store until he was eighteen years old. At that age he first studied the Latin grammar, and prepared himself for college, entering Harvard in 1838, but after two years a serious trouble with his eyesight compelled him to leave. He received an honorable dismissal, and was afterward given his bachelor's and master's degrees. In 1842 he became a member of the Brook Farm association for agriculture and education, being associated with George and Sophia Ripley, George William Curtis, Nathaniel Hawthorne, Theodore Parker, William Henry Channing, John Sullivan Dwight, Margaret Fuller, and other able writers. His earliest newspaper experience was gained in the management of the “Harbinger,” which was devoted to social reform and general literature. After about two years of editorial work on Elizur Wright's Boston "Chronotype," a daily newspaper, Mr. Dana joined the staff of the New York “Tribune” in 1847. The next year he spent eight months in Europe, and after his return he became one of the proprietors and the managing editor of the “Tribune,” a post which he held until 1 April, 1862. The extraordinary increase and circulation attained by that newspaper during the ten years preceding the civil war was in a degree due to the development of Mr. Dana's genius for journalism. This remark applies not only to the making of the “Tribune” as a newspaper, but also to the management of Col. John W. Foster's Union writers, and to the steadiness of its policy as the leading organ of anti-slavery sentiment. The great struggle of the “Tribune” under Greeley and Dana was not so much for the overthrow of slavery where it already existed, as against the further spread of the institution over unoccupied territory, and the acquisition of slave-holding countries outside of the Union. It was not less firm in its resistance of the designs of the slave-holding interest than wise in its attitude toward the extremists and impracticals at the north. In the “Tribune's” opposition to the attempt to break down the Missouri compromise and to carry slavery into Kansas and Nebraska, and in the development and organization of that popular sentiment which gave birth to the Republican party and led to the election of Abraham Lincoln in 1860, Mr. Dana bore no unimportant part. Writing of the political situation in 1854, Henry Wilson says, in his “Rise and Fall of the Slave Power”:

At the outset, Mr. Greeley was hopeful and seemed disinclined to enter the contest. He told his associates that he would not restrain them, but, as for himself, he had no heart for the strife. They were more hopeful; and Richard Hildreth, the historian, Charles A. Dana, the veteran journalist, James S. Pierson, and other able writers, opened and continued a powerful opposition in its columns, and did very much to rally and reassure the friends of freedom and to nerve them for the fight.” In 1861 Mr. Dana went to Albany to advance the cause of Mr. Greeley as a candidate for the U. S. Senate, and nearly succeeded in nominating him. The caucus was about equally divided between Mr. Greeley's friends and those of Mr. Evarts, while Ira Harris had a few votes which held the balance of power, and, at the instigation of Thurlow Weed, the supporters of Mr. Evarts went over to Mr. Harris. The first year of the war the ideas of Mr. Greeley and those of Mr. Dana in regard to the proper conduct of military operations were somewhat at variance; and this disagreement resulted in the resignation of Mr. Dana, after fifteen years’ service on the “Tribune.” First appointed to a seat at once occupied by Secretary Stanton in special work of importance for the war department, and in 1863 was appointed assistant secretary of war, which office he held until after the surrender of Lee. His duties as the representative of the civil authority at the scene of military operations brought him into close personal relations with Mr. Stanton and Mr. Lincoln, who were accustomed to depend much upon his accurate perception and just estimates of men and measures for information of the actual state of affairs at the front. At the time when Gen. Grant's character and probable usefulness were unknown quantities, Mr. Dana's confidence in his military ability probably did much to defeat the powerful effort then making to break down the rising commander. Of this critical period Gen. Sherman remarks in his "Memoirs": "One day early in April, 1863, I was up at Grant's headquarters [at Vicksburg], and we talked over all these things with absolute freedom. Charles A. Dana, assistant secretary of war, was there, and Wilson, Rawlins, Frank Blair, McPherson, etc. We all knew what was notorious, that Gen. McClellan was intriguing against Gen. Grant, in hopes to regain the command. Of the whole expedition, and that others were raising clamors against Grant in the newspapers of the north. Even Mr. Lincoln and Gen. Halleck seemed to be shaken; but at no instant did we (his personal friends) slacken in our loyalty to him." Mr. Dana was in the front line of the campaign of the Mississippi and Vicksburg, the rescue of Chattanooga, and the marches and battles of Virginia in 1864 and 1865. After the war his services were sought by the proprietors of the "Sun" newspaper, and he accepted the editor's offer. His criticisms of civil administration during Gen. Grant's term as president led to a notable attempt on the part of that administration, in July, 1873, to take him from New York on a charge of libel, to be tried without a jury in a Washington police court. Application was made to the court by a district attorney of New York for a warrant of removal; but in a memorable decision Judge Blatchford, now a justice of the supreme court of the United States, refused the warrant, holding the proposed form of trial to be unconstitutional. Perhaps to a greater extent than in the case of any other conspicuous journalist, Mr. Dana's personality is identified in the public mind with the newspaper that he edited. He has recorded no theories of journalism other than those of common sense and human interest. He is impelled of prolixity, cant, and the conventional standards of news importance. Mr. Dana's first book was a volume of stories translated from the German, entitled "The Black Ant" (New York and Leipzig, 1848). In 1853 he planned and edited, with George Ripley, the "New American Cyclopaedia," which contains the best minor poems of the English language," was first published in 1857, and has passed through many editions, the latest, thoroughly revised, being of 1884. He has also edited, with Rossiter Johnson, "Fifty Perfect Poems" (New York, 1880).

DANA, James, clergyman, b. in Cambridge, Mass., 11 May, 1739; d. in New Haven, Conn., 18 Aug., 1812. He was a nephew of Richard, and descendant through Caleb, second son of Daniel, who was the youngest son of Richard Dana. He was graduated at Harvard in 1756, and remained in the college as a resident graduate for several years, studying theology and general literature. In October, 1758, he was ordained and made pastor of the Congregational church in Wallingford, Conn., succeeding the Rev. Samuel Whittelsey. After he had accepted this call, the conscription prohibited his ordination: but the church and society, together with Mr. Dana, persisted in their action. Subsequently the conscription pronounced a sentence of non-communion against them, and declared the ministers and delegates of the ordaining council to be "disorderly persons, and not to sit in any of our ecclesiastical councils until they shall clear up their conduct to the satisfaction of the consocation of New Haven county." The controversy was essentially between the "Old-Light" and the "New-Light" parties. Mr. Dana was regarded as a partizan of the former. He was at Boston, and the ministers forming the consocation of New Haven were little disposed to have one of their prominent churches committed to the care of a pastor whom they considered as having departed from their own standard of Christian doctrine. Mr. Dana and the ordaining clergy then formed an association by themselves, which continued until about 1772, when the controversy was terminated by pacific overtures made by the ministers then constituting the consocation. It is evident that the ordination of Mr. Dana at Saybrook platform, because the ordaining council was not limited to the consocation. It was tantamount to an assertion of independence of the church, in disregard of the platform. The members of the council were regarded as inclining to Arminianism. However, the prejudice against Mr. Dana gradually disappeared, and he made himself very popular by the decided stand that he took in favor of the American cause in the events that led to the Revolution. His patriotic sermons, delivered in New Haven while the legislature was in session, were effective in his favor. In 1779 he became pastor of the first church in New Haven, and was installed on 29 April. Here he came into controversy with Jonathan Edwards and Samuel Austin; but, for the most part, his ministry was peaceful, though not eminently successful. He was succeeded in this pastorate by the Rev. Moses Stuart in 1805, but his relation was severed only by an ecclesiastical council. This procedure deeply wounded Dr. Dana, and thereafter he worshipped in the college chapel, although subsequent to Mr. Stuart's departure he again appeared in his old church and officiated as moderator at the installation of Dr. N. W. Taylor in April, 1812. The University of Edinburgh conferred on him the degree of D. D. in 1798. He published, besides memorial and other sermons, "Examination of Ed-ward Coke's Awards on the Wills in 1800," 1803, and "An Examination of the Same Continued" (New Haven, 1773).—His son, Samuel Whittlesey, senator, b. in Wallingford, Conn., 13 Feb., 1790; d. in Middletown, 21 July, 1830, was graduated at Yale in 1775, and became a distinguished lawyer. He was elected to Congress as a Federalist, and, with subsequent re-elections, served from 3 Jan., 1797, till 1 May, 1810, when he was selected as U. S. senator to succeed James Hillhouse. He remained in the senate until 3 March, 1821, and afterward made his home in Middletown, where for many years he was mayor.

Dana, James Dwight, mineralogist, b. in Utica, N. Y., 12 Feb., 1813. He was attracted to New Haven by the reputation of Prof. Benjamin Silliman, under whose guidance many of the graduates of Yale, who afterwards became prominent leaders in American science received their earliest training. He was graduated in 1833 and appointed instructor of mathematics to midshipmen in the U. S. navy, and in this capacity visited the seaports of France, Italy, Greece, and Turkey, while on the "Delaware" and the "United States." In 1836-8 he was assistant in chemistry to Prof. Silliman. Meanwhile, in December, 1836, he was appointed mineralogist and geologist to the U. S. exploring expedition, then about to be sent by the government of the United States to the Southern and Pacific oceans under the command of Capt. Charles Wilkes. The expedition sailed in August, 1838, and Mr. Dana was on board the "Peacock" until it was wrecked on a sand-bar at the mouth of Columbia river. In June, 1842, after an absence of three years and ten months, Mr. Dana returned home. Besides the mineralogy and geology, he had under his supervision the zoological departments, including the crustacea and corals. During the thirteen years that followed he was occupied principally in studying the material that he had collected, making drawings, and preparing the reports for publication. From 1848 till 1844 he resided in Washington, and then removed to New Haven, where he married Henrietta Frances, third daughter of Prof. Silliman, and has since continued to reside. The results of his labors were given in his "Reports on Zoophytes" (4to, with an atlas of 61 folio plates, 1846), in which he proposed a new classification, and described 230 new species; the "Report on the Geology of the Pacific" (4to, with an atlas of 21 plates, 1849); and the "Report on Crustacea" (4to, with an atlas of 96 folio plates, 1852-4). These were published by the government in Washington, and only 100 copies of each were issued. With few exceptions, the drawings in the atlases were made by Mr. Dana himself. He was appointed Silliman professor of natural history and geology at Yale in 1850, and entered on the administration of the chair in 1853. The subsequent delivery of the lectures on natural history by others led to a change in the title of the professorship, in 1864, to that of geology and mineralogy. Prof. Dana became, about 1850, associate editor of the "American Journal of Science and Arts," founded by the elder Silliman in 1819. Subsequently, to the death of Prof. Silliman he became its senior editor, and now, in conjunction with his son, Edward S. Dana, continues its publication. In 1872 the Geological society of London conferred on him its Wollaston medal, and in 1877 he received the Copley gold medal from the Royal society of London. He is a member of scientific societies in the United States and abroad, including the Royal society of London, the Institute of France, the Royal academy of the Lincei of Rome, the Royal academies of Berlin, Vienna, and many others. He is one of the original members of the National academy of sciences in the United States. Prof. Dana was elected president of the American association for the advancement of science in 1854, and in August of the following year delivered an address at the Providence meeting. In 1872, on the celebration of the fourth centennial of the University of Munich, he received the degree of Ph. D., and in 1886, at the Harvard celebration, the degree of LL.D. was conferred upon him. His contributions to the "American Journal of Science and Arts," to the "Proceedings of the American Academy," to the "Transactions of the Lyceum of Natural History of New York," and to the "Proceedings of the Academy of Natural sciences of Philadelphia," include hundreds of titles. His works in this and other fields, besides those of his son, Edward S. Dana, make a mine of geological and biological information. Dr. Dana is a member of many scientific societies, and in 1884 was elected a member of the National academy of sciences. In 1885 he was made a trustee of the Peabody museum of science and art, and was re-elected in 1889. He has contributed to many scientific journals in the United States and Europe, and has published "Appendix II." (1875) and "Appendix III." (1883) of Dana's "System of Mineralogy"; "Text-Book of Mineralogy" (New York, 1877); and "Text-Book of Mechanics" (1881).

Dana, Joseph, clergymam, b. in Pomfret, Conn., 2 Nov., 1742; d. in Ipswich, Mass., 16 Nov., 1827. He was a grandson of Benjamin, the third son of Richard, the progenitor of all that bear the name in the United States, who, according to the family tradition, was the son of a French Huguenot that settled in England in 1629. Joseph was graduated at Yale in 1769, studied theology, and was ordained on 7 Nov., 1765, minister of the South society of Ipswich, over which he presided for sixty-two years. Many of his occasional discourses were published by Samuel Thorne, physician, b. in Marblehead, Mass., 6 June, 1827, studied under his father, Samuel, who was minister of Marblehead, and in the academy of that town, attended medical lectures at Harward, was graduated M. D. in 1850, and during the three following years studied medicine in New York city, Dublin, and Paris. In 1853 he settled in Portland, and gave special attention to diseases of the heart and lungs. He was one of the founders of the Portland school of medical instruction, and of the Maine general hospital, of which he has been attending physician since its opening in 1875. In 1813, when he was a student at Bowdoin college, and in 1861-'9 of the theory and practice of medicine in the Medical school of Maine, connected with Bowdoin college. This chair he resumed in 1880. He has contributed to professional literature papers on the use of the stethoscope in determining the position of the febrile, on aspiration, and on defective drainage and sepsis; and has published various addresses. He also prepared the articles on "Dropsey" and "Inflammation of the Intestines" in Wood's "Reference Book of Medical Science." The two sisters of Dr. Dana married Seth Ames, where he resided, and William R. Lawrence. Israel Thorndike was his uncle.—Samuel, nephew of Joseph, clergyman, b. in Cambridge (now Brighton), Mass., 14 Jan., 1739; d. in Amherst, N. H., 1 April, 1798, was graduated at Harvard, 1755, having among his classmates John Adams and Tristram Dalton, after which he studied theology. In 1761 the town of Groton invited him to become their minister * with a settlement of $300, a salary of $50, and firewood not to exceed thirty cords per annum. He declined the offer, and enters the army. Subsequently, he was called to the bar, and on 3 June as successor to Caleb Trowbridge. During the troubles that preceded the Revolutionary war, believing that resistance would lead to greater evils than were then endured, he used his influence on the side of non-resistance. This course gave great offence to his parishes, who prevented him from entering the meeting-house, although the whig committee of Groton published a card to the effect that Mr. Dana had fully atoned for his offences. The good will of his people had become alienated, and his dismissal soon followed. He continued to reside in Groton, and in 1790 was admitted to the bar and practised in Amherst, N. H., where in 1787 he was made judge of probate for Hillsborough county, and in 1798 was state senator.—His son, Samuel, lawyer, b. in Groton, Mass., 26 June, 1767; d. in Charlestown, 20 Nov., 1825. He was graduated at Harvard, 1791, and was selected for the profession in Charlestown, where he and Timothy Bigelow were professional and political rivals, Mr. Dana being a Jeffersonian democrat, and Mr. Bigelow a federalist. In his speeches at the bar he was smooth, gentle, and insinuating, as Mr. Bigelow was bold, rapid, and vehement. He filled various local offices, was a member of the Massachusetts senate, and its president for eight years, and served in congress from 22 Sept., 1814, to 3 March, 1815. Subsequently he received the appointment of chief justice of the circuit court of common pleas. —James Freeman, nephew of Samuel and grandson of Samuel, chemist, b. in Amherst, N. H., 23 Sept., 1798; d. in New York city, 14 April, 1827. He was graduated at Harvard in 1813, and at the medical department in 1817. He studied with Dr. Joseph Lea, and developed such ability that in 1815 he was selected by the physician to procure for the chemical laboratory a new outfit of apparatus. For this purpose he visited London, where for six months he worked in the laboratory of Friedrich Christian Accum. On his return to the United States he settled in Cambridge, where he practised medicine and was appointed assistant to the chair in chemistry. In 1817 he was invited to lecture on chemistry at Dartmouth, and in 1820 became the first professor of chemistry and mineralogy in that institution. He was chosen president of the college of physicians and surgeons in New York in 1825, and continued as such until his death. While a student in Cambridge, he received the Boylston prize for a dissertation on the "Tests for Arsenic," and again in 1817 received the same prize for an essay on the "Cures for Abscess." He contributed numerous scientific memoirs to Silliman's "American Journal of Science" and to the "Annals of the New York Lyceum of Natural History." His larger works are, with his brother, "Outlines of Mineralogy and Geology of Boston and its Vicinity" (Boston, 1838); and "The Chemical Philosophy" (Concord, N. H., 1825).—His brother, Samuel Luther, chemist, b. in Amherst, N. H., 11 July, 1785; d. in Lowell, Mass., 11 March, 1868. He studied at Phillips Exeter academy, and graduated at Harvard in 1818. Desirous of pursuing a military life, he applied for an appointment to the U. S. military academy, but instead was commissioned a lieutenant in the 1st artillery. He served during the war in New York and Virginia, and at its close resigned from the army. Subsequently he was recalled to Harvard, where he was graduated at Harvard medical school in 1818. From 1819 till 1826 he practised in Waltham, Mass., where he was brought into intimate relations with the early cotton manufacturers of the state, and his fondness for physical sciences determined him to devote his attention to chemistry as applied to the manufacture and coloring of cotton goods. About 1826 he established a laboratory in Waltham for the manufacture of sulphuric acid and bleaching-salts, which afterward was merged in the Newton chemical company, and he was its chemist until 1844. Napoleon Jackson Tecumseh, nephew of Samuel Luther and James Freeman, soldier, b. in Fort Sullivan, Eastport, Me., 15 April, 1822. He was graduated from Bowdoin in 1845, and was afterward appointed in the 7th infantry as second lieutenant, served on garrison duty in the south-west. During the Mexican war he served with distinction, and was present at many of the important engagements, being severely wounded in storming the entrenched camp of Cerro Gordo. He became captain on the staff and assistant quartermaster in March, 1845, and until 1855 served in garrison duty, principally in Minnesota.

From 1855 till 1861 he was a banker in St. Paul, Minn., and was brigadier-general of the militia from 1857 till 1861. During the civil war he accompanied the 1st Minnesota infantry as colonel to the front, becoming brigadier-general of volunteers in February, 1862, and attached to the Army of the Potomac. He served in the battles before Richmond, Antietam, and Fredericksburg. He commanded a brigade in Gen. John Sedgwick's division of Gen. Edwin V. Sumner's corps, and was severely wounded. He was commissioned major-general of volunteers in November, 1862, and was in command of the defences of Philadelphia during the invasion of Pennsylvania by the Confederate army in 1863. Afterward he joined the Army of the Gulf, and commanded the expedition by sea to the Rio Grande, landing at Brazos Santiago, and driving the Confederate forces as far as Laredo, Texas. He then successively commanded the army corps, the district of Vicksburg, the 16th army corps, the districts of west Tennessee and Vicksburg, and finally the Department of the Mississippi. In May, 1865, he resigned from the army and engaged in mining operations in the western states. From 1866 to 1871 he was general agent of the American-Russian commercial company of San Francisco, in Alaska and Washington, after which he became superintendent of railroads in Illinois, and in 1878 of the Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy railroad.

DANA, Judah, senator, b. in Pomfret, Conn., 25 April, 1797. He was the eldest son of Benja-mom, the mother was the eldest daughter of Gen. Israel Putnam. His father, John Winchester, and the Rev.

Joseph, of Ipswich, were both grandsons of Benjamin, the third son of Richard. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1789, studied law, and began practice, in 1798, in Fryeburg, then in Massachusetts. He was government attorney for Oxford county in 1803-7, judge of probate in 1811-22, judge of the court of common pleas from 1811 till 1823, judge of the circuit court, a delegate to the convention that framed the state constitution in Maine in 1819, and in 1823 was elected a member of the executive council. He was an adherent of the democratic party, and, on the resignation of Ether Shepley, was appointed U. S. senator, serving from 21 Dec., 1836, till 3 March, 1837.—His son, John Winchester, of Maitland, Me., was b. in Jan., 1808; d. near Rosario, New Grenada, 22 Dec., 1867. He was for many years an active democratic politician in Maine, and from 1847 till 1850 was governor of the state. In 1833 he went to Bolivia as chargé d'affaires, was commissioned minister resident on 29 June, 1834, and held that post till 10 March, 1839. In 1861 he was again a candidate for governor of Maine, but was defeated. Soon afterward he went to South America, where he resided at the time of his death.

DANA, Stephen Winchester, clergyman, b. in Canaan, N. Y., 17 Nov., 1840. He was the son of a Congregational clergyman, and descended in the eighth generation from Richard, through Benjamin, the third son. He was graduated at Williams in 1861, taught in Hinsdale, Mass., for two years, and then studied theology in the Union theological seminary of New York in 1865, where he was afterward appointed in the 7th infantry as second lieutenant, served on garrison duty in the southwest. During the Mexican war he served with distinction, and was present at many of the important engagements, being severely wounded in storming the entrenched camp of Cerro Gordo. He became captain on the staff and assistant quartermaster in March, 1845, and until 1855 served in garrison duty, principally in Minnesota.

DANA, Richard, jurist, b. in Cambridge, Mass., 7 July, 1699; d. 17 May, 1772. He was the third son of Daniel, who was the son of Richard, who came from England, settled in Cambridge in 1640, and died there about 1695. He was graduated at Harvard in 1718, studied law, practised in Marblehead and Charlestown, and then removed to Boston and became one of the leaders of the bar of Massachusetts. During the critical period of the Revolution he took a prominent part in the protests against the new and oppressive taxes imposed by the British parliament and the appointment of highly paid crown officials, and was a leader in the popular resistance to the usurpations of the British government. In Dec., 1745,czasado in the Boston town-meetings between 1768 and 1772, was chairman of the committee chosen by the town in 1765 to give instructions to the representatives in the general court with reference to the stamp-act and other new taxes, for the collection of which revenue officers had been sent over from England, and reported the instructions to the representatives of Boston on 20 Nov., 1767, and 8 May, 1770. He was a member of the association of the Sons of Liberty, and at the meeting of 17 Dec., 1769, administered to Andrew Oliver, secretary of the province, an oath bidden him not to execute the stamp-act. After the British soldiers fired on the people in the night of 5 March, 1770, he was appointed on a committee to investigate the incidents of the massacre and the order in which they occurred. He took down the remarks of the citizens who had heard threats from the soldiers some days previous to the tragedy, and who swore that the soldiers under Capt. Preston attacked the citizens with violence; that after some of the latter had been struck, young men and boys returned abusive language, and some threatened the soldiers with fire at the soldiers; that these fired into the crowd, killing and mortally wounding several persons, when there was no danger to themselves; and that therefore the firing could not have been in self-defence, and was unjustifiable. (See Attucks, Crispus.) Mr. Dana was at one time during the ante-Revolutionary crisis a representative from Boston in the assembly, but he generally declined office, devoting himself exclusively to his profession, except when the call of patriotism impelled him to take a public stand in the cause of liberty. The letters of leading patriots contain mention of him as a man of great value in the movement, and of his death as a serious loss to the cause. He was in the head of the Boston bar, and is more frequently cited in Judge Story’s work on American precedents than any other pleader except Judge Trowbridge, whose sister he married in 1797. — His son, Francis, jurist, b. in Charlestown, Mass., 18 June, 1749; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 23 April, 1811, was graduated at Harvard in 1762, studied law with Edmund Trowbridge, then regarded as the ablest lawyer in the province, was admitted to the bar in 1767, and practiced in Boston. He devoted himself early to the cause of colonial rights and popular liberty, joined the association of Sons of Liberty, in whose discussions he took a leading part, and became an active whig.
In 1769 he was counsel in the famous Lechmere slave case. In 1773 he was associated with John Adams in the prosecution in behalf of the Rhode Island patriots in the matter of the Rome and Moffatt, captured by the British ship Venus. On 1 June, 1774, the Boston bar sent an address to the retiring governor, which Dana, though one of the youngest of them, opposed with vigor. In September, 1774, he was the delegate from Cambridge to the 1st provincial congress of Massachusetts. In the beginning of April, 1775, he sailed for England (where his brother Edmund was settled as a minister at Wroxeter), bearing confidential letters on the critical state of colonial feeling from Josiah Quincy, Joseph Warren, Dr. Samuel Cooper, and other patriots. The next year, about 20 April, his brother, who was allied by marriage with the Kinnard and Pulteney families, came in contact with persons of politi-ic influence in England, and in April, 1776, after his return, he informed Washington that there was no reason to expect peace from Britain. While in England he began a correspondence with Richard Price, and furnished him with information which he embodied in his work in defence of the colonies (London, 1776). In May, 1776, he was chosen by the Massachusetts assembly a member of the executive council, which united executive with legislative functions, and was re-elected annually until 1780. In November, 1776, he was chosen a delegate from Massachusetts to the continental congress, and took part in framing the articles of confederation, and was again sent to the congress of 1778, and took charge of the committee charged with the reorganization of the army. He remained in the camp at Valley Forge with Joseph Reed, Governneur Morris, and other members of the committee from January till April, 1778, and, in consultation with Gen. Washington, drew up the plan of annual drafts that was submitted to congress, and then returned to the commander-in-chief on 4 June, with directions that he should proceed with it, with the advice and assistance of Messrs. Reed and Dana, or either of them. He served with Gouverneur Morris and William H. Drayton on the committee to the treaty negotiated with England, which he was furnished in 1778, on whose report these overtures were unanimously rejected, and the intended effect of the peace commission frustrated. Gov. Johnstone, with whom he had become acquainted in England, was one of the commission, and wrote to him in the hope of securing his co-operation. This letter, with others received by Reed and Robert Morris, was transmitted to congress on 18 July.
On 29 Sept., 1779, Mr. Dana was appointed secretary to the embassy of John Adams, who was appointed commissioner to negotiate treaties of peace and commerce with Great Britain. He was dep-utyed to Mr. Adams, on 13 Nov., 1779, in the French frigate “Sensible.” They landed at Ferrol, Spain, and reached Paris 9 Feb., 1780. When Adams, in conse-quency of a diplomatic quarrel with Vergennes, left Paris for Amsterdam on 27 July, Dana remained in Paris until the commission of congress (to Mr. Adams, and eventually to himself, to raise loans in Europe) reached him on 12 Sept. He then joined Adams in Amsterdam, and remained with him till December. Returning to Paris, he received, on 15 March, 1781, a commission from Congress as minister to the court of St. Petersburg, having been appointed to that post on 18 Dec., 1780. He remained with Mr. Adams in Holland from April till 7 July, when he left for St. Petersburg, journeying by way of Frankfort and Berlin. He resided at the Russian court two years, where he had frequent and friendly communications with Count Ostermann, the foreign minister, but was unable to secure the recognition of the independence of the United States. When, even after the signature of the preliminaries of peace, the government of the Emperor required a minister to receive him as an accredited minister of an independent and friendly power, he asked for his leave from congress, and departed from St. Petersburg on 4 Sept., 1783, sailing direct to Boston, where he arrived in December. In January, 1784, he was elected by the assembly a delegate to the continental congress, took his seat on 24 May, and was appointed to represent Massachusetts on the committee of the states, which was vested with some of the powers of congress during the recess, and continued in session till 11 Aug. On 16 Jan., 1785, Gov. Hancock appointed him a justice of the supreme court of Massachusetts. On 29 Aug., 1786, he was elected a delegate to the Annapolis convention, which fixed the time and place for the Federal convention of 1787 that adopted the constitution of the United States. He was also elected a delegate to this body on 9 April, 1787, but was prevented from attending by his judicial duties and the state of his health, which had been impaired by his residence in St. Petersburg. He was chosen a member of the Massachusetts state convention that met in January, 1788, to ratify the Federal constitution. In that body, on whose decision depended the fate of the Federal constitution, a majority of the members were at first opposed to the new form of government. Judge Dana labored secure the ratification of the constitution with John Hancock, Theophilus Parsons, and others, and aided in obtaining a majority for its adoption on 6 Feb., 1788. On 29 Nov., 1791, after the death of Judge Sargent, he was appointed chief justice of Massachusetts, and held that office for fifteen years, during which he took no active part in affairs, except as a presidential elector in 1792 and 1800. On 5 June, 1797, President Adams appointed him a special envoy to the French republic, with Cotesworth Pinckney and John Marshall; but he was compelled, by the precarious state of his health, to decline the appointment, which was given to Elbridge Gerry. He retired from the bench in 1806, and was succeeded by his friend, Theophilus Parsons. He vigorously opposed Jeferson’s embargo in public speeches at Cambridge, but seldom took part after that in public discussions. He was one of the founders of the Ameri-Can academy of arts and sciences, and interested himself in enterprises for the benefit of the neighborhood of Boston. After his retirement he was frequently visited at his house by the old leaders of the Federal party who had been his associates in political life, and entertained the younger literary society of Cambridge. Judge Dana possessed a large fortune, chiefly in lands. He was a typical representative of the Federal gentry of New England, who looked upon themselves as the guardians of the people, and sought to preserve distinctions of birth and station. He possessed a high sense of honor and of public duty, was ardent and passionate in temperament, intolerant of timid or temporizing measures, of an active and energetic character, remarkable for his nervous and impressive eloquence, an acute and learned jurist, and an austere and dignified magistrate.

—Richard Henry, son of Francis, b. in Cambridge, Mass., 15 Nov., 1787; d. in Boston, 2 Feb., 1870, entered Harvard in the class of 1806, but took part in an insurrection of his class against the faculty, known as the "Rotten Cabbage Rebellion," in 1807. The memory of this disturbance is still commemorated in the name of the "Rebellion tree," standing on the college grounds. As a consequence of this revolt, he failed to complete his college course, although an excellent scholar; but fifty-eight years later he received his degree as of 1808. Removing to Newport, R. I., he continued his studies there for two years, then entered the law-office of his cousin, Francis Dana Channing, at Boston, and afterward went to Baltimore, Md., to familiarize himself with Maryland practice in the office of Robert Goodloe Harper. He was admitted to the Massachusetts bar in 1811, and settled in Cambridge, where he engaged in politics on the Federal side, and became a member of the legislature. In 1814 he joined the Anthology club, an association of gentlemen in Cambridge and Boston, including William Tudor, John Quincy Adams, and others, who had for some time conducted "The Monthly Anthology," an unsuccessful magazine. They now projected and began to issue "The North American Review," the first number of which appeared in May, 1815. Mr. Dana's first publications appeared in that periodical; among them were an "Essay on Old Times," and a criticism of Hazlitt's "Lectures on the English Poets," in which the writer boldly ventured to dispute the English critics' opinions. He also gave cordial recognition to Wordsworth's poems, an act of temerity which, in the then reigning taste for Pope, brought condemnation upon him. His association with Prof. N. T. Channing in the editorship of the "Review" was brought to a close in 1821. In 1821-2 he published in New York, in six numbers, with the aid of contributions from Bryant and Allston, "The Idle Man," a miscellany of stories, essays, criticisms, and poems, which had marked literary merit, but received little encouragement from the public, and was discontinued. His first poem, "The Dying Raven," written when he was thirty-eight years old, appeared in the "New York Review," then edited by Bryant. He brought out his first volume of "Poems" in Boston in 1827, which was well received by the critics and found a limited audience. Prof. John Wilson, in "Blackwood's Magazine," said of the leading poem: "We pronounce it by far the most powerful and original of American poetical compositions." In 1833 "Poems and Prose Writings" (Boston) was issued, containing additional poems and Dana's own contributions to "The Idle Man." A portion of this was republished in London in 1844 as "The Bucceaneer, and other Poems." Although his father had been a Unitarian, the son joined the Congregationalists in 1826, and wrote vigorously against Dr. Channing in "The Spirit of the Pilgrims" during the Trinitarian agitation in New England from 1825 till 1833. Subsequently he became an Episcopalian. In 1850 he brought out a new edition of "Poems and Prose Writings" in two volumes, including his essays and literary papers from the "North American Review," forming a complete collection of his works. His further literary efforts were confined to a course of lectures on Shakespeare, which he delivered in Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, in 1839-40. The larger part of his career was spent in retirement from literary work, at his country-seat on Cape Ann (see illustration), and in Boston. For the first fifty years of his life he was an invalid, but after this he lived in health, and for a much longer time he was not only physically well, but maintained an intellectual vigor that remained unimpaired until within a few days of his death at the age of ninety-two. He had lived through the whole history of the United States under the constitution, and distinctly remembered the death of Washington. He was the last of his generation to achieve success in both prose and verse, and won high rank among the most vigorous American authors of the first half of the present century. He never became a popular writer, and his poetry is now little read; but it evinced decided qualities of imagination, reflection, and independence, without any noticeable gift of melody. His prose stories, "Tom Thornton" and "Paul Felton," are gloomy in tone, but show vivid imagination and contain brief passages of great excellence. His essay on Keans' acting, in "The Idle Man," and other of his critical essays, prove that he possessed a delicate, firm faculty of original criticism which, at the time when he wrote, was rare in the United States; and his place in the history of our literature should be measured by the important service that a mind like his was able to render in the general cultivation of public taste during the formative period. See "Homes of American Authors."
DANA

(New York, 1855), and "Bryant and his Friends" (1886).—His son, Richard Henry, lawyer, b. in Cambridge, Mass., 1 Aug., 1815; d. in Rome, Italy, 7 Jan., 1863, was, as he himself wrote, one who had a strong passion for the sea, and, had he consulted his inclination only, he would have entered the American navy. But, influenced by his father and other members of the family, he became a student of Harvard university. Here he was exposed to one of those difficulties which college faculties put in the way of students by their mismanagement, and Dana, like his father, was rusticated.
Returning to Harvard, he was compelled to suspend his studies by an affection of the eyes, finally graduating in 1837. In the mean time, for remedy, recalling his early love of the sea, he resolved to rough it on a Pacific voyage as a sailor, although he had, of course, every facility for ordinary travel.
He accordingly shipped before the mast as a seman on the brig "Pilgrim," of Boston, for a voyage round Cape Horn to the western coast of North America. During the cruise Dana performed with cheerfulness and spirit the duties of a common sailor, which he bore handsomely described in his well-known work, "Two Years Before the Mast." The man-script was sent, in 1838, by the elder Dana to Bryant, who offered it to various New York publishers, and at last, to the Harpers, who, with great pride, said it was as good as "Robinson Crusoe," sold it to the Harpers for $250.
The work was issued in early life, passing through numerous editions, being reprinted in England, where the Board of admiralty adopted it for distribution in the navy, and translated into several continental languages. This personal narrative of a sailor's life at sea, which is at once truthful and accurate work of its character ever published. "In reading it," says Mr. Whipple, "anybody can see it is more than an ordinary rec-cord of a voyage, for there runs through the simple and lucid narrative an element of beauty and power which gives it the charm of romance." The work was republished in 1869, with an additional chapter giving an account of a second visit to California, and of some of the persons and vessels mentioned in the original edition. Mr. Dana studied law under Judge Story, and was admitted to the bar of Massaechusetts in 1840, speedily attaining eminence as an advocate. In 1841 he published a work on seausages and laws, under the title of "The Sea-man's Friend," which has been reprinted in England as the "Seaman's Manual," and in 1859 an account of a vacation trip, entitled "The Cuba Trip or the Cuban Back." (Boston). He occasionally contributed to the "North American Review," the "Law Register," and the "American Law Review," and he prepared biographical sketches of his kinsmen, Prof.
Edward Channing and Washington Allston.
During the years 1859-70, he wrote articles round the world. Six years later, by request of the family of the late Henry Wheaton, he engaged in the preparation of a new edition of Wheat-ton's "International Law" (Boston, 1860), bringing up that standard work from 1848, when Mr.
Wheaton died, to the point where he thought he had an opportunity, entailed upon him much subsequent trouble. Some of his original notations were regarded with particular favor, and his notes on the neutrality laws of the United States and Great Britain, by order of our government, to be used by the arbit-trators in 1872. In 1866 Mr. Dana received the degree of LL.D. from Harvard college, and he lectured on international law in the Cambridge law-school in 1866-77. He ran against Gen. Butler in the Essex district in 1868, and was defeated.
This act on his part also led to subsequent annoyance.
In March, 1876, Gen. Grant nominated Mr. Dana minister to England as successor to Gen. Schenck.
At first there was no thought of any opposition, and it was regarded by the public with peculiar favor, but personal and private feelings soon began to exercise their influence. Great opposition to his confirmation arose chiefly through the exertions of Gen. Butler, who had not forgotten Mr. Dana's encouragement against him as a candidate for congress, and of William Wilcox, whose boat was pirated by Mr. Dana had pirated the notes of his edition of "Wheaton's International Law." It is unnecessary to review the dreary details of this literary controversy. Mr. Dana complained that the charges against him were made ex parte before the sen-te committee, while he was at sea. Mr. Dana, several London journals characterizing the affair as "a paltry intrigue," it is sufficient to say that if Mr. Dana erred in the matter, he did so unintentionally. He undoubtedly felt the indignity as deeply as it would be possible for any man to feel it, and if he understood it to be wrong, he paid the penalty.
In 1878 Mr. Dana went abroad for the purpose of pursuing his studies of international law, his intention being to publish an exhaustive work on that subject. He spent much time in Paris, and near the close of 1881 visited Rome. He joined his friend Mr. Channing, among American friends, was taken ill the following day, and died of pneumonia, 7 Jan., 1882. Two days later the beautiful American Episcopal church in the Via Nationale was crowded with his countrymen, assembled to attend his funeral services. His remains were interred in the Protestant cemetery at Porte Pia, near those of the poets Keats and Shelley, and a monument has since been erected to his memory. Mr. Dana was a representative of the best culture of his native state, and had acquired a permanent reputation on both sides of the Atlantic.
He had taken part in many of the most conspicuos litigations of the last half-century, and it is perhaps not too much praise to place him among the great lawyers of the land. His death, following closely on that of Mr. Lawrence, deprived the re-jury of a restrained circle of erudite and polished men. Mr. Dana never had the opportunity of being known in the national councils of the country. Had he obtained a seat in the senate, he would have met there few men with whose superiors in knowledge of public affairs, in comprehension of the principles of statesmanship, or in the ability to engage in their discussion.—Richard Henry, son of the preceding, b. in Cambridge, Mass., 3 Jan., 1831, was graduated at Harvard in 1847, being chosen class orator on law day in 1877. In the same year he received from President Hayes the nomination of secretary of legation at London, but declined the office. He married Miss Edith Longfellow, second daughter of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, the poet, 8 Jan., 1878. While continuing the practice of law, he has been a regular contributor to the "Civil Service Record," besides writing occasionally for the press on questions of political reform.—Another son of Richard Henry, Edmund Trowbridge, b. in Cambridge, Mass., 29 Aug., 1818; d. there, 18 May, 1886, was graduated at the University of Vermont in 1838, and at Cambridge law-school in 1841. Subsequently he practised in partnership with his brother, Richard, in Boston for several years, when failing health compelled him to reside in Europe, where he continued the practice of law, he has been a regular able counsellor, and with his large and diversified experience he became one of the most prominent lawyers of New England. He entered at once into political life, and from 1872 till 1875 was a member of the legislature. In 1875 he was a delegate to the centennial congress, and was continued as such, by re-election until 1878. During his career in the national legislature he rendered much efficient service by his work on committees, and was the framers of the celebrated order of nomenclature. In 1887 he was appointed judge of the court of common pleas for Essex county in 1874, but, after taking the oath of office, almost immediately resigned, and in 1875 was appointed a commissioner to revise the laws of 1811. He was also destined to revise and publish the charters that had been granted in Massachusetts, and in 1812 was selected to make a new publication of the statutes. During the same year he was chosen a presidential elector. He was a delegate to the Hartford convention in 1814, and also to the Massachusetts constitutional convention in 1820, but declined serving on account of deafness. For fifty years he devoted his Sundays to theological studies, excepting during the hours of public worship, reading generally the Scriptures in their original languages. In 1829 he gave $10,000, which increased by $5,000 in 1831, to the foundation of the Dane professorship of law in Harvard law-school, requesting that his friend, Judge Joseph Story, should occupy the chair, which he did until his death. He published "A General Abrudgment and Digest of American Law" (9 vols., Boston, 1831). When the Republic of Colombia was established, he returned to the United States, and gave up his claims for money due for his services, for supplies provided by him for the Revolution of 1816, for expenses incurred by his three ships in the blockade of Cumana in 1821, for the use of his three ships in the blockade of Puerto Cabello and in guarding La Guaya, and for the expenses of a journey to the United States to raise funds for the sloop-of-war "Bolivar." The executive power of Colombia, gave him a vote of thanks, and in 1836 he received a decree that his name should have an honorable place as captain of the navy in the military list of the republic.—His son, Simon Bolivar Daniel Danels, was consul for Venezuela, stationed at Baltimore, Md., for many years.

DANE, Nathan, jurist, b. in Ipswich, Mass., 27 Dec., 1752; d. in Beverly, Mass., 15 Feb., 1835. He was graduated at Harvard in 1776, and, after studying law, was admitted to its practice and settled in Beverly. He was a member of the New England congress in 1787 for the government of the territory northwest of the Ohio. It was adopted without a single alteration, and contains the emphatic statement "that there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said territory." He also incorporated in this ordinance a provision against all laws impairing the obligation of contracts, which the convention that formed the constitution of the United States a few months afterward extended to all the states of the Union by making it a part of that constitution. In 1790 he was elected to the Massachusetts senate, and again elected in 1794 and 1796. He was appointed judge of the court of common pleas for Essex county in 1794, but, after taking the oath of office, almost immediately resigned, and in 1795 was appointed a commissioner to revise the laws of 1811. He was also destined to revise and publish the charters that had been granted in Massachusetts, and in 1812 was selected to make a new publication of the statutes. During the same year he was chosen a presidential elector. He was a delegate to the Hartford convention in 1814, and also to the Massachusetts constitutional convention in 1820, but declined serving on account of deafness. For fifty years he devoted his Sundays to theological studies, excepting during the hours of public worship, reading generally the Scriptures in DANIELS, John Daniel, soldier, b. in Baltimore, Md., in 1786; d. there in 1856. He became a captain in the Colombian navy in 1818, and served the republican cause in South America as commander of a squadron, by fitting out vessels, and by his credit as a rich man. When the Republic of Colombia was established, he returned to the United States, and gave up his claims for money due for his services, for supplies provided by him for the Revolution of 1816, for expenses incurred by his three ships in the blockade of Cumana in 1821, for the use of his three ships in the blockade of Puerto Cabello and in guarding La Guaya, and for the expenses of a journey to the United States to raise funds for the sloop-of-war "Bolivar." The executive power of Colombia, gave him a vote of thanks, and in 1836 he received a decree that his name should have an honorable place as captain of the navy in the military list of the republic.—His son, Simon Bolivar Daniel Danels, was consul for Venezuela, stationed at Baltimore, Md., for many years.

DANE, John Wilson, arctic explorer, b. in Chicago, Ill., 30 Sept., 1849. He received his early education in the common schools of Chicago and Washington, entered the U. S. naval academy in 1866, was graduated in 1870, commissioned as ensign, 12 July, 1871, as master, 27 Sept., 1873, and as lieutenant, 22 March, 1879. He was on a surveying expedition in the North Pacific in the "Portsmouth" in 1873-4, took part in suppressing an insurrection in Honolulu, Hawaii, in 1875, and served on board the "Vandalia" during Gen. Grant's visit to Egypt and the Suez Canal. In 1879 he joined the arctic steamer "Jeannette" at Havre, France, and made the voyage to San Francisco, and thence through Bering straits into the Arctic ocean. The expedition left San Francisco, 8 July, 1879, under command of Lieut. George W. De Long. The vessel was beset in the ice-pack for twenty-two months. Lieut. Danenhower, who was second in command, suffered severely from ophthalmia, and was confined in a dark room most of the time. From the place where the steamer was crushed the party made a retreat for ninety-five days over the ice, dragging the ship's boats, and then sailed in the three boats, but were separated by a gale. The boat that Lieut. Danenhower commanded reached the Lena delta, where the crew were rescued by Tunguses. After landing, 17 Sept., 1881, while waiting for the return of native messengers sent out to find the crew, Danenhower made an ineffectual search on the delta for the crews of the other boats. With his crew he made the journey of 6,000 miles to Orenburg, leaving Engineer Melville to continue the search for the captain and his party, and arrived in the United States in June, 1882. He wrote "The Narrative of the Jeannette" (Boston, 1882).

DANFORTH, Charles, inventor, b. in Massachusetts about 1797; d. in Paterson, N. J., 22 March, 1876. He was educated and spent his early life in New England, where he made investigations into a counter-twister, spinning-engine, and a thriddle-frame. These inventions he successfully introduced, both in the United States and in England. Later he settled in Ramapo, N. Y., and there in vented his cap spinning-frame, and also a bobbin and flyer. About 1800 he removed to Paterson, N. J., where he induced the firm of Godwin, Rogers & Co. to manufacture his spinners, and this led to a large business, which in time embraced other forms of machinery. Mr. Danforth acquired an interest in the firm, which became Charles Danforth & Co., in 1818, with the title of the Danforth Locomotive and Machine Company, of which he was president. He amassed a large fortune, and at the time of his death was considered more familiar with the details of cotton-spinning and manufacturing machinery for that purpose than any other person in the United States.

DANFORTH, George Franklin, jurist, b. in Boston, Mass., 5 July, 1810. He was graduated at Union in 1840, and, after studying law, began practice in Rochester, N. Y., where he was eminently successful, and soon rose to the front rank of the profession. In 1876 he was the republican candidate for judge of the court of appeals of the state of New York, but was defeated by Robert Earl. Two years later he was again nominated for a similar office, and after being elected took his seat on the Supreme Court, in which he held office until 1868. Meanwhile he had also been made a judge of the superior court, and in 1881, with Daniel Gookin, Elisha Cooke, and others, opposed the acts of trade and asserted the charter rights of the country. During the witchcraft delusion in 1892 he showed his correctness of judgment by his firmness with which he condemned the proceedings of the court. His brother, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Framingham, Suffolk, England, in September, 1826; d. in Roxbury, Mass., 19 Nov., 1874, was graduated in 1849 at Harvard, where he was once appointed a tutor and then a professor. In 1840 he was invited by the Rev. Thomas Welde to become—with the Rev. John Eliot, whose numerous missionary engagements interfered with his ministerial labors—colleague pastor of the church in Roxbury. The call was accepted, and he was ordained on 24 Sept., 1850, and continued with this congregation until his death. His sermons were elaborate, judicial, and methodical. He showed great interest in astronomy, publishing a number of almanacs, and also "An Astronomical Description of the Northern Hemisphere," in which he maintained that a comet was a heavenly body moving in accordance with divine laws, and that the appearance was indicative of approaching misfortunes. His other publications are "An Election Sermon" (1670) and "The Cry of Sodom Inquired into, upon occasion of the Arraignment and Condemnation of Benjamin Goad for his Prodigious Villanies" (1674).—John, son of Samuel, clergyman, b. in Roxbury, Mass., 8 Nov., 1690; d. in Dorchester, 20 May, 1750, was graduated at Harvard in 1777, and was for some time a fellow in that university. On 28 June, 1692, he was ordained as pastor of the Congregational society in Dorchester, and he continued with this charge until his death, receiving as his colleague the Rev. Jonathan Bowman in 1729. Mr. Danforth was a man of great learning, possessed an uncommon acquaintance with literature, and had a taste for poetry. He published a "Sermon at the Departure of the Rev. Joseph Lord and his Church for Dorchester, S. C." (1697); "The Right Christian Temper in every Condition, endeavored (as the Lord much desired to assist) to be brought forth and recommended" (1702); "The Vile Profanations of Prosperity by the Degenerate among the People of God"; "Fast Sermon at Boston" (1708); "The Blackness of Sins against Light, or Men's offering subsequent became partner in a bank-note engraving firm, was in 1850 merged into an American bank-note company, of which corporation he was vice-president at the time of his death. His work was characterized by extraordinary finish and exquisite delicacy of tint.

DANFORTH, Thomas, colonial governor, b. in Framingham, Suffolk, England, 1622; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 5 Nov., 1699. He was the eldest son of Nicholas Danforth, and came with his father and brother, Samuel, to New England in 1634. Soon after his arrival in this country he acquired great influence in the management of public affairs. Bancroft speaks of him as the probable author of the report on natural and chartered rights, made by Simon Bradstreet, Increase Mather, John Norton, and others, in 1661. From 1650 till 1678 he was an assistant under the Massachusetts government, becoming in 1679 deputy governor. In the latter year he was elected president of the province of Maine, then independent of the colony of Massachusetts. He opened his court at York, and granted several parcels of land. The offices of deputy governor and president were held by him until the act of Union of 1664."

Violence to their Knowledge, a Sermon" (1710); "A Sermon on King Hezekiah's Bitterness and Relief" (1710); "Judgment began at the House of God and the Righteous scarcely Saved" (1716); "Two Sermons occasioned by the Earthquake, to which is added a Poem on Peter Thatcher, of Milton, and Samuel Danforth, of Taunton" (1727); also "Sermons and discourses, in a Parish or the Fraternal Intercessory Cry of Faith and Love: Setting Forth and Recommending the Primitive Mode of taking Leave," to which were annexed poems to the memory of Mrs. Anne Eliot, and John Eliot, the apostle to the Indians (Boston, 10 May 1763). And, as a clergyman, b. in Roxbury, Mass., 18 Dec., 1666; d. in Taunton, Mass., 14 Nov., 1727. He was graduated at Harvard in 1688, and subsequently became pastor of the Congregational church in Taunton. All of his contemporaries represent him as a person of great learning and as having influence among young people. During 1703 unusual attention to religion prevailed among his congregation, of which he gives an interesting account in three letters published in Prince's "Christian History." He also published a synodical Catechism (1710) and "An Election Sermon" (1714); and "An Essay concerning the Singing of Psalms" (1723).

Mr. Danforth left a manuscript Indian dictionary, a part of which is now in the library of the Massachusetts historical society. It seems to have been formed from Eliot's Indian Bible, as there is a reference under every word to a passage of Scripture.--Samuel, son of John, b. in Dorchester, Mass., 1696; d. in Cambridge, Mass., in 1777. He was graduated at Harvard in 1715, and became prominent in the Massachusetts colony. For several years he was president of the college, and in 1744 a judge of the inferior court of common pleas for the county, have accepted commissions under the act, by being sworn members of his majesty's council, appointed by said act, we therefore look upon them as utterly incapable of holding any office whatever." Mr. Danforth was distinguished for his love of natural philosophy and chemistry.--Samuel, son of the third Samuel, physician, b. in Cambridge, Mass., in August, 1740; d. in Boston, Mass., 16 Nov., 1857. He was graduated at Harvard in 1768, and studied medicine with Dr. Isaac Rand. At first he settled in Newport, but soon removed to Boston, where he acquired a valuable practice. During the Revolutionary war his professional pursuits were disturbed, and he was harshly treated by the whigs on account of his loyalty to Great Britain, but never he regained the influence of his patients. In all difficult medical cases his opinion was relied on as being the utmost effort of human skill. He practised with success until nearly eighty years of age, and increased his reputation by his chemical studies. Dr. Danforth was a member of the American Academy of arts and sciences, and from 1765 till 1798 was president of the Massachusetts medical society.

Thomas, son of the third Samuel, lawyer, b. in Massachusetts about 1742; d. in London, England, in 1823." He was graduated at Harvard in 1768, and was one of the addresses of Gov. Thomas Hutchinson. Subsequently he studied law, and became a councillor in Charlestown. He was the only lawyer in the town, as well as the only inhabitant, who sought protection from the parent country at the beginning of the Revolution. After being proscribed and banished, he departed for Halifax in 1776, and later took up his residence in England.

Daniel, Antony, clergyman, b. in Dieppe, France, in 1601; d. in Canada in 1648. He became a Jesuit at the age of twenty, and was sent to Canada in 1640, with Father Breton. He assisted the Indians of Cape Breton, but from July, 1634, till July, 1648, gave his attention exclusively to the Hurons. Although he made St. Joseph's his principal residence, he ministered to the entire tribe. When celebrating mass, on 4 July, he heard a confused noise, and, as soon as he had finished the service, he ran to the quarter from which the cries proceeded. He was at once surrounded by women and children, and learned that the village was being attacked by a hostile tribe while the warriors were absent. Father Daniel exhorted all who could, to escape to the woods, and endeavored to inspire those who were unable to do so, from sickness or age, with a sentiment of Christian heroism. He himself refused to escape, and, in order to gain time for his flock to reach the forest, he advanced toward the enemy, exclaiming, "Christ is in me." His calmness and daring, when they recovered from their astonishment, they shot their arrows at him and he fell to the ground, and, after lingering some time in agony, was despatched by an Indian.

Daniel, John Moncure, editor, b. in Stafford county, Va., 16 Oct., 1825; d. in Richmond, Va., 30 March, 1865. His father was the son of an eminent surgeon in the U. S. army, who married a daughter of Thomas Stone, of Maryland, signer of the Declaration of Independence. John Moncure was educated mainly by his father, and studied law with his brother Lucius, an editor. He did not complete his studies, his father's death rendering it necessary to earn a support for himself and aid his brothers. In 1845 he went to Richmond, where he obtained the place of librarian in a small public library, which, though it brought little money, supplied opportunity for indulging his passion for reading. The first exhibition of his prowess as a writer was on an agricultural monthly, "The Southern Planter," to which he attracted so much notice that he was invited to a place on the staff of a new democratic newspaper called the "Richmond Examiner," which speedily became the leading paper of the south. The brilliant invective of the paper led to his fighting several duels. Mr. Daniel's "democratic" principles were of the philosophical European school, and he was enabled to harmonize his pro-slavery radicalism with these by the adoption of Carlyle's theory (in "The Nigger Question"), which he interpreted as meaning that negroes were not to be considered as men in the same sense as whites. He was heretical in religious opinions, and his columns bore witness to much admiration for Emerson and Theodore Parker. He even published Parker's famous sermon on Webster in his paper. The literary character of the "Examiner" was very high. Mr. Daniel was a friend of Edgar A. Poe, whom he aided with money, and of whom he wrote a remarkable sketch in the "Southern Literary Messenger" of 1846. Poe's poems were revised for this paper. Mr. Daniel was perhaps the earliest apostle of the secessionists in Virginia. In 1853 he was appointed by President Buchanan minister to the court of Victor Emanuel, and while there he took high ground in demanding the same immunity for American missionaries as had been naturalized in the United States and visiting Sardinia as for any other American, and was indignant that Mr. Marye did not support him in-- Daniel was a rupture of diplomatic relations. He caused some scandal by escorting to a royal ball at Turin (on occasion of the betrothal of Prince Napoleon and Princess Clotilde) the Countess Marie de Solms (afterward Madame Ratazzi), who had not been invited. This matter was the subject of a correspondence between Cavour and his minister at Washington. Garibaldi returned to the American republic, which Daniel declined on the ground that it was contrary to the Monroedctrine! His social relations at this period were somewhat exposed for their impropriety by a friend in Richmond of a private letter in which he ridiculed the habits of the court, the letter having found its way to Turin. Nevertheless, Daniel passed more than seven agreeable years abroad. At the beginning of the civil war in America, sentiment was on the staff of Gen. A. P. Hill. His arm being shattered, he resumed editorship of the Richmond "Examiner." He attacked Jefferson Davis and Mr. Elmore (Confederate treasurer) with great severity, was challenged in 1864 by the latter, and met him in a duel, where he was unable to point his pistol on account of his wounded arm. He was shot in the leg in this duel. He predicted the collapse of the Confederacy, and died three days before it occurred. Frederick S. Daniel has printed privately a volume containing his brother's leading articles during the war, with a memoir of the man.

Daniel, John Reeves Jones, b. in Halifax county, N.C., about 1802; d. in Louisiana. He was graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1821, studied law, and practised with success, sat in the legislature in 1849, and was elected attorney-general in 1857. In 1865 he was elected, as a democrat, to congress, and served continuously from 1 May, 1841, to 3 March, 1853. He afterward removed to Louisiana.

Daniel, Peter Vivian, jurist, b. in Stafford county, Va., 34 April, 1784; d. in Richmond, Va., 30 June, 1860. His father, Travers Daniel, was a son of Peter Daniel, who married a daughter of Raleigh Travers, of the Virginia house of burgesses. The residence of Travers Daniel, Crow's Nest, near the mouth of Potomac creek, was celebrated for its hospitality, and the family bore an important part in public affairs. Peter Vivian was graduated at Princeton in 1805, and studied law in the office of Edmund Randolph (of Washington's cabinet), whose daughter, Lucy Nelson Randolph, he married in 1811. He was chosen a member of the state council of Virginia in 1825, served as a member of the state senate in 1828, and was elected to the state legislature in 1832. He was a member of the convention that framed the constitution of 1830. He had been re-elected to the state legislature in 1836, and was elected to the U.S. senate in 1838. He was a member of the convention that framed the constitution of 1851, and was elected to the U.S. senate in 1854. He was a member of the convention that framed the constitution of 1854, and was elected to the U.S. senate in 1856. He was a member of the convention that framed the constitution of 1859, and was elected to the U.S. senate in 1860.

Daniel, William, jurist, b. in Winchester, Va., 26 Nov., 1838; d. in Lynchburg, Va., 28 March, 1873, was educated at Hampden Sydney college and at the University of Virginia, and while yet a youth was a lawyer of large practice and wide reputation for eloquence. He was elected to the Virginia house of delegates in 1857, served in the convention of 1861, and was elected to the house of delegates in 1862. He was a member of the convention that framed the constitution of 1860, and was elected to the U.S. senate in 1861. He was a member of the convention that framed the constitution of 1869, and was elected to the U.S. senate in 1870. He was a member of the convention that framed the constitution of 1876, and was elected to the U.S. senate in 1877.

Daniel, John Warlick, senator, b. in Lynchburg, Va., 5 Sept., 1842, received a classical education, and in May, 1861, volunteered in the Confederate army, and served throughout the war, rising to be major and adjutant-general of Early's division in the Army of Northern Virginia. In 1865-'6 he studied law at the University of Virginia, and soon after entering upon practice gained a high reputation as an advocate. He has published "Attachments" (1860) and "Negotiable Instruments" (1876). He was elected to the state house of delegates in 1866, and to the state senate in 1876 and 1878. In 1876 he was chosen for Congress as a representative in Congress, and on 15 Dec., 1885, was chosen U.S. senator to succeed William Mahone, whose term expires 3 March, 1887.

DANIEL, William, candidate for the vice-presidency, b. on Deal's island, Somerset co., Md., 24 Jan., 1836. He was graduated at Dickinson college in 1848, and admitted to the bar in 1851. He was elected to the legislature in 1853, and introduced a bill similar to the Maine liquor law, was re-elected on the temperance issue by the American party, and on the completion of his term sent to the state senate a super-taxation bill. At the first session he resigned, and removed to Baltimore. He became an earnest anti-slavery republican, and in 1864 was a member of the State constitutional convention for the emancipation of the slaves. He was chosen president of the Maryland and Virginia alliance on its organization in 1872, and continued in that post in subsequent years. Through the efforts of that society and the energy and eloquence of its president, the Maryland option law was enacted, and adopted by thirteen counties of the twenty-three constituting the state. On 14 July, 1884, the alliance joined the national prohibition party. Mr. Daniel appeared at the head of the Maryland delegation in the prohibitionist convention in Pittsburg, Pa., acted as temporary chairman of the convention, and was nominated by it for vice-president of the United States. The St. Louis and Daniel ticket received 150,369 ballots, or 1:49 per cent. of the total popular vote.

DANIELS, William Haven, author, b. in Franklin, Mass., 15 May, 1836. He entered Wesleyan university, then travelled in Europe, became librarian in Northwestern university in 1866, and was professor of rhetoric in Illinois Wesleyan university in 1888-'9. He joined the Rock River conference of the Methodist Episcopal church in 1869, was a minister in Chicago, III., in 1870-'4, then at River Forest, went to Europe with Dwight L. Moody, the revivalist, in 1875, became superintendent in 1876, and since 1881 has devoted himself to literature, and to the work of an evangelist, to enter upon which he resigned his connection with the New England conference in 1885. He is the author of "D. L. Moody and His Work" (London and Hartford, 1875): "That Boy: Who shall Have Him?" (Cincinnati and London, 1878): "The Temperance Reform and its Great Reformers" (New York, 1878): "Moody, his Words, Work, and Workers" (1879): "The Illustrated History of Methodism in the United States" (1881): "Memorials of Gilbert Haven" (Cincinnati, 1880): and "A Short History of the People called Methodist." (London, 1882).

DANIELSON, Timothy, patriot, b. in Brimfield, Mass., in 1753; d. there, 19 Sept., 1791. He was graduated at Yale in 1756, and studied theology, but did not preach. He was chairman of the Hampshire county convention in September, 1774, and a delegate to the provincial congress that met at Concord in the following month. In May, 1774, being representative, he was chosen a member of the council, but his election was annulled by Gov. Gage. In February and May, 1775, he attended the provincial congress at Cambridge and Watertown. He commanded one of the twenty-five regiments of provincial militia organized under the act of May, 1775, but served the cause of independence chiefly in the legislative and oratorical field. In 1777 he was elected governor of Massachusetts. He was a member of the State constitutional convention of 1779, and afterward of the senate and executive council. In his last years he was chief justice of Hampshire county.

DANKS, Henry, b. in New London, Conn., in 1834. He removed with his parents to Saratoga Springs, N. Y., and in 1850 went to Chicago, Ill. His first musical composition was inserted in Bradbury's "Jubilee," under the name of "Lake Street," and is well known. In 1856 his first song, arranged with piano-forte accompaniment, "The Old Lane," was published in Chicago, since which time he has issued several hundred. Two of them, "Silver Threads among the Gold" and "Don't be angry with me, Darling," have attained immense popularity, each selling to the extent of several thousand copies. The publishers paid the author thirty dollars for the copyright, and realized several thousands. From 1858 till 1861 Mr. Danks lived in Cleveland, Ohio, from 1861 till 1864 in Chicago, and from 1864 till 1871 in New York city. He has published books of anthologies that have met with deserved acceptance.

DAoust, Jean Baptiste, Canadian politician, b. in St. Eustache, Quebec, 18 Jan., 1817. After having been magistrate, commissioner, and municipal officer, he was elected by acclamation in 1854, for the Two Mountains constituency of Canada, in which he held his seat until the confederation of the provinces in 1867, when he was elected to the house of commons by acclamation. In 1872 he retired for a short time from political life. In 1876 he was re-elected to the house of commons by acclamation, being chosen for a second term. He was a member of the election in 1878, and again in 1882. He is a conservative.

D'A PONTE, Lorenzo, dramatist, b. in Ceneda, Italy, 10 March, 1749; d. in New York city, 17 Aug., 1838. He was for two years professor of rhetoric in the seminary of Porto Gruaro, and then removed to Venice. In 1803 he emigrated to the United States and settled in New York city, where for many years he gave private lessons in the Italian language and literature. In 1828 he was appointed professor of Italian in Columbia college. Besides his many plays, he wrote sonnets and translations from the Greeks, and also the above-mentioned books of elementary instruction in the Italian language. He published his own "Life" (3 vols., New York, 1828), and "History of the Florentine Republic and the Medici" (2 vols., 1833).

DARBY, John, educator, b. in North Adams, Mass., 3 Sept., 1814; d. there, 18 Oct., 1877. He was graduated at Williams in 1831, and remained there as an instructor till he accepted a professorship in Wesleyan female college at Macon, Ga. Afterward he became professor of mathematics at DARBY, William. In 1845 he was obliged, on account of his health, to go to a warmer climate. He was connected with the educational departments of Georgia and Florida, was the founder of the Culloden female college, and afterward professor of natural science in Auburn college, Ala. In 1809 he was elected president of the Wesleyan university of Kentucky, but removed to New York city in 1812. He was a regular contributor to the religious press, and was the author of several educational and scientific works, including "Manual of Botany" (1841); "The Botany of the Southern States" (New York, 1855); and "Chemistry" (1860). In 1775 he was in Washington, D.C., Oct. 9, 1854. He was an officer under Gen. Jackson in Louisiana, and one of the surveyors of the boundary between the United States and Canada. With Theodore Dwight, Jr., he edited "The United States Gazetteer" in 1800. His works include "Geographical Description of Louisiana" (1816); "Plan of Pittsburgh and Adjacent Country" (1817); "Emigrant's Guide to the Western Country" (1818); "Tour from New York to Detroit" (New York, 1819); "Geography and Geology," 7th ed. (1850); a series of "Lectures on the Discovery of America" (1828); "Mennonica, a Register of Events from the Earliest Period to 1829" (Baltimore, 1829); and "Geographical Dictionary" (1849).

DARCEY, John S., physician, b. in Hanover, Morris co., N. J., Feb. 24, 1788; d. in Newark, N. J., Oct. 22, 1863. His father was a physician, and with him he studied and succeeded to his large practice. He was a member of the state legislature in 1825. In 1850 he opened a hospital for the care of Asiatic cholera in this country, and removed to Newark, N. J., and by his skill in the treatment of that disease, and his devotion to his patients and sympathy with their sufferings, attained a practice more extensive and existing that any other in the state, which finally impaired his remarkably vigorous constitution. In 1835-41 he was U. S. marshal for New Jersey. He exerted great influence in his party in the state, but was averse to holding office. On the incorporation of the New Jersey railroad company he was elected its president, and held the office till his death, a period of over thirty years. In 1849, his health failing, he made the overland journey to California, but his health was rather injured than benefited.

DARDEN, Miles, giant, b. in North Carolina in 1790; d. in Henderson county, Tenn., 23 Jan., 1857. He was seven feet six inches in height, and at his death weighed more than one thousand pounds. Until 1833 he was active, energetic, and able to labor, but from that time was obliged to remain at home, or be moved about in a wagon. In 1830 it required one and a half yards of cloth, one yard wide, to make him a coat. His coffin was eight feet long, thirty-five inches deep, thirty-two inches across the breast, eighteen across the head, and fourteen across the feet.

DARGEY, John, the grandson of English parents born in the New World, b. at Roanoke, Va., in August, 1857. She was the granddaughter of John White, governor of the colony sent out by Sir Walter Raleigh to found an agricultural state. The expedition sailed from Plymouth, England, 26 April, 1857, and reached the island of Roanoke, Virginia, in July of the same year. The mother of the child was the wife of one of her father's assistants. Virginia was born about a month after the arrival of the expedition. Nine days after her birth Gov. White sailed for England, and when he returned, a year later, all vestiges of the colony had disappeared. An inscription on the bark of a tree pointed to Croatan, a place supposed to belong to a friendly tribe of Indians, but Croatan was never found.

DARGAN, Clara Victoria, poet, b. near Winnsboro, S. C., about 1840. She was of French descent, and of a family whose wealth was lost in the downfall of the Confederacy. Her early education was very carefully conducted, and she was especially skilled in music. From 1852 till 1856 she resided with her family in Columbus, S. C. She began writing sketches and songs at the age of ten, and a year later produced a story that was much admired. Her first published poem was "Forever Thine," in the Charleston "Courant" in 1858, under the pseudonym of "Claudia." During the following year she wrote several stories for the "Southern Guardian," signed "Esther Chesney." In 1863 she edited the literary department of the "Edgefield Advertiser," and became a contributor to various other periodicals. After the close of the civil war she became a teacher in Yorkville, S. C. She is the author of "Rivers of Life," of life on the River Ashley, which originally appeared as a prize story in the "Southern Field and Fireside" (1868), and of another novel that obtained a prize and was published as a serial.

DARGAN, Edmund Spoon, jurist, b. in Montgomery county, N. C., 15 April, 1883; d. in Mobile, Ala., in November, 1870. He was the son of a Baptist minister of Irish descent, at whose death he was left without means. By his own exertions he obtained a fair knowledge of English, Latin, and Greek, although he was at work on a farm until he was well over twenty years of age. In 1892 he was admitted to the bar in 1829, went to Alabama, and taught three months in Washington, Autauga co. Here he was elected a justice of the peace, and filled the office for several years, meanwhile engaging in the practice of law. In 1830 he removed to Montgomery, and in 1834 was elected to be the bench of the circuit court of the Mobile district, and removed to Mobile. He resigned the office of judge in 1842, and in 1844 was elected to the state senate. He was also mayor of Mobile the same year. He resigned the seat of judge the following year, and was elected to congress, serving from 1 Dec., 1845, till 3 March, 1847. On the question of the northwestern boundary of Oregon he made an able speech, and offered some valuable amendments to the resolution of notice. He was the first proposer of the line of adjustment finally adopted on the settlement of the question with the British government. He declined a renomination, and in 1847 was elected to fill a vacancy on the bench of the supreme court of Alabama. In July, 1840, by the resignation of Justice Collier, he became chief justice of the supreme court. He resigned in December, 1852, and resumed the practice of law in Mobile. In 1861 he was a delegate to the State convention, and voted for the ordinance of secession. He also served for one term as a representative in the Confederate congress.

DARGAN, Theodore A., physician, b. in Sleepy Hollow, S. C., in 1828. He was of Scotch-Irish descent, and received his early education in Darlington, S. C. He was graduated at the South Carolina medical college in 1844 at the age of twenty-one. At the beginning of the civil war he entered the Confederate service as surgeon, and served until the end. In 1839 he published a paper on the subject of "Typhoid Fever," which was extensively noticed.
DARKE, William, soldier, b. in Philadelphia county, Pa., in 1736; d. in Jefferson county, Va., 26 Nov., 1801. When he was four years old his parents removed to Virginia. At the age of nineteen he joined the army, and was with Braddock at his defeat in 1755. At the beginning of the Revolutionary war he was made a captain, and on the 3d of June he was taken prisoner at the battle of Germantown. Afterward he was colonel commanding the Hampshire and Berkeley regiments at the capture of Cornwallis. He was often a member of the Virginia legislature, and, in the convention of 1786, voted for the Federal constitution. In 1791 he was appointed lieutenant-colonel in a regiment of "levis," and commanded the left wing of St. Clair's army at its defeat by the Miami Indians on 4 Nov., 1791. He made two gallant and successful charges with the bayonet in this flight, in the second of which his youngest son, Capt. Joseph Darke, was killed and himself wounded, narrowly escaping death. He was afterward major-general of Virginia militia.

DARLEY, John, actor, b. in England in 1765; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1833. He made his first appearance on the American stage in Philadelphia in 1794, and afterward became a lieutenant of marines in the U.S. navy, but returned to the stage, and appeared at the Park theatre, New York, 20 July, 1801. He had a manly, well-proportioned person, and a handsome face, and, although not warmly attached to his profession, possessed great merit as a singer, and played Frenchmen and walking gentlemen well. His son, Felix Octavius Carr, artist, b. in Philadelphia, 23 June, 1822. At the age of fourteen he was placed in a mercantile house, but spent his leisure hours in drawing. Some of his humorous sketches attracted attention, and he received from the publisher of the "Saturday Museum" a handsome sum for a few designs, which encouraged him to devote his time to art. For several years he was employed by large publishing-houses in Philadelphia in producing the series of drawings for the "Library of Humorous American Works," which became very popular in the southern and western states. He removed in 1848 to New York, where he occupied himself in illustrating Irving's humorous writings. In 1856 he published a series of designs in outline from Sylvester Judd's novel of "Margaret," which met with such favor that he was commissioned by the American art union to illustrate in similar style "Rip Van Winkle" and "Sleepy Hollow." His elaborate outline drawings of these subjects led to his recognition, both at home and abroad, as a worthy successor of Retzsch and Flaxman. He declined an advantageous offer to settle in London, and applied himself assiduously to his art. In addition to illustrating James Fenimore Cooper's works, for which he furnished more than 500 designs, he was also engaged in the preparation of vignettes for bank-notes. He also illustrated Dickens's works and Simms's novels, and executed the "Massacre at Wyoming," and various Revolutionary pieces. Mr. Darley was elected a member of the Academy of design in 1852, became a member of the Artists' fund society, and was one of the early members of the American association of artists. In 1859 he appeared with his drawing of the wedding procession in Longfellow's "Courtship of Miles Standish." Since then he has executed many large works, among which were four ordered by Prince Napoleon, viz.: "Emigrants attacked by Indians on the Plains," "The Village Blacksmith," "The Unwilling Laborer," and "The Repose." During the civil war he delineated many dramatic and characteristic scenes, including one representing "Dahlgren's Charge at Fredericksburg," and another representing "Sherman's March into the Sea." Some of the most elaborate figures and scenes on the government bonds and legal-tender notes of the national banks were designed by him. Toward the close of the war he visited Europe, added many more of the sketches to his portfolio, studied models in Rome, and made a large number of engravings, many of which appeared in periodicals. On his return to the United States he published "Sketches Abroad with Pen and Pencil" (New York, 1866), in which he furnished both letter-press and illustrations. His "Cavalry Charge at Fredericksburg, Va.," was exhibited at the Paris exposition. "His Return to Rome," in water-color, was at the Centennial exhibition of 1876. In 1875 he engaged in preparing 500 drawings to illustrate a "History of the United States" by B. J. Lossing. His later work consists of "Outlines to the 'Scarlet Letter' of Hawthorne, 1870, and twelve outline illustrations to the "Evangeline" of Longfellow, issued, not in lithograph print as heretofore, but in phototypes taken from the originals (1888), and "Illustrations to Shakespeare's Plays" (1888).

DARLING, Henry, clergyman, b. in Reading, Pa., 27 Dec., 1823. He was graduated at Amherst in 1842, studied theology in Union seminary, New York, in 1842–3, at Auburn in 1843–4, and was ordained by the presbytery of Columbia, 30 Dec., 1847. He first settled in Vernon, N.Y., then became pastor in Hudson in 1847–50, pastor of the Clinton street church, Philadelphia, in 1852–62, and permanent clerk of the Presbyterian general assembly in 1854–63. He was an invalid in 1861–3, after which he removed to Albany, and became pastor of the 4th Presbyterian church, where he remained until 1881. In that year he was elected president of Hamilton college. He presided as moderator to the general assembly in 1881. The degree of D.D. was conferred upon him in 1880 by Union, and the degree of LL.D. by both Hamilton and Lafayette in 1881. In addition to many pamphlets and articles in periodicals, he has published "The Closer Walk" (Philadelphia, 1862), "Slavery and the War" (1863), "Conformity to the World" (1875), "Not Doing, but Receiving" (Albany, 1875).

DARLING, Noyes, agriculturist, b. in Woodbridge, Conn., in 1792; d. in New Haven, 17 Sept., 1846. He was educated at the American art union to illustrate in similar style "Rip Van Winkle" and "Sleepy Hollow." His elaborate outline drawings of these subjects led to his recognition, both at home and abroad, as a worthy successor of Retzsch and Flaxman. He declined an advantageous offer to settle in London, and applied himself assiduously to his art. DARLING, William, physician, b. in Berwickshire, Scotland, in 1815. His early education was obtained at a private seminary, after which he went to the University of Edinburgh, where he obtained a prize by competitive examination for his proficiency in the classics. He studied medicine in the College of physicians and surgeons in New York city, and in 1838, was appointed physician to Bellevue hospital, and also took charge of some of the hospitals on Ward's island. His degree of M. D. was received in 1842 from the University of the city of New York, which also in a few weeks conferred upon him its degree of LL.D. In 1845 he was called to the professorship of demonstrator of anatomy, where he remained until 1853, when he became connected with the quarantine hospital, Staten Island. In 1855 he served as senior assistant surgeon in the emigrants' hospital, Ward's island. In 1856 he went to London, England, and, on 21 Nov. in that year, was admitted a member of the Royal college of surgeons of England. He remained in Europe ten years, most of the time in London, attending the lectures and clinics at the hospitals, as well as lectures at the College of surgeons, besides being a member of the Royal institute of arts, School of mines, etc. During the same period he also attended various lectures in Paris, Edinburgh, and Glasgow. On 14 June, 1866, shortly before his departure for the United States, he received the fellowship of the Royal college of surgeons. On his return to the United States he was appointed professor of anatomy in the University of New York, and in 1868 censor of the New York college of veterinary surgeons. In 1873 he was appointed professor of anatomy in the University of Vermont. He is a member of many medical societies, at home and abroad, and on 13 Nov., 1877, was elected correspondent of the Société d'anthropologie of Paris.

DARLING, William, Canadian merchant, b. in Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1819; d. in Montreal, 1 Nov., 1885. He arrived in Canada in 1840, and, taking up his residence in Montreal, established an iron and hardware business, which ultimately became the wholesale firm of William Darling & Co. He actively promoted the commercial welfare of that city, and was for some years president of its board of trade, and also vice-president of the Dominion board of trade. He was largely instrumental in framing the insolvent act of 1875. During the Mackenzie administration he was appointed arbitrator on the Lachine canal claims, an office in which he was continued by Sir John A. Macdonald. He was a director of the Merchant's bank, and chairman of the Temporaries board of the Presbyterian church of Canada. In 1878 he was a candidate for a seat in the Dominion parliament, in the liberal interest, but was defeated.

DARBINGTON, William, scientist, b. in Birmingham, P., 29 April, 1875; d. in West Chester, P., 29 April, 1875. In his early years he was inclined to be a sailor, and his early education was received in the country school. He began the study of medicine at the age of eighteen, and was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1804. He studied languages and law for two years in Europe, and, being then a cabin's surgeon, for which (joining a military organization) he was disowned by the Society of Friends. A sketch of his voyage, under the title of "Letters from Calcutta," was published in the "Analectic Magazine." He returned to the United States in 1807, and for several years practiced medicine in West Chester. Here he entered into politics, wrote in defense of the policy of President Madison, and at the beginning of the war of 1812 aided in raising an armed corps in his neighborhood, and, after the destruction of Washington in 1814, was chosen major of a volunteer regiment. He founded anatheneum, and a society of natural history, of which he became the president. In 1813 he began a descriptive catalogue of plants growing around West Chester, with the title "Flora Ceterica" (1826), afterward enlarged as the "Flora Ceterica" (1837; new ed., 1850), containing a complete description and classification of every plant known in the county. He was a member of congress from 4 Dec., 1815, till 3 March, 1817, and from 6 Dec., 1819, till 3 March, 1835. In 1843 he edited the "Medical, philosophical, and historical papers," William Baldwin, with a memoir, entitled the work "Reliquiae Baldwiniana." In 1853 the name of Darlingtonica California was given, in his honor, to a new and remarkable variety of pitcher-plant found in California, in addition to which a number of rare plants were named in his honor by naturalists in Switzerland and America. The degree of LL.D. was conferred on him by Yale in 1848, and in 1855 that of Doctor of Physical Science, by Dickinson college. He was a member of forty learned societies in America and Europe. In addition to the works noted above, he wrote "Pharmacology;" "Mutual Influence of Habits and Disease" (1804) and "Agricultural Botany" (Philadelphia, 1847).

DABRAH, Mrs. Lydia, heroine. Of her birth and early life nothing is known, except that she was a Quaker. During 1777, while the British army held possession of Philadelphia, the adjutant-general rented one of her chambers, a retired room, for private conferences. On 2 Dec. he went to her, required that the room be ready with fire and candles by seven o'clock, that her family retire to their beds, and that the utmost silence be kept regarding the visit. These minute directions excited her curiosity, and, divested of her shoes, she crept to the door, listened at the key-hole, and heard an order read for all the British troops to march out on the evening of the 4th and attack Washington's army, then at White Marsh, eight miles distant. Returning to her room, she feigned sleep when called by the officer, at the close of the meeting, that he might depart. Keeping the secret from her husband, she at an early hour in the morning informed the family that they were out of fire, and she would go to Frankfort outside of the British lines, and procure some. A pass was readily procured from Gen. Howe, and she was soon beyond the British lines, and, leaving her bag at the mill, hasted to the American army, walking in a snowy road for several miles. She met Lieut.-Col. Craig, who knew her, and, under a solemn pledge of secrecy regarding her agency, received the information that placed the American army on its guard. She returned to the mill, procured her flour, and went home. That night she watched the British troops departing, and when they returned she did not show to see those who, and the next evening the adjutant-general asked her to walk up to his room, locked the door, and inquired whether any of the family were up when he and the other officers met. She told them they had all retired. He then asked her very strange: I know you were asleep, for I knocked at your chamber-door three times before you heard me, yet it is certain that we were betrayed. I am entirely at a loss to imagine who gave Gen. Washington information of our intended attack. On arriving near his encampment, we found the enemy mounted, the troops under arms, and prepared at every point to meet us, and we have been compelled to march back like a parcel of fools."

D'ARUSMONT, Madam. See WRIGHT, Frances.
DAVISHELL, George, clergyman, b. in Stepney, Md., in 1780; d. in New York city in April, 1852. He was licensed as lay-reader at the age of twenty, and admitted to orders by Bishop White in 1805. He was in charge of several parishes in Maryland, was chaplain in the United States Navy during the War of 1812, and was a delegate to the general convention, and became rector of St. Peter's church, Baltimore. Mr. Dashiel was violently opposed to the election of the Rev. Dr. Kemp as suffragan bishop of Maryland in 1814, and with a small number of sympathizers began a schism in that church, by which (as he said) it was proposed to make "the evangelical part of the church a distinct body, and to enlarge its boundaries by admitting faithful men to labor in the work of the Lord." Attempts were made to get some one of the bishops to consecrate Mr. Dashiel for the purpose, but without success, and he was degraded for contumacy early in 1816. Some adherents of his in St. Peter's church endeavored to aid him in keeping possession of St. Peter's, but his loyal members of the church invoked the help of the courts to prevent his entry, and the judges disagreed, no result was attained. A new vestry was elected, and the difficulty was disposed of by choosing the Rev. Dr. Henshaw to be rector. Mr. Dashiel, however, as he could not get Episcopal orders, undertook to ordain ministers for what he called "The Evangelical Church" as the profession of his was the forerunner of the movement, half a century later, known as "The Reformed Episcopal Church," originated by Dr. Cummins, assistant bishop of Kentucky. Mr. Dashiel's movement lasted only a few years, and bore no fruit. He removed to a western town, and spent there most of the remainder of his life.

DASTON, Sarah, one of the later victims of the witchcraft delusion in Salem, b. about 1613. In January, 1693, when "the jails were full, 150 prisoners awaited trial, and 200 more were under accusation," the grand jury went into session, and dismissed more than half the complaints. Public feeling was changing, but the party of superstition desired one conviction. The victim selected was Sarah Daston, a woman eighty years old. In February, she was tried in Charlestown, and the common mind was disenchanted, and she was acquitted, while her persecutor, Minister Parris, was soon afterward driven from Salem.

DAUERCH, Louis, musician, b. in France in 1817; d. in Nancay, France, 16 Aug., 1878. He came to the United States when still a young man, and early earned the musical profession. He was for over six years organist of St. Ann's Roman Catholic church in New York, where he was at one time the proprietor of a music-store. He was the author of "Daucher's Mass" and several other works, and received the first prize for original composition at the Paris conservatory of music.

DAUILLA, Alonso de (dah-vee-lah), Spanish soldier, b. in Toledo in the latter part of the 15th century; d. in Guatitlan, Mexico, in 1536. On 16 Nov., 1518, he sailed from Santiago de Cuba in the Pacific coast, to the American Cortes as a lieutenant in Juan Velasquez's company. He assisted in the whole Mexican campaign, beginning in 1519 in Tabasco, and is said to have taken part in seventy battles. When Naranjo, sent by Diego Velasquez, jealous of Cortes, landed in Mexico and was defeated, Dauilla was commanded by Cortes to go to Hispaniola and ask of the audience of that island that he might not be hampered in his enterprise by further interference from Velasquez. He obtained a favorable result of his mission, and returned to Mexico on the day of the entry of Cortes after his victory of Panuco. To recompense Dauilla for this service, and also because he mistrusted him on account of his friendly relations with Bishop Fonseca, the president of the Indian council, Cortes, besides giving him a considerable landed estate and considerable money, made him governor of the village of Guatitlan. In 1522 Dauilla was commissioned by Cortes to carry to the emperor a tribute of 80,000 ounces of gold in bars obtained from the treasure of Montezuma. With Antonio de Quijones he left Vera Cruz on this mission, and with the aid of Dehesa they took six weeks to reach the Terceira islands. During their stay there to take stores, Quijones was killed in a brawl. Dauilla set sail for Spain, but his ships were captured by the French corsair "Jean Florin." As the French demanded a heavy ransom for him, he waited a long time prisoner, but won the friendship of the officer that guarded him, and was enabled to send the dispatches and letters received from Cortes to the emperor, who at the time was in Flanders. Later he escaped from prison and went to Spain, presenting himself at court, and returned to Mexico in 1528 with the appointment of treasurer of Yucatan; but in later years joined Cortes again in the capital.

DAUVRAY, Helen, actress, b. in San Francisco, Cal., 14 Feb., 1839. Her true name is Gibson, and she was also known as "Little Neil," the California version of the English name. She resided in Virginia City, Nev., and made her first appearance on the stage in San Francisco, playing Eva in "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Afterward she appeared as the Duke of York in "Richard III," as the child in "The Scarlet Letter," as Maida Heron, and in other roles. About 1849 she was announced as a child star, and her first tour, opening in the west, was made in蛋白戏, such as "Fidela," "No Name," and "Katy Did." She continued eastward, meeting with indifferent success, reached New York in June, 1870, appear-DAVENPORT, Adolphus Hoyt, actor, b. in Stamford, Conn., 4 Aug., 1828; d. in New Orleans, La., 22 Oct., 1873. An early fondness for the stage influenced him to become an actor, and, transposing his name, which was Adolphus Davenport Hoyt, he became known as "Dolly Davenport." His first appearance as William Shakespeare's "Jocasta" at the Baltimore athenaeum during 1848, and his success was such that he was soon intrusted with the rôle of Claude Melnotte, which he played to Mrs. W. H. Russell's (now Mrs. John Hoey) Pauline. At the solicitation of his parents, he studied law with Homer Adams, of New York. After two years' preparation, he was admitted to the bar. But he soon reappeared on the stage, and played in Wallack's old theatre, for the benefit of David S. Palmer, as Box in "Box and Cox." Early in 1853 he appeared as Montano in "Othello," and as Capt. Charles in "Who Speaks First?" at the old Broadway theatre. His first appearance in Philadelphia was at the old Chestnut street theatre, and he was a member of the company during 1853-4. Subsequently he was a member of the Walnut street theatre's company, and played there during the remainder of the time that he acted in Philadelphia, and acted principally in southern cities. He was manager of the Mobile theatre during 1872, and was connected with Bidwell's academy of music.

DAVENPORT, Bennett Franklin, sanitary chemist, b. in Cambridge, Mass., 28 July, 1845. He was graduated at Harvard in 1867, then spent some time in the university in Tubingen, after which he graduated at Harvard medical college in 1871, and also at the College of physicians and surgeons in New York in 1871. After settling in Boston, he devoted his attention to the sanitary chem- istry. In 1879 he became professor of chemistry in the Massachusetts college of pharmacy, and in 1882 inspector of milk and vinegar to the city of Boston, and also analyst to the Massachusetts state board of health. In these capacities he has regularly submitted reports to the annual department of the Boston and State board of health. He has also prepared the semi-annual reports on foods and drugs in the Boston "Medical and Surgical Journal." Dr. Davenport is a member of the chemical societies of London, Berlin, and New York, and of other scientific bodies.

DAVENPORT, Edward Loomis, actor, b. in Boston, Mass., 15 Nov., 1814; d. in Canton, Pa., 1 Sept., 1877. He made his first appearance on the stage in Providence, R. I., in 1836, as Parson Will in "A New Way to Pay Old Debts," with Junius Brutus Booth as Sir Giles Overreach, a part in which Mr. Davenport afterward became famous. He then appeared in New York at the Bowery theatre, under the management of Thomas H. Hanlin, and in 1838 played first in Philadelphia, in the Walnut street theatre, as Count Montano in "The Honeymoon." But he appeared chiefly in Boston until 1847, when, with Mrs. Anna Cora Mowatt, he visited England, appearing with her, on 6 Dec., 1847, at the Manchester theatre, as Claude Melnotte to her Pauline. While in England he reported William H. Barrow, Henry C. Jarrett, and Maud Smith, as Wallack, and William Wheatley. In 1859 he became manager of the Howard athenaeum, in Boston, and ten years later undertook the management of the Chestnut street theatre in Philadelphia. ing 1878 he acted in Wood's museum, New York, and in 1875–6 played with great success the part of Brutus in a protracted engagement of "Julius Caesar" at Booth's theatre, New York. His last appearance in New York was also in Booth's theatre, where he played in "Daniel Druce." He was one of the most finished actors on the American stage, and possessed great versatility, being equally successful in tragedy and comedy. Her appointment of Fanny Elizabeth Vining, b. in London, 6 July, 1829, was the daughter of Frederick Vining, manager of the Haymarket theatre in London. Her professional education began with playing baby parts when she was but three years old. Subsequently she spent a few years at boarding-school, and then made her first appearance, in 1847, as Juliet, with G. V. Brooke as Romeo and her father as Mercutio. She continued to play leading juvenile parts at the Haymarket and Drury Lane theatres with Charles Kean, William Cecil Maclardy, and other distinguished actors, until her marriage with Mr. Davenport, on 8 Jan., 1849. Her first appearance in the United States was as Margaret Elmore, in "Love's Sacrifice," in the Broadway theatre, New York, on 11 Sept., 1854. Afterward she was associated with many of his touring engagements, and she has played in the principal cities of the United States. —Their daughter, Fanny Lilly Gipsy, b. in London, 10 April, 1850, was educated in the public schools of Boston, and made her first appearance at the Howard Athenæum as the child in "Metamora." In New Y. 7 Feb. 1857 she appeared first as King of Spain in "Faint Heart never Won Fair Lady," on 14 Feb., 1862, at Nicolò's Garden. Subsequently she acted at the Little Tren- mont theatre, Bos- ton, and in the south, where she played soubrette parts for a season. Afterward she played in the Arch street theatre, Phila- adelphia, then under the management of Mrs. John Drew, where she attracted the attention of Miss Min- tin Duly, who introduced her in New York at his Fifth avenue theatre in 1868. There she played Lady Gay Speaker in "London Assurance"; Rosalind in "As You Like It"; Nancy Sykes in "Oliver Twist"; Lady Teazle in "School for Scandal"; Lu and Fanny Ten Eyck in "Divorce"; the title-rôle in "Leah"; and Mabel Bowen in "Pique," a part in which she won great success, and which ran for 250 nights. She has made starring tours throughout the United States, frequently adding new parts to those previously played. In 1880 she played Olivia successfully in Philadelphia, and afterward brought out, in New York, Miss Anthony Dickinson's play of "An American Girl." She also introduced in New York Sarlov's "Feedorn," acting the title-rôle, and received much approba- tion for the magnificent manner in which the play was mounted. On 30 July, 1878, she married Edwin H. Price, an actor. —Another daughter, Blanche (Blanche Maria), b. in London, 11 July, 1852, was educated in the public schools of Boston, and in the convent of Notre Dame. In 1867 she played at the Boston museum, where she attracted attention by her singing, and afterward studied there under Smith in violin and voice. Under Min- nelli to cultivate her voice, and remained abroad six years, studying and afterward singing. She was a great favorite in Naples, as well as in Milan. She returned to America under Maurice Strakosch in October, 1879, and made her debut in opera in Philadelphia, but Minnelli soon told her how she was getting along in "Faust" with warm praise, both for her pure, clear soprano voice and her dramatic skill. She filled an engagement at Booth's in 1880. She sings in most of the Italian operas, her favorite being "La Traviata." —Father daughter, Lilly (Lily Antoinette), b. in Glasgow, Scotland, 2 Nov., 1854; in Philadelphia, 13 Jan., 1878. She made her first appearance in the Chestnut street theatre, Philadelphia, while her father was manager, and played juvenile parts there and elsewhere until 1875. She married Frank Thor, in 1874. —Another daughter, May (Marion Caroline), b. in Boston, 21 July, 1857, made her first appearance at the Chestnut street theatre, Philadelphia, under her father's management, in 1872, and has since played in ju- venile parts. In the winter of 1879 she filled an engagement with many of his touring companies, singing in "My Uncle's Will." She acted at the Boston museum, in the winter of 1880, as Lady Gwendoline Lotrus in Boucicaut's "Daddy O'Dowd," and Mary Edwinds in the "Ticket-of-Leave Man." She mar- ried William Seymour in 1882. —A son, Edgar Loomis, b. in Boston, 7 Feb. 1862, played with his sister Fanny in 1879 at the Grand Opera-house, New York, personating Thorsby Gilly in "Pique." —Another son, Henry George Bryant, b. in New York city, 19 Jan., 1886, has played at the Walnut street theatre in Philadelphia, and as Joseph Jefferson in the comedy of "Rip Van Winkle," and in 1879 he appeared at Wallack's theatre, New York, as Sir Joseph Porter in the juvenile "Pina- fore" troupe.

DAVENPORT, Franklin, senator, b. in Phila- delphia, Pa., d. in Woodbury, N. J., about 1829. He received an academic education, and, after studying law, was admitted to the bar, and practised in Woodbury. During the Revolutionary war he served as captain of the artillery in Col. Newcomb's New Jersey brigade, and for some time was under Col. Samuel B. Smith, a captain in the New Jersey line during the whiskey insurrec- tion in 1794, and marched with the troops to Pittsburg. Subsequently he became the first sur- rogation of Gloucester county, and was appointed U. S. senator to fill the vacancy caused by the resigna- tion of John Rutherford, serving from 19 Dec., 1798, till 3 March, 1799. He was then sent to con- gress, and served through the entire term from 2 Dec., 1799, till 3 March, 1801.

DAVENPORT, Henry Kallock, naval officer, b. in Savannah, Ga., 10 Dec., 1829; d. in Pranzes- bad, Bohemia, 18 Aug., 1872. He entered the navy as midshipman in February, 1838, and served on various vessels until 1844, when he was made passed midshipman and attached to the coast survey. Later he sailed on the "Columbia," and from 1849 till 1853 he served on the survey ship. After being promoted to lieutenant in December, 1852, he spent some time on sea duty in various squadrons, being present at the capture of the Barrier forts, Canton river, in 1856, and later on shore duty at the U. S. observatory in Wash- ington. During the Civil War he served at the "Cumberland," and was present at the engage- ment off Hatteras Inlet. From 1861 till 1864 he commanded the steamer "Hetzel," and was en-
The party reached their new home on 14 April, and on the following day, which was the Sabbath, Mr. Davenport preached under a large oak on "The Temptations of the Wilderness." In June of the following year "all the free planters" met in a barn for the purpose of holding a constitutional assembly. It was resolved that only church members should be jurors and assessors, and Davenport and his associates the "seven pillars" to support the civil government. His carefulness in regard to the admission of members to the church gave him also the keys of political power. When the regicides, William Goffe and Edward Whalley, were flying in 1660, he concealed them in his own house for more than a month, and delivered a sermon, for the purpose of enlisting sympathy in their behalf, from the text "Make thy shadow as the night in the midst of noonday, hide the outcasts, bewray not him that wandereth." He was in New Haven until 1667, when, on the death of John Wilson, he was invited to succeed him as pastor of the first church in Boston. This call he accepted, and was installed on 9 Dec., 1668. The "half-way covenant," which had been adopted by the synod held in Boston in 1665, proved in the plantation a source of trouble, and many had been baptized in their infancy, and who, on arriving at years of discretion, would recognize their covenant obligations, should be allowed to bring their children for baptism. This Mr. Davenport was unwilling to accept, and he vigorously opposed his execution; consequently some of the members withdrew from the first church, and were organized into the "Old South church." The controversy continued between the two churches for many years, but Mr. Davenport died of apoplexy soon after it began. His body was buried in the churchyard of the first church, and his friend, John Cotton. He published many sermons, theological tracts, and controversial pamphlets, and also "Instructions to Elders of the English Church." (1634): "Catechism containing the Chief Heads of Christian Religion" (1659); and "A Discourse about Civil Government in a New Plantation" (1675).—His son, John, b. in England in 1635; d. in Boston, Mass., 21 March, 1677, appears to have remained in England "in care of kind friends" until 1639, when he came to New Haven in one of the only two ships that ever arrived at that port. He received a dispensation from the church, and he was admitted a freeman in New Haven, and later appears to have been one of the judges in the courts of New Haven. He removed to Boston in 1668, and was register of probate in 1678-82, and also a merchant.—His son, John, clergyman, b. in Boston, 22 Feb., 1668; d. in Stamford, Conn., 5 Feb., 1731, was graduated at Harvard in 1687, and began preaching in 1690. Early in the following year he was invited to the church in Easthampton, L. I., but declined the offer, and in 1694 was ordained pastor of the church in Stamford, where he removed until his death. Prior to his settling in Stamford he appears to have taught the Hopkins grammar-school in New Haven, and he was a member of the corporation of Yale college from 1707 till 1731. —His son, Abraham, lawyer, was born at New London, Conn., 29 Jan., 1708; d. there, 20 Nov., 1789, was graduated at Yale in 1732, and practised law in his native town. During the Revolution he was a staunch patriot, and served on the state committee of safety. He was a man of stern integrity and generous beneficence, and in times of scarcity and high price he poured out the product of his farm to the poor at less than the current value. For some time he was a member of the executive council of Connecticut, for twenty-five years he was a member of the state legislature, and held the office of judge of the court of common pleas. When he was a member of the council in Hartford, on the dark day in 1780, it was proposed to adjourn, as some thought the day of judgment was at hand; but he objected, saying: "That day is either here or it is not; there is no cause of adjournment; if it is, I choose to be found doing my duty. I wish, therefore, that candles may be brought."—James, another son of John, clergyman, b. in Stamford, Conn., in 1730, d. in Hopewell, N. J., 1797, was graduated at Yale in 1732, and subsequently pursued his theological studies in New Haven. He is supposed to have preached first in New Jersey, and then was called to Southold, L. I., where he was ordained on 28 Oct., 1788. Soon after his settlement the revival known as the "Great Awakening," occurred, during which he was very active and successful. Subsequently he held services at Baskingridge, N. J., where likewise there was a revival, and in 1741 he visited Connecticut, preaching in various places, everywhere exciting great astonishment at the "sinking of Stong's hundred pence," and are said to have been converted by his first sermon. Thence he proceeded to Westerly, R. I., accompanied by the people in solemn procession, singing as they moved along the road. His zeal in effecting conversions, and the methods employed, were afterward the subject of much criticism. On the death of his brother, he went to the brethren, and later the assembly decided "that the behavior, conduct, and doctrines advanced by said James Davenport, do, and have a natural tendency to disturb and destroy the peace and order of this government." Yet further appears to the Assembly that the said Davenport is under the influence of enthusiastic impressions and impulse, and thereby disturbed in the rational faculties of his mind, and therefore to be pitied and compassionate, and not to be treated as otherwise he might be," until he was expelled from the colony, but shortly afterward appeared in Boston, where his erratic actions led to his arrest and imprisonment. In the trial that followed he was declared "nnon comus mentis, and therefore not guilty." His relations with the Southold congregation were severer by a council of ministers in 1742, and a curious document giving the reasons for such action was published. In March, 1743, he went to New London, by request of a company of his partisans, to organize them into a church. Here he continued his peculiar habits, destroying by fire "wigs, cloaks, breeches, hoods, gowns, rings, jewels, necklaces, and certain books," in order to "cure his people of their idolatrous love of worldly things." He was prostrated by a serious illness, and influenced to publish a retraction of his errors in the Boston "Gazette" in July, 1744. In September, 1746, he became a member of the New Brunswick presbytery, and two years later was transferred to the New York presbytery, preaching in various places. In 1750 he visited Virginia for his health, where his labors proved acceptable and successful. On his return, in October, 1754, as pastor of the Newside church of Hopewell and Maidenhead. During the same year he was moderator of the New York synod, and delivered the opening sermon, with the title "The Faithful Minister Encouraged." Mr. Davenport continued with this part until his death, and lies buried near Pennington, N. J. Whitefield speaks of him as "a sweet, pious soul."—John, son of Abraham, lawyer, b. in Stamford, Conn., 16 Jan., 1732; d. there, 28 Nov., 1830, was graduated at Yale in 1770, and was a tutor there during 1773-4. After studying law, he was admitted to the bar and practised in Stamford. During the Revolutionary war he served in the comissary department, and attained the rank of major. He was elected to congress as a federalist, and served continuously from Dec. 1776, till 9 March, 1787. James son of Abraham, lawyer, b. in Stamford, Conn., 12 Oct., 1758; d. there, 3 Aug., 1797. He was graduated at Yale in 1777, and served in the comissary department in the war of the Revolution. He was a judge of the court of common pleas, and a representative in Dec. 1786, till 3 Aug., 1797. He was a member of the corporation of Yale college from 1793 till 1797, and President Dwight says of him: "Few persons have been more, or more deservedly, esteemed than the Hon. James Davenport."

Davenport, Nicholas T., actor, b. in 1831; d. in Boston, Mass., 26 Aug., 1867. His real name was Deven, and his first appearance on the stage was in 1849, at the Chatham theatre, New York. In September, 1850, he made his first appearance in Philadelphia, at the Arch street theatre, as "Valaire," and "The Landed Gentleman." About one fifth of his life was spent in Boston, where he was connected with a theatre company that was organized in that city. He was a careful and conscientious actor, and maintained a good position in society by his talents and integrity. Mr. Davenport was the last of the great group of actors that flourished in Boston. He was a favorite of the audience, and was long a favorite in the theatre. He was a member of the cast in Boston harbor in July, 1845. He was killed by lightning—His grandson, Addison, jurist, b. in Boston, Mass., 8 Aug., 1760; d. there, 2 April, 1736. He was graduated at Harvard in 1689, visited England, Spain, and the West Indies, and, on his return to Boston, became register of that city for Suffolk county. He was one of the founders of Brattle street church in 1698. He was afterward successively clerk of the house of representatives, supreme court, and court of common pleas, was elected a member of the council, served as a representative in 1711-3, and was judge of the supreme court from 1715 till the time of his death.—His son, Addison, b. in Boston, Mass., 16 May, 1701; d. in London, England, 8 Sept., 1746, was graduated at Harvard in 1719, studied law, and was attorney-general from 1658 till 1662, but turned his attention to the ministry and went into lucrative orders. On his return he became minister of St. Andrew's church, Scituate, Mass., on 15 April, 1730, and remained until 15 April, 1737, when he was chosen assistant minister of the 1st Episcopal church in Boston (his church). From 15 April, 1737, until 8 May, 1740, when he was elected the first rector of Trinity church, Boston. On leaving Scituate he gave his house and land to the Society for propagating the gospel in foreign parts.

Davenport, Thomas, inventor, b. in Williamstown, Vt., 9 July, 1853. He was apprenticed at the age of fourteen to a blacksmith, and his opportunities for education were limited. In 1883 he began the study of electro-magnetism, and in 1885 exhibited a rotary engine driven by electricity, at the Rensselaer institute in Troy, and the Franklin institute in Philadelphia. Late in the year he constructed a small circular railway driven by an electro-magnetic engine. Patents were secured, a company formed, and the manufacture of electro-magnetic engines, as a motive power, begun. But in New York city in 1837, by the dishonesty of its agent, the company became a victim of the fraudulent steam-engine, the repeated reversal of the magnetic poles producing a movement like that of a piston-rod, instead of the rotary motion hitherto employed. Patents were secured, engines manufactured, and he began the publication of a newspaper, "The Electro-Magnet," which was printed on press propelled by one of these engines. His experiments were so numerous and costly as to exhaust his resources, and in 1842 he returned with his family to his home in Brandon, Vt., and thence to Salisbury. In 1846 he turned his attention to the application of small circular railway driven by an electro-magnetic instruments. As applied by him, the impulsive and evanescent nature of the tone is changed at the will of the player into a full, perfect, and prolonged vibration. The caustic protecting this invention were prepared for filing in the U. S. patent-office when.Paravicino, Vice-Admiral Santiago Pontejos, and a large number of the nobility of Lima. After landing the government treasure and silver remittances of the Lima merchants in the port of Perú, he sailed for Tulcán to sail in search of the pirates, whom he met near the King's islands. On 8 June a spirited battle was fought, and the buccaneers were almost defeated, when the want of united action among the Spanish leaders gave the buccaneers an opportunity to escape.

DAVENPORT, William, philanthropist, b. in Culpepper county, Va., 12 Oct., 1770; d. in Walnut Fountain, Caldwell co., N. C., 19 Aug., 1859. About the close of the Revolutionary war he went with his father, Mr. Davenport, to the district of Mitchell county, N. C. He represented Burke county in the legislature in 1800, and was state senator in 1802. He was also justice of the peace, county surgeon, and a colonel of militia. Col. Davenport was the chief founder of Davenport female college, at Lenoir, N. C. He married the widow of Gen. Horace Greeley, Gordon, one of the heroes of King's Mountain.

DAVENPORT, William, soldier, b. in North Carolina; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 12 April, 1858. He was appointed captain in the 16th infantry, 28 Sept., 1812, and distinguished himself at Chippawa and Barren Ford. He was a 1st lieutenant of the 7th infantry, 16 Dec., 1833, lieutenant-colonel of the 1st infantry, 4 April, 1832, and was distinguished at the battle of Bad Axe, under Gen. Atkinson, in the Black Hawk war. He was brevetted colonel "for meritorious service in Florida." 7 July, 1838, was made colonel of the 6th infantry, 14 June, 1842, transferred to the 1st infantry in July, 1843, and resigned 31 Jan., 1850.

DAVENPORT, William, clergyman, b. in Kentucky in 1797; d. in Nebraska City, Neb., 24 June, 1869. He was a slave-holder in early life, but manumitted his slaves before 1834 and removed to Tazewell county, Ill., where he was pastor of the Christian denomination for over thirty years. In 1849 with his brother, The Reverend R. C. bishop, h. near Nantes, France, in 1761; d. in Rostrevor, K., in 1841. At the age of fourteen he was sent to a college by Oratorian priests, after which he entered the diocesan seminary of Nantes. He was ordained deacon in 1788, joined the Petulians, and, after the completion of the seminary of Issy, near Paris, was raised to the priesthood in 1783. Until 1790 he discharged the duties of professor of philosophy and theology in the colleges of his order. During the next two years he was obliged to conceal himself from the terrorists. He was released for this country in 1792, and studied English during the voyage. Bishop Carroll sent him to superintend some missions in the lower part of Maryland. He was the first American priest to institute spiritual retreats for the benefit of the laity. In 1804 he was placed and appointed professor in Georgetown college, where he remained two years. In 1806, in compliance with the desire of the Sulpitians of Baltimore, he accepted a pro-essorship in the theological seminary and college of St. Mary's. Though his health was impaired by his labors, he offered his services to Bishop Flaget, and accompanied him to the west in 1810. He es-established the theological seminary of St. Thomas in Bardstown, Ky., and discharged the office of president, as well as attending several congregations in other parts of the state. Father David also introduced the Sisters of Charity into Kentucky, founded a convent of the order, and was appointed their spiritual director by Bishop Flaget.
He was nominated bishop of Philadelphia, but declined the honor. Yet when Bishop Flaget petitioned the pope, in 1817, to appoint him coadjutor of the diocese of Bardstown, he reluctantly accepted the place. In 1823 he obtained a charter from the legislature of Kentucky, raising the college he had founded to the rank of a university. Bishop David published a large number of works, chiefly controversial or religious, and translations from French. The most prominent of these were "Vindications of the Catholic Doctrine concerning the Use and Veneration of Images," "Address to his Brethren of other Professions," "On the Rule of Faith," "True Piety, or the Day Well Spent," and a Catholic Bible.

DAVIDSON, William Pleater, actor, b. near Ludgate Hill, London, England, 17 April, 1814.

He joined an amateur dramatic society, and made his first appearance, at Drury Lane theatre, in the minor part of James in "The Miller's Maid." He appears in "Nottingham in 1839," and visited London, on 26 Sept. of that year, in the "Haunted Tower." After acting in various parts of Great Britain, he settled in Manchester, and in 1850 came to the United States, where he made his first appearance in the old Broadway theatre, New York, as "Hamlet," the hero of the melodrama 184. He supported the popular stars of the day—Edwin Forrest, Gustavus V. Brooke, Julia Dean, Lola Montez, and others—and, after leaving the old Broadway theatre in 1855, made a tour through the country. He was a member of F. B. Conway's "star combination," and in 1863 was one of Mrs. John Wood's company at the Olympic theatre, where he remained two seasons. He afterward took part in the Shakespearean revivals at Winter Garden theatre, and, in August, 1867, appeared as Eccles, in "Caste," at the new Broadway theatre near Broome street. He was at Daly's Fifth avenue theatre from 1866 till 1877, then travelled with Miss Fanny Davenport's company, and in 1879 was the original Dick Deadeye, in "Pinafore," at the Standard theatre. In 1885 he became a member of the Madison square theatre company. Davidson has played David in the Broadway theatre for one thousand parts during his career, and played them all with zeal, intelligence, and humor. Among his best parts, besides those already mentioned, are Bishopriggs in "Man and Wife," Old Harry in the "Belles Stratagem," Hardcastle in "She Stoops to Conquer," Crockett in "The Good and the Natural Man." In Shakespeare's comedies he has been successful as Caliban, Touchstone, Dog-tingeham, England, 9 May, 1855. He came to the United States in 1883, and was graduated at the Central high-school in Philadelphia in 1843, standing first in his class. While a student he had shown interest in scientific work, and had assisted Alexander D. Bache in his observations of the magnetic elements at Girard college. On his graduation he became the secretary of Prof. Bache, who had been appointed superintendent of the coast-survey. In 1846-50 he was occupied in geodetic field-work, and in astronomy, serving in the different eastern states. In 1850 he went to Caliifornia under the auspices of the coast-survey, and was for several years engaged in the determination of the latitude and longitude of prominent capes, bays, etc., and of the magnetic elements of the Pacific coast, reporting also upon the proper locawas professor of Greek in Mount Zion college, Winnisboro, S. C., and in 1859 became principal of Carolina high-school, Columbia. In 1862–3 he was adjutant of infantry in Jackson's corps of Lee's army. He left the army in 1861, and lived two years in Washington, D. C., and in 1866 in New York city, where he was literary editor of the "Evening Post" in 1873, and American correspondent of the London "Standard," in 1873–8. He removed to Figulus, Dade co., Fla., in 1884, where he continued business, and was engaged in fruit-culture. In 1885 he was a member of the Florida constitutional convention. Mr. Davidson has published "Living Writers of the South" (New York, 1869); "School History of South Carolina" (Columbia, 1869; new ed., 1880); and "The Correspondent" (New York, 1880); and has edited "Lyrics and Sketches," by William M. Martin (1865), and "The Educational Year-Book" (1872). He has in preparation a "Dictionary of Southern Authors," and "Helen of Troy," a fiction of Homeric times.

DAVIDSON, John Wynn, soldier, b. in Fairfax county, Va., 18 Aug., 1824; d. in St. Paul, Minn., 26 June, 1881. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1845, assigned to the 1st dragoons, and accompanied Gen. Kearny to California in 1846, in charge of a battery, during the Mexican war he served in the Army of the West, being present at the battles of San Pasqual, San Bernardo, San Gabriel, and Mesa. He was a scout in 1850, and was at the action of Clear Lake, 15 May, and at Russian River, 17 June, under Capt. Nathaniel Lyon. From this time until the civil war he continued on frontier and garrison duty. He fought the battle of Cieneguilla, New Mexico, on 30 March, 1854, against the Apache and Utah Indians, losing three fourths of his command, and, being himself wounded. He was promoted to captain on 20 Jan., 1855, to major on 14 Nov., 1861, and, serving in defence of Washington, was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers on 3 Feb., 1862. In the Virginia peninsular campaign of 1862 he commanded a brigade in Gen. Smith's division, and received two brevets for gallant conduct—that of lieutenant-colonel for the battle of Gaines's Mill, and that of colonel for Golding's Farm. He was also engaged at Lee's Mills, Mechanicsville, Savage Station, and Glendale. He commanded the St. Louis district of Missouri from 6 Aug., till 13 Nov., 1862, the Army of Southeast Missouri till 29 Feb., 1863, and the St. Louis district again till 6 June, co-operating with Gen. Steele in his Little Rock expedition and directing the movements of troops against Pilot Knob and Fredericktown, and in the pursuit of the enemy during Marmaduke's raid into Missouri. He led a cavalry division from June till September, commanded in the actions at Brownsville, Bayou Metre, and Ashley's Mills, Ark., and took part in the capture of Little Rock. He was made chief of cavalry of the military division west of the Mississippi on 26 June, 1864, and on 24 Nov. led a cavalry expedition into Texas. He was brevetted brigadier-general in the regular army on 13 March, 1865, for the capture of Little Rock, and major-general for his services during the war. He was made lieutenant-colonel of the 10th cavalry on 1 Dec., 1866, was acting inspector-general of the Department of the Missouri from November, 1866, till December, 1867, and professor of military science in Kansas agricultural college from 1868 till 1871. He then commanded various posts in Idaho and Texas, and, in 1877–8, the district of Upper Brazos, Tex. On 26 March, 1879, he was made colonel of the 2d cavalry.
DAVIDSON, Lucretia Maria, poet, b. in Plattsburg, N. Y., 27 Sept., 1808; d. there, 27 Aug., 1825. Her father, Oliver Davidson, was a physician, and her mother, Margaret Miller, was an author. A volume of selections from Mrs. Davidson's writings was published, with a preface by Miss C. M. Sedgwick, in 1844, after the poems of her daughter had made them famous. Lucretia, when four years old, was sent to Plattsburg academy, where she learned to read and to form the Roman letters, and soon afterward her mother observed that her writing paper was disappearing strangely, and finally discovered a pile of little blank-books, containing artfully sketched pictures, with descriptions in poetry, all printed in Roman letters, turned and twisted in curious fashion. The child was so mortified at the discovery of what she had been doing that she burned all her work. She learned to write in her seventh year, and developed a great fondness for reading. Before she was twelve she had read much history, and the dramatic works of Shakespeare, Goldsmith, and Kotzebue, with many peculiar novels and romances. She continued to write poetry, and, when nine years old, composed an "Epitaph on a Robin," which is the earliest remaining specimen of her verse. She wrote poetry rapidly, when in the mood, but preferred to be alone while composing, often burning an unfinished piece that had been seen by others. She was fond of childish sports, but would often stop in the midst of them to write, when struck with an idea for a poem. When about fourteen years old she was allowed to attend a ball in Plattsburg, but, in the midst of her preparations, was found sitting in a corner writing verses on "What the World Calls Pleasure." Her mother's friends advised that pen and ink be kept from her, and, hearing of this, she voluntarily gave up her favorite pursuit for several months, till her mother, seeing that she grew melancholy, advised her to resume it. In October, 1824, a gentleman visiting Plattsburg saw some of her verses, and offered to give her a better education than her parents could afford. She was accordingly sent to Mrs. Willard's school in Troy, N. Y., but her studies terminated her health, and she returned home. After her recovery she was sent to Miss Gilbert's school in Albany, but remained there only about three months before she was taken home to die. Miss Davidson was a small, delicately formed brunette; "She had all the elements of personal beauty," wrote Mrs. Willard, "yet she was so shy that many a girl less perfectly endowed in that respect would be sooner noticed by a stranger." Her poetical writings include beside the numbers of pieces destroyed by her, 278 poems of various lengths. Among these are five pieces, of several cantos each. The poet Southey said of her: "In our own language, except in the cases of Chatterton and Kirke White, we can call to mind no instance of so early, so ardent, and so fatal a pursuit of intellectual advancement." Her poems are an author. The sketch by S. F. B. Morse, under the title "Amir Khan, and Other Poems" (New York, 1829; new ed., edited by her brother, M. O. Davidson, with illustrations by Darley, 1871). See a biography by Catharine M. Sedgwick in Sparks's "American Biographies," vol. vii. b. in Plattsburg, N. Y., 26 March, 1823; d. in Saratoga, N. Y., 28 Nov., 1888, had the same sensibility and precocity, and began to write at six years of age. At ten, while visiting in New York, she wrote, in two days, a drama entitled the "Tragedy of Alcantha," acted in it by her friends, taking the principal part. Notwithstanding her sister's fate, her intellectual activity was not restrained. Her poems were introduced to the world by Washington Irving, and the works of the two sisters were afterward published together (New York, 1830).—Their brother, Levi P., b. in 1817; d. in Saratoga, N. Y., 27 June, 1842, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1837, assigned to the 1st dragoons, and after serving on frontier duty at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., and Fort Wayne, Indian Territory, was killed in the discovery of an enemy's camp in 1840. He wrote verses with elegance and ease.

DAVIDSON, Robert, educator, b. in Elkton, Md., in 1750; d. 18 Dec., 1812. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1771, appointed instructor there in 1773, and in 1774 was given the chair of history and geography. In the latter year he was also licensed to preach, and a year later was ordained by the second Philadelphia presbytery, becoming Dr. Ewing's assistant in the first church. In 1775 he composed a metrical dialogue, which was recited at commencement before the new Medical institution in Philadelphia, with which he retired to Delaware. In 1784 he was appointed vice-president of the newly organized Dickinson college, Carlisle, Pa., and given the chair of history and belles-lettres there, also acting as pastor of the Presbyterian church in Carlisle. He held this last-named position till his death, which occurred in 1797, and was followed by his tact in harmonizing the discordant elements in his congregation. In 1794 he preached twice before troops on their way to suppress the whiskey insurrection, and in 1799 delivered a eulogy of Washington. After Dr. Nibert's death in 1804, Dr. Davidson discharged the duties of president of the college till 1809, when he resigned. He had a high reputation as a scholar, but was especially fond of astronomy, and invented an ingenious cosmosphere or compound globe. He was also a skillful draughtsman, and was the composer of several pieces of scientific notation. In 1791 he published an "Epitome of Geography, in Verse," for the use of schools (1794); "The Christian's A, B, C," or the 119th psalm in metre, each stanza beginning with a different letter (1811); and a "New Musical Translation of the Psalm," with musical notations (1812).—His son, Robert, clergyman, b. in Carlisle, Pa., 23 Feb., 1808; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 6 April, 1876, was graduated at Dickinson college in 1828, and at Princeton theological seminary in 1831. He was pastor of the second Presbyterian church in Carlisle. Among the latter year became president of Transylvania university there. After his resignation in 1842 he held pastorates in New Brunswick, N. J., in 1843–59, New York city in 1860–64, and Huntington, L. L., in 1864–9, removing to Philadelphia in the latter year. Mr. Davidson was for a quarter of a century a member of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions, was permanent clerk of the general assembly in 1845–50, and in 1869 was a delegate to the general assembly of the Presbyterian church in Scotland, in Edinburgh.

DAVIDSON, Thomas, philologist, b. in the parish of Deer, Aberdeenshire, Scotland, 25 Oct., 1840. He was graduated at the University of Aberdeen in 1860, being a first graduate and Greek prizeman. From 1860 till 1865 he was rector of the grammar (Latin) school of Old Aberdeen, and from 1865 till 1886 master in several English schools, spending his vacations on the continent. In 1886 he removed to Canada, to occupy a place in the London collegiate institute. In the following year he came to the United States, and, after spending some months in Boston, removed to Louis, where, in addition to work on the New York “Round Table” and the “Western Educational Monthly,” he was classical master in the St. Louis high-school, and subsequently principal of one of the branch high-schools. In 1879 he removed to Cambridge, Mass. For some years he represented Greece especially in Greece and Italy. In the former country he devoted himself mainly to archeology and modern Greek, in the latter to the study of the Catholic church, of scholastic philosophy, of Dante, and of Rosmini. For studying the Catholic church unsatyzedly, he opened to life a chiefdom by the Princess Caroline of Sayn-Wittgenstein and Cardinal Hohenlohe, who offered him a pension in his episcopal palace at Albano, and also in the villa D’Este at Tivoli. His interest in Thomas Aquinas having come of ages of the pope through Bishop (now Cardinal) Schiaffino, he was invited to the Vatican, where the holy father suggested that he should settle in Rome and aid his professors in editing the new edition of St. Thomas. For more than a year he lived at Domodossola, in Italy, and engaged in the Institute of charity founded by Rosmini, has its novitiate. Here he produced the work that first brought Rosmini to the notice of English-speaking students: “The Philosophical System of Antonio Rosmini-Serbati, translated, with a Sketch of the Author’s Life, Bibliography, Notes, and Illustrations” (London, 1859). At the same time he wrote essays on classical subjects, mainly archeological, published under the title “The Parthenon Frieze and Other Essays” (London, 1882). He also translated “Rosmini’s Psychology” (3 vols., London, 1884). In 1880 he occupied a villa in Capri, and there translated Rosmini’s “Anthropology.” Mr. Davidson has been a frequent contributor to periodicals, and delivered courses of lectures, before the Lowell institute in Boston and elsewhere, on modern Greece, on Greek sculpture, etc. He was mainly instrumental in persuading the Fellows of the New Life,” which has branches in London and New York. He speaks French, German, Italian, and modern Greek. Besides the works named, Mr. Davidson has published “The Fragments of Parmenides,” in English hexameters, with introduction and notes (St. Louis, 1869); “The Origin of the Dargon,” from the German of W. H. J. Bleek (New York, 1869); “A Short Account of the Niobe Group” (New York, 1874); “The Place of Art in Education” (Boston, 1889); “Giordano Bruno, and the Relation of his Philosophy to the army after the battle at Cambrai, and the hand-Book to Dante, from the Italian of Scartazzini, with Notes and Additions” (Boston, 1887).

DAVIDSON, William, soldier, b. in Lancaster county, Pa., in 1746; killed at the battle of Cowan’s Ford, N. C., 1 Feb., 1781. His father removed with his family to Brunswick county, N. C., in 1750, and William, the youngest son, was educated at Queen’s museum, afterward Liberty hall, Charlotte. At the beginning of the Revolution he was appointed major in one of the first regiments raised in North Carolina, and was in the engagements at Brandywine, Germantown, and Monmouth. In November, 1779, he was detached to re-enforce the army of Gen. Lincoln in the south, at which time he commanded his regiment with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. In an engagement with a party of loyalists, near Caiston’s Mill, a ball passed through his body; but he took the field eight weeks later, with the rank of brigadier-general conferred on him by the state of North Carolina, and exerted himself to interrupt the progress of Cornwallis. Detached by Gen. Greene on 31 Jan., 1781, to guard the wagon ford chosen by Cornwallis for his night passage of the Catawba, Gen. Davidson posted himself on the bank of the river with 250 men. The British army forced its way across, reserving its fire until it had reached the bank, when the militia fled. Gen. Davidson was the last on the field, and was prostrated by a wound through the breast. Congress voted $500 for a monument to him, but it has never been erected. Davidson college, N. C., is named in his honor, and his sword hangs in one of its halls.

DAVIE, William Richardson, soldier, b. in Egremont, near Whitehaven, England, 20 June, 1756; d. in Camden, S. C., 8 Nov., 1820. He came to this country with his father in 1763, and was adopted by his uncle, Rev. William Richardson, who lived near the Catawba, in South Carolina. Young Davie was graduated at Princeton, in the autumn of 1776, after serving with a party of his fellow-students as a volunteer in the vicinities of New York during the summer of that year. He then began to study law in Salisbury, N. C., but was commissioned lieutenant of a newly organized company of cavalry, in the winter of 1779, and, succeeding to the command of the troop, joined Pulaski’s legion and rose to the rank of major. At the battle of Stono Ferry, 12 June, 1779, he received a severe wound in the thigh, and on his recovery returned to Salisbury, resumed his studies, and was admitted to the bar in September, 1779. In the winter of 1780 he raised a body of cavalry, spent in its equipment the last shilling of the estate bequeathed to him by his uncle, and with this force protected the southwestern part of the state from the attacks of the British in South Carolina. He fought in the battles at Hanging Rock and Rocky Mount, did good service in saving the remnant of the army after its defeat at Camden, and on 5 Sept., 1780, was appointed colonel commanding the cavalry in North Carolina. He surprised the enemy at Wahab’s plantation, and when Cornwallis entered Charlotte, N. C., he withstood three charges by Tarleton’s squadron, in the presence of the whole British army, and then retired in good order. In 1781 Col. Davie, yielding his hopes of gaining additional honor in the field, accepted, at the urgent request of Gen. Greene, the post of commissary-general of the southern army, and, by his zeal, influence, and skill, raised it to a high position, and, added much to the success of the military operations that followed. After the war he settled at Halifax, N. C., in the practice of his profession, and, by his sagacity and eloquence, soon rose to eminence. He served many terms in the legislature, and was a member of the convention that framed the Federal constitution, favoring the equal representation of the states in the national senate, and the taking into account of the slaves in assigning representatives to the south. His name does not appear as a signer of the document, as he was called home by illness but he was one of its most earnest defenders in the North Carolina convention that followed. He drew up the act for establishing the University of North Carolina, which, after much opposition, was passed in 1789, and was active in its formation and support. As architect of its buildings, the choice of professors, and the arrangement of studies, received his personal attention. He was influential in securing the cession of the present state of Tennessee, was three times a commissioner to settle boundary disputes between North and South Carolina, and in 1794 was made major-general of militia. He was elected governor of the state in 1799, but before the close of his term was sent by President Adams, with Oliver Ellsworth and William V. Murray, on a special embassy to the French government, the result of which was the cession and purchase of the cession of New Orleans for $15,000,000. President Jefferson appointed him to treat with the Tuscara Indians in 1802. In 1803 he was an unsuccessful candidate for congress, and after his defeat he withdrew to his farm at the Catawba river, S. C., where he spent the rest of his days, declining a further commission. The New South was in 1813 on the point of falling heir. He was a man of commanding appearance and dignified yet affable manners. See his life, by Fordye M. Hubbard, in Sparks’s ‘American Biographies.’

DAVIES, Charles, mathematician, b. in Washington, completed college, Conn., 22 Jan., 1798; d. in Fishkill Landing, N. Y., 17 Sept., 1876. When a boy he removed with his father to a farm in St. Lawrence county, N. Y., then an unsettled part of the state. He entered the U. S. military academy in December, 1813, graduating in December, 1815, and was assigned to the light artillery. After brief service in New England garrisons, he was transferred to the engineer corps in 1816, and ordered to duty at West Point, but resigned on 1 Dec., 1816, and became principal assistant professor of mathematics and natural and experimental philosophy. He was made full professor of mathematics on 1 May, 1823, and held the office till 31 May, 1837, when he was forced to resign by ill-health consequent upon overwork in preparing his mathematical text-books. A trip to Europe for his health, and the loss of his chair of mathematics in Trinity college, Hartford, Conn., holding it from 1839 till 1841, when he was again forced to resign by threatened illness, and was appointed paymaster in the U. S. army, with the staff rank of major. He served as treasurer of the U. S. Mint in 1862, and in 1848 became professor of mathematics and philosophy in the University of New York. In the following year he retired to Fishkill Landing, on the Hudson, that he might have leisure to complete his series of textbooks. After teaching in the Normal school at Albany, he was made professor of higher mathematics in Columbia college, 18 May, 1857, and in June, 1865, emeritus professor. His works, which are distinguished by plainness and close logical arrangement, include an entire series of textbooks in his difficult science, extending from a primary arithmetic to the higher mathematics, and including, in addition to Legendre’s “Geometry” (1840) and Bourdon’s “Algebra” (1851). Among his more advanced works are “Descriptive Geometry” (New York, 1855); “Surveying and Navigation” (1855); “Elements of Algebra” (1851); “Logic and Utility of Mathematics” (1851); and a “Mathematical Dictionary,” written in conjunction with his son-in-law, Prof. William G. Peck, of Columbia (1854). His last work was a treatise on “The Measuring System” (1870).—His brother, Henry Eugene, b. in Black Lake, near Ogdensburg, N. Y., 8 Feb., 1805; d. in New York city, 17 Dec., 1881, spent his early years upon his father’s farm, and, after receiving a course of non-school education, the erection of buildings, the choice of professors, and the arrangement of studies, received his personal attention. He was influential in securing the cession of the present state of Tennessee, was three times a commissioner to settle boundary disputes between North and South Carolina, and in 1794 was made major-general of militia. the battle of Corinth on 3–4 Oct., and commanded the district of Columbus, Ky., in 1863–3, that of Rolla, Mo., in 1863–4, that of Namath, Kansas, in 1864–5, and that of Wisconsin from April till June, 1865. He was brevetted major-general of volunteers on 11 July, 1865, and shortly afterward returned to New York city. He has published "Cosmology: or Mysteries of Creation," an analysis of the law of descent, 1858; "Adam and Ha-Adam" (1859); "Genesisc Discovered" (1860); "Answer to Hugh Miller and Theoretical Geologists" (1861); "How to make Money, and How to keep it" (1866); and "Appeal of a Leyman to the Committee on the Revision of the English Version of the Holy Scriptures, to have Adam and Ha-Adam restored to the English Genesis where left out by former Translators" (1875).—Henry Eugene's son, Henry Eugene, lawyer, b. in New York city, 2 July, 1838, was educated at Harvard, Williams, and Columbia, where he was graduated in 1857. He then studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began practice. He entered the army in April, 1861, as a captain in the 5th New York volunteers, became major in the 2d New York cavalry in July, and subsequently its colonel. He was made brigadier general of volunteers on 16 Sept., 1863, and served with distinction in the cavalry corps of the Army of the Potomac till the close of the war. He was brevetted major general of volunteers, 1 Oct., 1864, given his full commission on 4 March, 1865, and commanded the middle district of Alabama till his resignation on 1 Jan., 1866. He was public administrator of New York city in 1866–9, assistant district attorney of the southern district of New York in 1870–2, and since 1873 has been engaged in law practice.

DAVIES, Robert, merchant, b. in Charlottetown, Prince Edward island, 4 May, 1845. He was educated at the Central academy and Prince of Wales college, Charlottetown, and was admitted to the bar in 1868. He was solicitor-general of his native province in 1868, and again in 1872–3, was the leader of the opposition in the legislative assembly until September, 1876, when he became premier and attorney general, which portfolios he retained till 1879, when his administration resigned. He was elected to the local legislature in 1872, and re-elected from time to time to the general, and was re-elected to the lower house of the dominion parliament in 1886. He was elected to the representation of Queen's county, Prince Edward island, in the dominion parliament, and still (1896) represents that constituency. He was counsel for the tenantry of Prince Edward island, before the land commission, presided over by the Right Hon. C. E. Childers, which sat at Halifax, N. S., in 1877, under articles of the Washington treaty. He is a liberal.

DAVIES, Marianne, musician, b. in New England about 1736; d. in London in 1792. She was the elder of two sisters, both of whom made a European reputation as musicians. They were daughters of a Welshwoman, whose husband, a Welshman, had achieved some distinction as a performer on the harpsichord and piano, but about 1762 acquired much greater repute for her skill on the harmonica or musical glasses, which had then been recently improved by Franklin. She was subsequently compelled to relinquish her profession on account of the plain. A woman's nerves of constant playing upon the harmonica. This was so frequent a result of its use that it was banished from many continental towns by official prohibition.—Her sister, Cecilia, a soprano vocalist, b. in London, England, 3 July, 1736, visited Europe in company with Marianne with whom she always resided. Her first public appearance was made at the concert-room, Dean street, Soho, London, 28 April, 1766. After a successful career in the English metropolis, Cecilia and Marianne left England in 1780, and visited Paris and Vienna. While they were in the latter city Metastasio wrote, and Hasse composed the music for, an ode that was sung by Cecilia, accompanied by Marianne on the harmonica. In a letter dated 16 Jan., 1774, the poet describes the beautiful tone of the instrument to the Duke of Brunswick in which Cecilia assimilated her voice to it, making it difficult to distinguish the one from the other. From Vienna the sisters went to Milan, where the younger appeared with great success, in 1771, in the opera of "Ruggiero," by Metastasio and Hasse. Cecilia was the first English-speaking woman to visit in 1747, and Italians accorded the rank of prima donna, bestowing on her the sobriquet "l'Inglese," and admitting her to be the superior of any Italian singer of that time, except Gabrielli. Cecilia afterward sang in Florence, and returned in 1779 to London, where she appeared in several successful operas. Her voice is described as being deficient in both power and volume, but she possessed a neat and facile execution. She revisited Florence, and sang there until 1784, when she once more returned to England, and retired from the stage after the death of her sister. About 1817 she published a collection of six songs by Hasse, Jommelli, Galuppi, and others. She lingered until her ninety-sixth year, borne down by the accumulated weight of years, disease, and poverty. eighteen months before his death. He was a fine pulpit orator, and published numerous sermons, a collection of which appeared after his death (London, 1767) and passed through several editions, both in this country and in Great Britain, one of which (3 vols., New York, 1851) contains an essay on the "Life and Times of Davies" by the Rev. Dr. Grove. The books were written to merit, including an elegy on his old preceptor, Samuel Blair. His son, William, leaving Princeton college in 1765, entered the army, became inspector-general under Steuben in 1778, and enjoyed the friendship of Washington. He was afterward in the auditor's office, in Richmond, Va.

DAVIES, Thomas, clergyman, b. in Kinton, Herefordshire, England, 21 Dec., 1736; d. in New Milford, Conn., 12 May, 1796. His grandfather, John Davies, emigrated from England about 1740, and settled at Davies Hollow, then a part of Litchfield, Conn., but now in the town of Southbury, Conn. He was the first Episcopalian in the town, and by his efforts the present parish of St. Michael's was organized in 1745. He gave it a tract of land, and contributed largely to the erection of a church. This is the first church in the present St. Michael's church, Litchfield. Thomas was graduated at Yale in 1758, and ordained by the bishop of Canterbury on 23 Aug., 1761. He then returned to this country with a commission from the Society for propagating the gospel in foreign parts, to the new parishes of Roxbury, Sharon, New Preston, New Fairfield, and Litchfield. Here he labored zealously, holding occasional services also in other towns. Though he met with many obstacles from the intolerance of the times, he overcame them by his prudent and calm manner of conducting affairs. The Episcopal church in that part of the state was largely due to his labors. The church at New Milford and several others were built under his care.

DAVISS, Joseph Hamilton, lawyer, b. in Bedford county, Va., 4 March, 1774; killed in the battle of Tippecanoe, 7 Nov., 1811. He accompanied his parents in 1779 to Kentucky, where they settled first in Lincoln county and then near Danville. Young Daviss received his education in an academy at Harrodsburg, becoming an excellent classical and mathematical scholar, and afterward pursued his studies in the study of law. He served for six months as a volunteer in the Indian campaign of 1793, and then studied law. In 1795 he was admitted to the bar and, settling in Danville, entered on a career that made his name a household word in the west. Being a federalist, he was excluded from any hope of political advancement, and consequently devoted himself to his profession and attained a high position at the bar. His eccentricities made him famous. Instead of "riding the circuit," he used to shoulder his rifle and range the woods from town to town; and he usually appeared in court in a hunting costume. In 1799 he acted as second to John Rowan in a duel in which Rowan's antagonist was killed, when both principal and seconds fled to avoid prosecution. Daviss was for some time a fugitive; but, after having been in the Union military service, he appeared in court as his counsel, and secured his acquittal. It is said that he was the first western lawyer that ever argued a case in the U. S. supreme court. He came to Washington in a dilapidated hunting uniform, gained an important suit, and returned home by land, without much expense. About this time he married a sister of Chief Justice Marshall, and afterward became U. S. attorney for Kentucky, in which capacity, on 3 Nov., 1806, he moved for an order requiring Burr to appear and answer to a charge of levying war against a nation with which the United States was at peace. The judge overruled the motion; but Burr appeared in court next day and requested that the motion be granted. After this was accomplished, Burr, with his counsel, Henry Clay, Peter Kembly, and the other witnesses upon whom the prosecution relied could not be brought into court, and it was impossible to sustain the charges. This event almost entirely destroyed the popularity of Davies, which even the subsequent revelation of Burr's plot could not fully restore. In 1811 he joined the army of General William H. Harrison as major of Kentucky volunteer dragoons, and served in the campaign against the northwestern Indians. In the battle of Tippecanoe, seeing that an exposed angle of the line was likely to give way before a determined assault, he led a cavalry charge at the head of the savages at that point. The manoeuvre was completely successful, but Maj. Daviss fell, shot through the breast. Counties in Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, and Missouri have been named for him. He published "A View of the National Conduct concerning the Conspiracy of 1806" (1807).

DÁVILA, Gil González (dah-vee-lah), Spanish-American author, b. in Ávila, Peru, in 1570; d. in Madrid, Spain, in 1638. He was an attendant of Cardinal Deza at Rome, studied there, and returned to Spain, where he published several works that met with public approval, and was appointed prebendary of the cathedral of Salamanca, chronicler of Castile, and in 1612 chronicler of Spanish America. His publications include "Historia de las antigüedades de Salamanca" (1606); "La vida de Don Alonso Torquemada" (1611); "Teatro de las grandes de Madrid" (1625); "Vida de rey de Castilla Don Enrique III." (1688); "Teatro de las iglesias de España" (1640); and "Teatro de las iglesias de las Indias Occidentales, sus arzobispado y obispado y cosas memorables" (2 vols., 1640-49). He left unpublished works, including "La vida de Felipe III." He was the first to write the ecclesiastical history of Spanish America.

DÁVILA, Népmuceno, naturalist, b. in Castro Urdiales, Spain, in 1774; d. in the Republic of Mexico in 1847. He was born in Madrid in May, 1774, and devoted his whole energy to the foundation of a convent for his order. In 1619 he became a novice at the Convent of Cortina, and finally a priest in 1620. He was the leader of the expedition in 1620, and devoted his whole energy to the foundation of a convent for his order. In 1619 he acquired for $5,000, from the Count of Cortina, the title-deed of the ground on which afterward the convent of San Augustin was built, which to-day is occupied by the National library. But he did not live to see his work finished, as in 1640 he was thrown, by order of the Inquisition, into its dungeons, on a charge of sorcery, and died after seven years of incarceration and torture. Dávila was a close student of natural history, especially the Mexican fauna, and wrote several treatises, of which the most notable one is "Afinidades entre algunas plantas y los mamíferos." The principal cause of his imprisonment was, besides his advanced ideas about the sensibility of plants and the intelligence of animals, regarding as dangerous existing between them, the finding in his cell of many dried and stuffed animals, and collections of plants, as Dávila devoted his leisure to studies of the animal and vegetable kingdoms. He wrote also the following works, which have never been published, but which were preserved at the National library of Mexico: "Un año de caza en Sierra Madre," "Los Amigos del Pacífico," "Los Fósiles de la Mesa Central," and "Los Paquidermos de América." DÁVILA, Pedro Franco, Spanish-American naturalist, b. in Guayaquil in 1713; d. in 1785. He went to Paris in 1748, and there formed an extensive cabinet of natural history, which, under his management, became one of the finest in Europe. He belonged to the Royal society of Madrid, the Royal society of London, and the societies of Berlin and Paris. His catalogue of his cabinet is held in high estimation.

DÁVILA Y PADILLA, Agustín, Mexican historian, b. in the city of Mexico in 1562; d. in 1604. He was a Dominican lecturer on philosophy and theology in the colleges of Puebla and Mexico, and became archbishop of Santo Domingo in 1601. He visited Rome and Spain to represent the Dominicans of Mexico, and was appointed preacher of the king, Philip III. He left several works, including "Historia de la Provincia de Santiago de México de la orden de Predicadores," and "Historia de las antigüedades de los indios.

DAVION, Antony, clergyman, b. in Isigny, Normandy; d. in New Orleans in 1727. He was educated in the seminary of the Foreign missions, Paris, and after his ordination embarked for Quebec, where he established a church in Quebec, and continued a year in this place. In the early part of 1700 he went to the Mississippi, and in July reached Biloxi. He then labored among the Tonica tribe, but after a time was compelled to take refuge in a French fort. In 1704 the Tonica were destroyed by Mobile, where he was stationed, begging him to come back to them, and he returned. He was allowed to preach without interruption, but, finding them deaf to his appeals, he destroyed their temple and quenched their sacred fires. He was at once compelled to fly from the village; but the Tonica had become much attached to him, and invited him to return again. He made few converts among them, although he persuaded the chief to be baptized in 1716 and to wear European costume. On leaving the Tonica he went to New Orleans.

Davison, John, spiritualist, b. in Orange county, N. Y., 11 Aug., 1828. His youth was passed in hard labor, and with little education, owing to the extreme poverty of his parents. In 1843 Mr. Levinton, of Poughkeepsie, is said to have developed him in extraordinary clairvoyant powers. Although quite uninstructed, it was said that he was able to discourse fluently upon medical, psychological, and general subjects. On 7 March, 1844, he fell into a trance, which lasted sixteen hours, during which time he asserted he conversed with spiritual beings and received instructions as to his future teaching from the interior state. In November, 1845, while clairvoyant, he dictated to the Rev. William Fishbough, in New York, his first work, "The Principles of Nature, her Divine Revelations, and a Voice to Mankind." This book contains a wide range of subjects, and rejects any especial authority in the teachings of the Bible. Mr. Davis has been more successful as a writer than as a lecturer, and has been principally instrumental in promoting the movement of "Spiritualism." The philosophical and theological portions of his writings are interspersed with startling assertions concerning things in heaven and earth which admit of no verification. These works are "The Great Harmonia" (3 vols., New York, 1850-51); "Philosophy of Spiritual intercourse" (1851); "The Present Age and Inner Life," a sequel (1854; 3d ed., Boston, 1870); "The Approaching Crisis," a review of Dr. Bushnell on Spiritualism (New York, 1853); "The Penetration" (Boston, 1856); "The Magic Staff" an autobiography (New York, 1857); "The Harbingers of Health" (1862); "Appetites and Passions" (Boston, 1863); "The World's True Redeemer" (1868); "Principles of Nature" (2d ed., 1868); "Morning Lectures" (1866); "Tale of a Physician" (1867); "Stellar Key to the Summer Land" (1867); "Arabia" (1868); "Memoranda of Persons, Places, and Events" (1868); "The Fountain, with New Jets of Meaning" (1870); and "Mental Diseases and Disorders of the Brain" (New York, 1871).

DAVIS, Asahel, antiquary, b. in Massachusetts in 1791. He published an address on "The Discovery of America by the Northmen" (1840), and "Ancient America and Researches of the East" (New York, 1847).

DAVIS, Benjamin Franklin, soldier, b. in Alabama in 1822; d. at Beverly Ford, Va., 9 June, 1865. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1854, and distinguished himself in both the infantry and cavalry service in New Mexico. In 1862 he became colonel of the 8th New York cavalry. He was instantly killed while commanding a brigade at the battle of Beverly Ford.

DAVIS, Caroline E., author, b. in Northwood, N. H., in 1831. Her maiden name was Kelly, and under that name she first gained reputation. She resided in Exeter, N. H., until her marriage in 1867, when she removed to Andover, Mass. She has written a large number of books for children, school libraries, founded on her experience as teacher in a mission-school. Her works include "The Child's Bible Stories" (4 vols.); "Little Sermon Talks"; "No Cross, No Crown"; and many other attractive books for children.

DAVIS, Charles, lawyer, b. in Mansfield, Conn., 1 Jan., 1789; d. in Vermont in 1863. His ancestors were Puritans, who had emigrated from England early in the 17th century and settled in Mansfield, where his father resided until 1792, when he removed to Rockingham, Vt. He was graduated at Middlebury College in 1811, studied law under Mr. Chipman, of Middlebury, and in 1814 was admitted to the bar. During his residence there he became engaged in the exciting political subjects connected with the war of 1812-5, and for some years edited the Vermont State, a paper favoring that war. He always advocated the duty of defending the country, however, and often served in the militia. In 1816 Judge Davis removed to Barton, Orleans co., and in 1818 to Waterbury, Conn. He settled in Danville in 1828, and was elected state's attorney for the county of Caledonia, which office he held seven years, and was re-elected in 1838. In 1841-5 he was U. S. district attorney of Vermont, and in 1845 was elected judge of probate for the district of Caledonia, and re-elected in 1846. A bill was passed in that year for the election of an additional judge of the superior court, and the place was offered to him. His opinions were published in the 19th and 20th volumes of the "Vermont Reports." He was chosen to be a representative in the state legislature, although the majority of the town were opposed to the Whig party, of which he was a leading member. His works are "The Great Harmonia," "Philosophy of Spiritual intercourse," "The Present Age and Inner Life," "The Approaching Crisis," and other tracts.

DAVIS, Charles Augustus, merchant, b. in New York in 1795; d. there, 27 Jan., 1867. For many years he was in the iron trade with Sidney Brooks, and in a letter to Haleck, written from Athens, he says: "I do not know how I can go back to business and pig iron in John street." He was well versed in commercial and financial affairs, and wrote brilliantly and intelligently upon those subjects. The "Peter Sibers Letter" and "Major Jack Downing's Letters" (New York, 1834), first published in the "Commercial Advertiser," detail his interviews with President Jackson and the plans for overthrowing the U.S. bank. For many years, his house in New York was the resort of the poet Halleck and other of the Knickerbocker writers.

DAVIS, Charles Henry Stanley, physician, b. in Goshen, Conn., 4 March, 1840. He received his medical degree at the University of Maryland and at the medical-school of the New York university, where he was graduated in 1865. He studied afterward in the hospitals of New York and Boston, Paris and London, and settled in Meriden, Conn. He was a member of the Connecticut state legislature in 1873, 1884, and in 1885. He has travelled extensively in Europe, and has studied hospital practice in London and Paris. He was one of the founders of the American philological society in 1864, and was its first corresponding secretary and its vice-president. He is a member of numerous medical and historic societies, among which is la Société d'Anthropologie of Paris, has contributed to many of the medical and scientific periodicals of this country and of Europe, and was the editor of the first volume of the "Boston Medical Register," 1865. He has published a "History of the Waters of Nantucket," in the course of which he discovered the "new south shoal" and several smaller shoals directly in the track of vessels sailing between New York and Europe, and of coasting vessels from Boston. These discoveries were thought to account for several wrecks and accidents before unexplained, and called forth the special acknowledgments of insurance companies and merchants. He became commander in June, 1854, and was given the "St. Marys," in the Pacific squadron, during 1857-9, after which he was appointed superintendent of the "American Nautical Almanac." He has filled this place in 1849-56, and the existence of the "Almanac" was largely due to his efforts. In November, 1861, he became captain, and during that year was a member of the board of officers of the squadron, and was a chief of staff and fleet-officer. In May, 1862, he was appointed flag-officer of the Mississippi flotilla, succeeding Andrew H. Foote in that capacity. Soon after his arrival, the Confederate fleet lying below Fort Pillow, consisting of eight iron-clad steamers, four of which were fitted up as rams, steamed up for an engagement. The flotilla was quickly put in motion to receive them, and, after an action lasting about an hour, three of the Confederate gun-boats were disabled, and the fleet retreated under the guns of Fort Pillow. Subsequently (5 June) the fort was abandoned. Three days later the flotilla moved down the river near Memphis, and again engaged the Confederate fleet. A running fight ensued, in which all the Confederate vessels were either captured or destroyed, except the "Van Horn." After the engagement Capt. Davis received the surrender of Memphis, then joined Admiral Farragut, and was engaged in operations around Vicksburg, and in expeditions up the Yazoo river. He was commissioned commodore in July, 1862, and became chief of the bureau of navigation in Washington, and was made rear-admiral, to date from February, 1863. In 1865 he was appointed superintendent of the naval observatory in Washington, and in 1867 commanded the South Atlantic squadron. He returned to Washington in 1868, and, after being made a member of the light-house board, became comptroller of the " receptor navy-yard," but later resumed his old place of superintendent of the naval observatory. He was a member of numerous scientific societies, and in February, 1877, was elected a member of the National academy of sciences. Admiral Davis, during his connection with the commission to study the laws of tidal action, and published a "Memoir upon the Geological Action of the Tidal and other Currents of the Ocean," in the "Memoirs of the American Academy." (Boston, 1849), and "The Law of Deposition of the Flood Tide; its Dynamical Action and Office." (Washington, 1842). He contributed various translations and articles on mathematical astronomy and geodesy to periodicals, and was the author of an English translation of Gauss's "Theria Motus Corporum Celestium." (Boston, 1869). His son, Charles Henri Francis, officer, b. in Cambridge, Mass., Aug. 1845, was graduated at the U.S. naval academy in 1864, and served in the Mediterranean squadron till 1867, meanwhile becoming ensign and master in 1866. From 1867 till 1870 he was on the "Winnipesaukee," the Atlantic squadron and from 1872 till 1874 on the Pacific. He received his commission as lieutenant in March, 1868, and became a lieutenant-commander in December of the same year. From 1875 till 1885 he was engaged principally in astronomical work, at first in the naval observatory in Washington, and then in expeditions for the determination of longitude by means of the submarine cables from Europe to the Atlantic islands and the eastern coast of South America during 1877-9; in India, China, and Japan during 1881-2, and on the western coast of South America during 1883-4. In 1885 he was made commander and given the training-ship "Saratoga." His investigations have been published by the government, and are entitled "Chronometer Rates as affected by Temperature and other Causes." (1877); with Lieut.-Com. Francis M. Greene, "Telegraphic Determination of Longitudes, embracing the Meridians of Lisbon, Madeira, Porto Grande, Para, Pernambuco, Bahia, Rio de Janeiro, Montevideo, and Buenos Ayres, with the Latitudes of the Several Stations." (1880); "Telegraphic Determination of Longitudes in the Indian Ocean." (1882); and with Lieut. John A. Norris, "Telegraphic Determination of Longitudes in Mexico and on the West Coasts of Central and South America." (1885).

DAVIS, Daniel, soldier, d. 17 Sept., 1814. He was appointed lieutenant-colonel of New York voluneteers, 29 June, 1812, and brigadier-general in 1814. He was killed at the head of his brigade in the sortie from Fort Erie.

DAVIS, David, jurist, b. in Cecil county, Md., 9 March, 1815; d. in Bloomington, Ill., 26 June, 1886. He was graduated at Kenyon college, Ohio, in 1832, studied law in Massachusetts, and went through a course at the law-school of New Haven, removed to Illinois in 1835, and was admitted to the bar, after which he settled in Bloomington. He was elected to the state legislature in 1844, was a delegate at large in 1845, and again in 1861, resigning in October, 1862. He was an intimate friend of Abraham Lincoln, and rode the circuit with him every year. He was an active opponent of the convention that nominated Mr. Lincoln for the presidency in 1860, accompanied him on his journey to Washington, and in October, 1862, was appoint ed a justice of the supreme court of the United States. After President Lincoln's assassination Judge Davis was an administrator of his estate. In 1870 he held, with the minority of the supreme court, that the acts of congress making government notes a legal tender in payment of debts were constitutional. In February, 1872, the National convention of the labor reform party nominated him as its candidate for president, on a platform that declared, among other things, in favor of a national currency "base" on the faith and re sources of the nation," and interchangeable with 3-56 per cent. of the government, and demanded the establishment of an eight-hour law throughout the country, and the payment of the national debt "without mortgaging the property of the people to enrich capitalists.

In answer to the letter informing him of his nomination, Judge Davis said: "I desire to thank the convention for the unexpected honor which they have conferred upon me. The chief magistracy of the republic should neither be sought nor declined by any American citizen." His name was also used before the Liberal Republican convention at Cincinnati the same year, and received 924 votes on the first ballot. After the regular nominations had been made, he determined to retire from the contest, and so announced in a final answer to the labor reformers. He resigned his seat on the supreme bench to take his place in the U. S. senate on 4 March, 1877, having been elected by the votes of independents and democrats to succeed John A. Logan. He was reelected in the senate as an independent, but acted more commonly with the democrats. After the death of President Garfield in 1881 Judge Davis was chosen president of the senate. He resigned his seat in 1883, and retired to his home in Bloomington, where he resided quietly till his death. The degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by Williams college, Beloit college, and the Wesleyan university at Bloomington.

DAVIS, Edwin Hamilton, archaeologist, b. in Ross county, Ohio, 22 Jan., 1811. He was educated at Kenyon college, and was graduated at Cincinnati medical college in 1888. He practiced in Chillicothe till 1885, when he was called to the chair of materia medica and therapeutics in the New York medical college. Dr. Davis was for a time one of the conductors of the "American Medical Monthly." He has given much attention to the subject of American antiquities, aided Charles Whittlesey in explorations of ancient mounds in 1836, and from 1845 till 1847, assisted by Ephraim G. Squier, he surveyed nearly one hundred groups of works, and opened two hundred mounds at his own expense. He gathered the largest collection of mound-relics ever made in this country, which now forms part of the collection of Blackmore's museum in Salisbury, England.
second collection of duplicates, with the results of subsequent collecting, is now in the possession of the American museum of natural history, New York. The results of his extensive explorations are embodied in “Ancient Monuments of the Mississippi Valley,” which formed the first volume of the collection of the Smithsonian Institute to knowledge (1848). This work was characterized by the distinguished Swiss archaeologist, A. Morlot, in a paper before the American philosophical society in 1863, as being “as glorious a monument of American science as Bunker Hill is of American history during the spring of 1834 Dr. Davis delivered a course of lectures on archaeology before the Lowell institute in Boston, which were repeated in Brooklyn and New York.—His son, John Woodbridge, civil engineer, b. in New York city, 18 July, 1854, after some experience in connection with railroad surveying parties, was graduated with the degree of B. E. at Columbia college school of mines in 1878. While an undergraduate he published “Formula for the Calculation of Railroad Earthwork and Average Haul” (New York, 1878), which, after its publication, was adopted as a text-book in six engineering schools in the United States. During 1879 he published in “Van Nostrand’s Engineering Magazine” a series of mathematical papers devoted to original solutions of engineering calculations. The material of these papers has since been incorporated into the text-books on engineering, mechanics, and mathematics. His method for calculating land surveys has been introduced in the principal treatises on that subject, and is now used in lieu of older methods for determining areas of land. For several years after graduation he was professionally occupied, and then established and became principal of the Woodbridge school in New York city, which has for its special purpose the preparing of students for technical schools.—

Joseph Slocum, brother of Edwin Hamilton, lawyer, b. inPickaway county, Ohio, 21 Nov., 1812; d. in Mount Vernon, Ohio, 21 Dec., 1884. He was graduated at Kenyon in 1835, and, after studying at the Cincinnati law school, was admitted to the bar in 1837. Mr. Davis settled in Mount Vernon, and the practice of his profession in connection with Columbus Delano. He was twice elected to the county court, and held other offices, both national and local. He was mayor of Mount Vernon for several terms, and paymaster in the U. S. army during 1864-5.—Werter Renick, another brother, clergyman, b. in Circleville, Ohio, 1 April, 1815, was educated at Kenyon college, and received the degree of M. D. from the College of medicine and surgery in Cincinnati. Subsequently he became a minister in the Methodist church, and entered the Ohio conference in 1835. He then filled various pastorate in West Virginia and Ohio until 1853, when he was transferred to the Missouri conference and stationed at St. Louis. In 1854 he became professor of natural sciences in McKendree college, where he remained until 1858, acting as president during his last year at that institution. He was president of the 18th Kansas cavalry, and was commissioned lieutenant-colonel to raise and organize the 18th Kansas cavalry in 1862, of which he became colonel, and continued in command of that regiment until the close of the war. Dr. Davis was a member of the first state legislature of Kansas, and also held the office of superintendent of public instruction in Douglas county. He was a member of the general conferences of 1868, 1872, and 1880, and a delegate to the Ecumenical Methodist conference in London, and to the Centennial conference held in Baltimore, Md., in 1884. He edited, in 1859, “The Kansas Message,” the first paper published in Baldwin City, and has published several sermons.

DAVIS, Emerson, clergyman, b. in Ware, Mass., 15 July, 1798; d. in Westfield, Mass., 8 June, 1866. He was graduated at Williams in 1821, and took charge of the academy at Westfield until the following year; in 1834 Dr. Davis delivered a course of lectures on archaeology before the Lowell institute in Boston, which were repeated in Brooklyn and New York. His son,—

He was president of the 18th Kansas cavalry, and was commissioned lieutenant-colonel to raise and organize the 18th Kansas cavalry in 1862, of which he became colonel, and continued in command of that regiment until the close of the war. Dr. Davis was a member of the first state legislature of Kansas, and also held the office of superintendent of public instruction in Douglas county. He was a member of the general conferences of 1868, 1872, and 1880, and a delegate to the Ecumenical Methodist conference in London, and to the Centennial conference held in Baltimore, Md., in 1884. He edited, in 1859, “The Kansas Message,” the first paper published in Baldwin City, and has published several sermons.

DAVIS, Emerson, clergyman, b. in Ware, Mass., 15 July, 1798; d. in Westfield, Mass., 8 June, 1866. He was graduated at Williams in 1821, and took charge of the academy at Westfield until the following year; in 1834 Dr. Davis delivered a course of lectures on archaeology before the Lowell institute in Boston, which were repeated in Brooklyn and New York. His son,— finally in East Hampton. His father was a farmer, shoemaker, and tanner. Henry was prepared for college at Clinton academy, and was graduated at Yale in 1796, when he accepted a tutorship in Williams, which he held till January, 1798, going in that year to Sonora, Conn., in order to study theology with Dr. Charles Backus. In July of the following year he was licensed to preach by the Association of Tolland county, and shortly afterward appointed tutor in Yale, where he remained until 1808. In 1806 he was called to the professorship of Greek in Union, and after spending the next few years there, became president of Middlebury, and was ordained at the same time. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by Union, and the Greek professorship again offered him, which he declined. He was appointed president of Hamilton college, where he remained until his resignation in 1813. He was active in establishing the theological seminary at Auburn, and the American board of commissioners for foreign missions. After his resignation, Dr. Davis published a "Narrative of the Embarrassments and Decline of Hamilton College" (1818). He also published many sermons and addresses.

His son, Thomas T., lawyer, b. in Middlebury, Vt., 22 Aug., 1810; d. in Syracuse, N. Y., 2 May, 1873, was graduated at Hamilton college in 1831. He studied law, and was admitted to the bar of Syracuse in 1834. He was counsel of the proprietors of the manufacturing establishments of that city, and took an active interest in railroad and mining enterprises. In 1862 he was elected to congress, and re-elected in 1864. After that date he resided in Syraucuse, devoting himself to his law practice.

Davis, Henry Winter, statesman, b. in Annapolis, Md., 16 Aug., 1817; d. in Baltimore, 30 Dec., 1865. His father, Rev. Henry Lyon Davis, of the Protestant Episcopal church, was the president of St. John's college, at Annapolis, and of St. Ann's parish. He lost both offices on account of his Federal political convictions. In 1861, he moved to Wilmington, Del., leaving his son with Elizabeth Brown Winter, an aunt, who possessed a noble character, and was rigid in her system of training children. The boy afterward went to Philadelphia, and was instructed under his father's supervision.

In 1827 the family returned to Maryland and settled in Anne Arundel county. Here Henry Winter became much attached to field-sports, with an old fowling-piece upon his shoulder, burning much powder and returning with a small amount of game. The insight into slavery that he thus gained affected him strongly. He said after years: "My familiar association with the slaves, while a boy, gave me great insight into their feelings and views. They spoke with freedom before a boy what they would have repressed before a man. They were far from indifferent to their condition; they felt wronged, and sighed for freedom. They were attached to my father, and loved me, yet they habitually spoke of the day when God would deliver them." He was educated in Alexandria, and at Kenyon college, where he was graduated in 1837. His marriage in 1838 with a few slaves to be divided between himself and his sister, but he would not allow them to be sold, although he might have pursued his studies with ease and comfort. Rather than do this he obtained a tutorship, and, notwithstanding these arduous tasks, not without suffering, became president of the University of Virginia, which he entered in 1839. The expenses of his legal studies were defrayed with the proceeds of some land that his aunt had sold for the purpose. He began practice in Alexandria, Va., but first attained celebrity in the Episcopal convention of Maryland by his defense of Dr. H. V. D. Johns against the accusation of Bishop Whittingham for having violated the canon of the Episcopal church in consenting to officiate in the Methodist Episcopal church. In 1830 he removed to Baltimore, where he held a high social and professional position. He was a prominent whig, and known as the brilliant orator and controversialist of the Scott canvass in 1852. He was elected a member of congress for the 3d district of Maryland (part of Baltimore) in 1854, and re-elected in 1856. He was principal of the University of Maryland "decorated him with its censure," as he expressed it on the floor of the house; but he declared to his constituents that, if they would not allow their representative to exercise his private judgment as to what were the best interests of the state, "you may send a slave to Congress, but you cannot send me." After the attack on the 8th Massachusetts regiment in Baltimore in 1861, Mr. Davis published a card announcing himself as an "unconditional union" candidate for congress, and conducted his campaign almost entirely amid a storm of reproach and abuse, but not defeated, but receiving about 6,000 votes. When Mr. Lincoln was nominated in 1860, Mr. Davis was offered the nomination for vice-president, but declined it; and when the question of his appointment to the cabinet was agitated, he urged the selection of John A. Gilmer in his stead. He was again in congress in 1863-5, and served as chairman of the committee on foreign affairs. Although representing a slave state, Mr. Davis was conspicuous for unsleeping fidelity to the Union and advocacy of emancipation. He heartily supported the administration, but deprecated the assumption of extraordinary powers by the executive, and denounced congress as cowardly for not authorizing by statute what it expected that department to do. He early favored the enlistment of negroes in the army, and said, "I would not consent to have a musket on the shoulder." In the summer of 1865 he made a speech in Chicago in favor of negro suffrage. Mr. Davis was denounced by politicians as impractical. He used to say that he who compromised a moral principle was a scoundrel, but that he who would not compromise would be a fool. Mr. Davis possessed an unusually fine library, and was gifted with a good memory and a brilliant mind, which was united with many personal advantages. Inheriting force and scholarship from his father, he had received also a share of his mother's milder qualities, which won many friends, although, to the public, he seemed stern and dictatorial. At his death congress met apart a day for the commemoration of his public services, an honor never before paid to an ex-member of congress. He published a book entitled "The War of 1812" (Baltimore, 1853). His colclected speeches, together with a eulogy by his colleague, John A. J. Cresswell, were published in New York in 1867.

DAVIS, Isaac, patriot, b. in 1748; d. in Concord, Mass., 1775. He was captain of the Acton minute-men, and led them against the British at Concord bridge, saying: "I have not a man that is afraid to go." He was killed by the first volley.
Bancroft describes him as "stately in his person, a man of few words; earnest even to solemnity." His body, with those of two of his company, was brought to his home and laid in the bedroom of his wife, from whom he had parted only a few hours before. The three men "were followed to the village graveyard by a concourse of the neighbors from miles around." Mrs. Davis lived to a great age. When she was over ninety, "the United States in congress bethought themselves to pay honors to her husband's martyrdom."

DAVIS, Isaac, lawyer, b. in Northborough, Mass., 2 June, 1779; d. in Worcester, Mass., 1 April, 1848. He was educated in a private school, studied law, and began the practice of his profession in Worcester, Mass., where he soon rose to eminence. He was mayor of Worcester for three years, and for eleven years a member of the Massachusetts senate. Mr. Davis was a zealous promoter of the abolition cause. He was a member of the board of trustees of Brown university in 1838, and a fellow in 1851. For forty years he was president of the board of trustees of the Worcester academy, and for some time was an active member of the Massachusetts board of education. He has received the degree of LL.D.

DAVIS, Jefferson, statesman, b. in that part of Christian county, Ky., which now forms Todd county, 3 June, 1808. His father, Samuel Davis, had served in the Georgia cavalry during the Revo-lation, and, when Jefferson was an infant, removed with his family to a place near Godville, Wilkinson co., Miss. Young Davis entered Transylvania college, Kentucky, but left in 1824, on his appointment by President Monroe to the U. S. military academy. On his graduation, in 1828, he was assigned to the 1st infantry, and served on the frontier, taking part in the Black Hawk war of 1831.

He was promoted to first lieutenant of dragoons on 4 March, 1833, but, after more service against the Indians, abruptly resigned on 30 June, 1835, and having married, after a romantic elopement, the daughter of Zachary Taylor, then a colonel in the army, settled near Vicksburg, Miss., and became cotton-planter. Here he pursued a life of study and retirement till 1843, when he entered politics in the midst of an exciting gubernatorial canvass. He was chosen an elector on the Folk and Dallas ticket in 1841, and in a subsequent canvass, and in 1845 was sent to congress, taking his seat in December of that year. He at once took an active part in debate, speaking on the tariff, the Oregon question, and military matters, especially with reference to the preparations for war with Mexico.
On 6 Feb., 1846, in a speech on the Oregon question, he spoke of the "love of union in our hearts," and, spoking of the battles of the Revolution, said: "They form a monument to the common glory of our common country."

Mr. Davis left the cabinet at the close of President Pierce’s term in 1857, and in the same year entered the senate again. He opposed the French spoliation bill, advocated the southern route for the Pacific rail, and continued to contest the doctrine of the sovereignty of the states, often encounters Stephen A. Douglas in debate on this question. After the settlement of the Kansas contest by the passage of the Kansas conference bill, in which he had taken a chief part, he wrote to the people of his state that it was “the true takingsall of which we can demand.” Mr. Davis was the recognized democratic leader in the 36th congress. He had made a tour of the eastern states in 1858, making speeches at Boston, Portland, Me., New York, and other places, and in 1859, in reply to an invitation to attend the Webster birthday festival in Boston, wrote a letter denouncing “partisans who avow the purpose of obliterating the landmarks of our fathers,” and containing strong Union sentiments. He had been frequently mentioned as a democratic candidate for the presidency in the ensuing election of 1860, though his friends announced that he did not desire the nomination. Before congress met, in the autumn of 1860, Mr. Davis was summoned to Washington by members of President Buchanan’s cabinet to suggest some modifications of the forthcoming session. The suggestion was made, and were adopted. In the ensuing session Mr. Davis made, on 10 Dec., 1860, a speech in which he carefully distinguished between independence, which the states had achieved at great cost, and the Union, which had cost “little time, little money, and little effort.” He was appointed on the senate committee of thir-teen to examine and report on the condition of the country, and, although at first excused at his own request, finally consented to serve, accepting the appointment in a speech in which he avowed his willingness to make any sacrifice by the impending struggle. The committee, after remaining in session several days, reported, on 31 Dec., their inability to come to any satisfactory conclu- sion. On 10 Jan., 1861, Mr. Davis made another speech there in the controversy on the right of secession, denying that of coercion, and urging the withdrawal of the garrison from Fort Sumter. Mississippi had seceded on 9 Jan., and on 24 Jan., having been officially informed of the fact, Mr. Davis withdrew from the senate and went to his home, having taken leave of his associates in a speech in which he defended the cause of the south, and, in closing, begged pardon of all whom he had ever offended.

Before he reached home he had been appointed by the convention commander-in-chief of the army of Mississippi, with the rank of major-general; but on 16 Feb., 1861, he exchanged this office for that of president of the Confederate states, to which the provisional congress at Montgomery had elected him on 9 Feb. He selected for his cabinet Robert Toombs, of Georgia, as secretary of state; Leroy P. Walker, the inveterate advocate of the secession of the South Carolina of South Carolina, secretary of the treasury; Stephen R. Mallory, of Florida, secretary of the navy; Judah P. Benjamin, of Louisiana, at- torney-general; and John H. Reagan, of Texas, postmaster-general. The last time continued in the same capacity as the Confederate states, as the Confederate states, maintained its existence. Toombs, Walker, and Memminger were succeeded by others. The last time continued in the same capacity as the Confederate states, as the Confederate states, maintained its existence. Toombs, Walker, and Memminger were succeeded by others. In his inand fourteen Union prisoners were selected by lot and held as hostages for the safety of the condemned men. The latter were ultimately put on the laws of warfare, and Mr. Davis of the National government, and subsequently a cartel was adopted for the exchange of prisoners, which remained in force till its suspension in 1864, caused by disagreement as to the status of negro soldiers. In November, 1861, a presidential election was held in the Confederate States, and Mr. Davis was chosen president for six years without opposition. In his message to the provisional congress at its last session, 18 Nov., 1861, he briefly sketched the situation at the close of the first year of the war, alluding to the Confederate successes, the contest for the possession of Kentucky and Missouri, and to the "Trent" affair. (See Wilkes, Charles.) He urged the construction of another railroad line through the Confederacy, asserting the improvement of the south in military means and financial condition, and the inefficiency of the blockade, and said: "If it were indeed a rebellion in which we were engaged, we might find ample vindication for the course we have adopted in the scenes which are now being enacted in the United States." The first congress under the permanent constitution met in Richmond, on 18 Feb., and Mr. Davis was inaugurated on 22 Feb. The Confederacy had just met with its first serious reverses in the fall of Forts Henry and Donelson; but in his inaugural, after a vindication of the right of secession, Mr. Davis indulged in many favorable hopes. "The final result in our favor, he said, 'is not doubt; it has sunk under the immense load of debt which they have incurred. . . . In the heart of a people resolved to be free, these disasters tend but to stimulate to increased resistance. In his short messages of 25 Feb. and 15 Aug., he sought to improve the measures for the improvement of the Confederate forces. The result of the reverses in the early months of the year, to which had now been added the capture of New Orleans, began to show itself in a growing opposition to Mr. Davis's administration, which up to this time had seemed one, but universally popular, and this opposition increased in force up to the latest days of the war. One of the first acts of the congress was to pass a sweeping secession law, to which Mr. Davis reluctantly assented. This was stoutly resisted in some quarters, and led to the break in correspondence between Mr. Davis and Gov. Joseph E. Brown, of Georgia, who disputed the constitutionality of the measure. Congress also authorized the suspension of the habeas corpus act for ten miles around Richmond, and the formation of a military police, for the alleged reason that the government was continually in danger from the presence in Richmond of National spies, and the consequent plots and intrigues. Mr. Davis was present with Gen. Lee at the battle of Fair Oaks on 31 May, and, after the wounding of Gen. Joseph E. Johnston in that engagement, assigned Lee to the command of the Army of Northern Virginia, having previously, on 13 March, charged him, "under the direction of the president, with the conduct of military operations. During a visit to the army in the western depot, in Dec., 1862, Mr. Davis, in an address to the Mississippi legislators, defended the secession law and declared that in "all respects, the Confederacy was better prepared for war than it was a year previous." The proclamation of emancipation by President Lincoln, on 1 Jan., 1863, affected the 23 Dec., 1862, Mr. Davis a retaliatory proclamation, dated 23 Dec., 1862, in which, after reciting, among other acts, the hanging of William B. Mumford for tearing down the United States flag at New Orleans, after the city was captured by the National forces, Gen. Benjamin F. Butler was accused of forgery, it was ordered that all commissioned officers serving under him, as well as any found serving in company with slaves, should be treated as robbers and criminals deserving death. These threats, however, were generally disregarded, though reported by the legislation of the congress. In his message of January, 1863, Mr. Davis announced his intention of turning over National prisoners for prosecution in state courts, as abettors of servile insurrection; but this proposition was rejected by congress, and provision made for their trial by military tribunals. The two long messages sent by Mr. Davis to congress in 1863 consist largely of discussions of the position of foreign powers, especially Great Britain, with reference to the war. The one dated 7 Dec. announces the fall of Vicksburg and Fort Pillow, and expresses "the compulsory reduction of the currency to the amount required by the business of the country," together with other measures for improving the finances, which had become hopelessly depreciated. They had never been on a sound basis, and the currency had declined in its value from one cent to one dollar. In April, 1863, in compliance with a request of the Confederate congress, Mr. Davis issued an address to the people of the south, in which he drew the happiest conclusions as to the success of the Confederacy, from the way in which, in the face of the worst of obstacles, it had established and disciplined armies. "At no previous period of the war," said he, "have our forces been so numerous, so well organized, and so thoroughly disciplined, armed, and equipped as at present." The district of United States property of Vicksburg and Vicksburg—coming in the face of this assertion, and the state of the currency just mentioned, embodied the opposition party in all parts of the Confederacy fiercely to assail the administration. Mr. Davis was held responsible for the advance into Pennsylva nia, and the inactivity in appointing Pemberton to command in the west. Charles G. Mem minger, secretary of the treasury, resigned, and his place was filled by George A. Trenholm; but the new secretary was unable to stop the depreciation of the currency. The lack of coin in the country, the "yellow fever" in the south, and the spirit of speculation fostered by the enormous issues of paper money, hastened the financial ruin of the Confederacy. Food, too, was scarce. Kentucky and Tennessee, whence had come most of the meat supplies, were lost to the Confederacy, and the army was on half-rations. At this time there was a clamor against the commissary-general, Col. Northrop. A committee of the Confederate congress investigated the matter and exonerated him; but the opponents of the administration have continued to hold him, and Mr. Davis through him, responsible for the scarcity of food in the Confederacy, and therefore, indirectly, for much of the sufferings of Union prisoners during the war. The exchange of prisoners had been interrupted for some time by the refusal of the Confederate government to recognize negroes as national prisoners, and after many futile attempts to arrive at an understanding with the National government, "We offered," says Mr. Davis ("Rise and Fall of the Confederate Government," vol. ii., p. 601), "to the United States government their sick and wounded, without regard to race," but was "turned down." The year 1864 opened with Confederate successes in Florida, the southwest, and North Carolina; and Mr. Davis, in his message of 2 May, said: "The armies in northern Virginia and Tennessee still oppose, with formidable barrier to the progress of the invader." That progress, however, was not long to be stayed. By an order issued on 17 July, 1864, Mr. Davis removed Gen. Joseph E. Johnston from the command of the army opposed to Gen. Sherman in Georgia. The cause and alleged grounds of this removal have not yet ceased to be subjects for controversy, being asserted by Mr. Davis's opponents that personal reasons influenced him against an officer with whom he had never been very friendly, while his supporters, denying this, fully justify the act. The reasons given in a Joint Gen. Cooper's and brief dispatch were, that Gen. Johnston had "failed to arrest the advance of the enemy to the vicinity of Atlanta, and expressed no confidence that he could defeat or repel him." In answer to which Gen. Johnston wrote: "I assert that Sherman's army is much stronger, compared with that of Tennessee, than Grant's compared with that of northern Virginia. Yet the enemy has been compelled to advance much more slowly to the vicinity of Atlanta than to that of Richmond and Petersburg, and penetrated much deeper into Virginia than into Ga., a permission John B. Hood, successor of Gen. Johnston, was obliged to evacuate Atlanta on 1 Sept. Mr. Davis then visited Georgia and endeavored to raise the spirits of the people there, and to restore harmony between the Confederate and state governments. Gen. Breckinridge, who had opposed the conscription act, continued to be hostile to the administration, notwithstanding an interview with Mr. Davis in which the latter tried to convince him that his complaints were unjust. He reviewed and addressed Hood's army on 18 Sept., and afterward, in speeches at Macon, Augusta, and elsewhere, strove to inspire the people with the spirit of renewed resistance, and to persuade them that an honorable peace was impossible. As is evident from the tone of these and other speeches, the peace party in the south was daily gaining strength. Besides those who really desired peace, there were others who hoped that a rejected attempt to treat with the federal government might fire the south with indignation. As early as 30 Dec., 1863, Gov. Zebulon B. Vance, of North Carolina, had written to Mr. Davis urging negotiation. The latter, in his answer, dated 27 June, 1864, made unsuccessful attempts to communicate with the authorities at Washington, and concluded that another would be undesirable. In January, 1865, however, after an interview with Francis P. Blair, Jr., who had gone to Richmond, unofficially, in the hope of bringing about peace, Mr. Davis agreed to send three commissioners to confer with the national government. The result was an unsatisfactory meeting on a steamer in Hampton Roads. On the return of the commissioners public meetings were held, at which there seemed to be a return of the enthusiasm of the early days of the war. Peace with the independence of the south was now seen to be impossible, and the horrors of subjugation by the north were painted in gloomy colors by the speakers. Mr. Davis, always an able and impressive speaker, made what was the best argument of the speeches of his life. But this outburst of enthusiasm was only temporary. The evacuation of Atlanta had been followed by Sherman's march to the sea, and Hood's disastrous campaign in Tennessee. Gen. Hood himself said, in speaking of it, when taking leave of his army on his return to Atlanta, "It is my responsibility for its conception." These reverses, however, with Grant's steady advance on Richmond, and, above all, the re-election of President Lincoln, had produced a growing conviction in the south that defeat was inevitable. The Confederate congress that met in November, 1864, was outspoken in opposition to the administration, and in January, 1865, the Virginia delegation urged a change in the cabinet, expressing their want of confidence in its members. As a consequence of this, James A. Seddon, then secretary of war, sent in his resignation.

In his last message to congress, dated 13 March, 1865, Mr. Davis, while acknowledging the peril of the Confederacy, asserted that it had ample means of meeting the emergency. On Sunday, 2 April, 1865, while seated in his pew in St. Paul's church, Richmond, he was handed a telegram from Gen. Lee, announcing the latter's speedy withdrawal from Petersburg, and the consequent necessity for the evacuation of the capital. That evening, accompanied by his personal staff, members of the cabinet, and others, he left by train for Danville. On his arrival there he issued, on 5 April, a proclamation of which he afterward admitted, "viewed by the light of subsequent events, it may fairly be said it was over-sanguine. In it he said: "Relieved from the necessity of guarding particular points, our army will be free to move from point to point, to strike the enemy in detail far from his base." Danville was abandoned in less than a week, and after a conference at Greensboro, N. C., with Gens. Johnston and Beauregard, in which his hopes of continuing the war met with little encouragement, he went to Charlotte, where he heard of the assassination of Mr. Lincoln. His wife had preceded him with a small escort, and it was just after he had overtaken her, while encamped near Irwonsville, Ga., that the whole party were captured, on 10 May, by a body of cavalry under Lieut.-Col. Pritchard. He was taken to Fort Monroe, and kept in confinement for two years.

On 21 Sept., 1865, the U. S. Senate called on the president for information on the subject of his trial, and in response reports were submitted from the secretary of war and the attorney-general, their substance being that Virginia was the proper place for the trial, and that it was not yet possible peacefully to hold a U. S. court in that state. On 12 Oct., in reply to a letter from President Johnson, Chief-Justice Chase said that he was unwilling to hold court in a district still under martial law. On 10 April, 1866, the judiciary committee of the house of representatives reported that there was no reason why the trial should not be proceeded with, and that it was the duty of the government to investigate, without delay, the facts connected with Lincoln's assassination. On 8 May, 1866, Mr. Davis was indicted for treason by a grand jury in the U. S. court for the district of Virginia, sitting at Norfolk under Judge Underwood, the charge of complicity in the assassination of the president having been dropped. On 5 June, at a session of the court held in Richmond, James T. Brady, one of Mr. Davis's counsel, urged that the trial be held without delay; but the government declined to proceed on the indictment, urging the importance of the trial and the necessity of punishing the conspirators. He admitted the prisoner to bail. On 13 May, 1867, he was brought before the court at Richmond on a writ of habeas corpus, and admitted to bail in the amount of $100,000, the first name on his bail-bond being that of Horace Greeley. Mr. Davis was two months in prison for contempt of court. The interest taken in him during his imprisonment, and their prevalent idea that he was to suffer as a representative of the south, rather than for sins of his own, and was "a nation's prisoner," had made him more popular there than he had been since the first days of the war. An enthusiastic reception at Richmond he went to New York, then to Canada, and in the summer of 1868, visited England, a Liverpool firm having offered to take him as a partner, without capital. This offer, after investigation, was declined, and, having visited the Continent, he returned to New York. In 1868 he never brought to trial, a "volte face" being entered by the government in his case in December, 1868, and he was also included in the general amnesty of that month. After his discharge he became president of a life insurance company at Memphis, Tenn., in 1872. Mr. Davis was bequeathed to his estate, where he has since quietly resided, giving much of his time to literary pursuits. In June, 1871, in a speech at a public reception in Atlanta, Ga., he said that he still denied to the principle of state sovereignty was as confident of its final triumph, and was "not of those who 'accept the situation.'" In 1876, when a bill was before the house of representatives to remove all the political disabilities that had been imposed on those who took part in the insurrection, James G. Blaine offered an amendment exempting Jefferson Davis, and supported it by a speech in which he accused Mr. Davis of being "the author of the gigantic murders and crimes at Andersonville." Senator Benjamin H. Hill, of Georgia, spoke in reply, defending Mr. Davis from this charge. Again, in 1878, Mr. Davis secured passage of a bill to pension veterans of the Mexican war, the adoption of an amendment to that effect being largely the result of a speech by Zachariah Chandler. In October, 1884, at a meeting of Frank P. Blair post, of the Grand Army of the Republic, in St. Louis, Gen. William T. Sherman asserted that he had seen letters and papers showing that Mr. Davis had abandoned his state-rights doctrines during the war, and had become practically a dictator in the south. Mr. Davis, in a letter to a newspaper, denied the charge, and Gen. Sherman then replied with these words: "Washington papers that, in his view, substantiated it. On 28 April, 1886, Mr. Davis spoke at the dedication of a monument to Confederate soldiers at Montgomery, Ala., and was enthusiastically received. The eulogy preceding this page is a view of his early home in Mississippi.

Two biographies of Mr. Davis have been written, both by southern authors, which illustrate the extremes of southern opinion. That by Frank H. Alfriend (New York, 1889) represents those who are friendly to Mr. Davis, while that by Edward A. Pollard, with the subtitle "Secret History of the Confederacy" (Philadelphia, 1869), holds him responsible for all the disasters of the war. Mr. Pollard, who was an editor of the Richmond "Ex-20th army corps into the fight at Stone river, and for his bravery was recommended by Gen. Rosecrans for major-general. In 1864 he commanded the Georgia campaign and in the march through Georgia. In 1865 a brevet major-generalship was given him, and he was made colonel of the 32d infantry, 23 July, 1866. He afterward went to the Pacific coast, and afterwards to the Atlantic coast, where he served as major-general of the Army of the Pacific, and in 1869, after the death of Gen. Canby by the Mocoe Indians in northern California, took command of the forces operating against them, and compelled them to surrender.

DAVIS, John, clergyman, b. in Sandridge, England, about 1350; d. at sea, near the coast of Malacca, in December, 1605. He went to sea at an early age, and in 1585 was given command of an expedition for the discovery of a northwest passage to India. He sailed from Dartmouth on July 6, 1585, with the "Sunshine," of fifty tons, and the "Moonshine," of thirty-five men, manned by twenty-three and seventeen men respectively. He sailed as far north as 60° 40', entering the strait that has since borne his name, and, finding no hindrance to his progress, concluded that he had discovered the northwest passage, but was obliged by stress of weather and want of water to return on the 20th of Sept. On 7 May, 1586, he sailed again from Dartmouth with the "Sunshine," the "Moonshine," the "Mermaid," of 100 tons, and the "North Star," a pinch of ten tons. At the end of July the crew of the "Mermaid" became discontented and put back for England, and the "Sunshine" and the "Mermaid" were lost. It is believed that Davenport's party had been sent to explore eastward of Greenland. Capt.
Davis pursued the voyage alone, and, after reaching a point not as far north as in his first voyage, but about as far west, returned to England, arriving on the 20th of Jan. 1587. He sailed again from Dartmouth with the "Elizabeth," the "Sunshine," and the "Helen," a smaller vessel. He took the same course as before, and was confirmed in his belief that he had found the passage; but, not having provisions for a long voyage, he was obliged to return to England. Notwithstanding his discovery of the entrance to Baffin bay, there was no new expedition in quest of the northwest passage till that of Waymouth, fifteen years later. In 1591 Davis accompanied Cavendish on his second and very disastrous voyage to the South sea, and on the English expeditions to the South Indies as a pilot, and in the last was killed, while serving under Sir Edmund Michbourne, in an engagement with the Japanese in the straits of Malacca. He is said to have been the inventor of a quadrant for taking the sun's altitude at sea, which preceded Hadley's sextant. He published "Se-aman's Secrets," a treatise on navigation (London, 1594), and "The World's Hydrographical Descriptions" (1595), in which the arguments of Sir Humphrey Gilbert, showing the probability of a northwest passage to China, are in part repeated.

gator," by Capt. Albert A. Markham, published by the Hakluyt society (London, 1880).

DAVIS, John, clergyman, b. in Pennepek, Pa., 10 Sept., 1721; d. in Harford county, Md., in 1806. He was the son of John Davis, who migrated to Mary-lard the same year, and became pastor of Winter Chureh in Harford county, the first permanently established church of his denomination in the state. His labor extended into Baltimore and Frederick counties, and into the city of Baltimore, in which he obtained guarantees and the tradition of religious freedom in Maryland, his zeal in spreading a form of faith that was new in the community subjected him to intimidation and violence, but before his death he had established flourishing churches in Baltimore, Frederick City, and other places.

DAVIS, John, clergyman, b. in New Cochity countv, Del., in 1737; d. in Ohio, 13 Dec., 1772. His father came from Wales in 1710, and was made pastor of the Baptist church in Willsburg, Newcastle. The son was graduated at Philadelpbia college, and, while supplying his father's pulpit after the death of the latter, attracted attention by his eloquence, and was called to the pastorate of the 2d Baptist church in Boston, Mass. He was appointed agent of the Baptists of the colony, to represent their grievances to the executive legislature, and then in force in Massachusetts, and took the ground that the charter granted religious equality, and that Congregationalism was not the established religion of the commonwealth. When, after receiving the representations of the grievance committee, the general court passed a new certificate he requiring that certificates issued to Baptists should state that they were "conscientiously" of that faith, the committee, of which he was the head, decided not to accept the act in that form. In 1772 his health failed, and he returned in July to Delaware, then undertook a journey down the Ohio, and died in the wilderness below the present site of the city of Wheeling, W. Va.

DAVIS, John, jurist, b. in Plymouth, Mass., 25 Jan., 1761; d. in Boston, Mass., 14 Jan., 1847. He was graduated at Harvard in 1781, and for a time was a tuto-er in the family of the lawyer John Otis, a stable, studied law, and began practice at Plymouth in 1786. At the convention of 1788, which adopted the Federal constitution, he was the youngest delegate, and he survived all the others. He was for several years a member of the Massachusetts legislature, and in 1795 was elected to the state senate. On 22 June of the same year he entered on the office of comptroller of the U. S. treasury, and served till 1 July, 1796. He was then appointed district attorney for Massachusetts, and in 1801 U. S. district judge in the same state, in which he remained to the end of his life. He was a scholar in various departments of knowledge, and especially eminent for his acquaintance with the history and antiquities of New England. In 1813 he delivered an address on "The Landing of the Pil-gresses" before the Historical Society of New which he was president from 1818 till 1843. He published an edition of Morton's "New England Memorial," with copious and valuable notes (Boston, 1820); a "Eulogy on George Washington"; and "An Attempt to Explain the Inscription on Dighton Rock." See a memoir by Thomas Kim-cutt in "Archaeologia Americana."
a conspicuous part in the debates as an advocate of protection for American industry, replying to the free-trade arguments of southern statesmen in speeches that were considered highly effective. He supported the positions of the protective theories. A declaration in one of his speeches, that James Buchanan was in favor in reducing the wages of American workingmen to ten cents a day, was the origin of the epithet "ten-cent Jimmy," which was applied to that statesman by his political opponents for several years. A short speech against the sub-treasury, delivered in 1840, was printed during the presidential canvass of that year as an electioneering pamphlet, of which more than a million copies were distributed. He was again elected U.S. senator, and served from 24 March, 1845, till 3 March, 1853, but declined a re-election, and died suddenly at his home. He opposed vigorously against the war with Mexico. In the controversy that followed, over the introduction of slavery into the U.S. territories, he earnestly advocated the exclusion of slavery. The Wilmot proviso received his support, but the compromise acts of 1850 encountered his decided opposition. He enjoyed the respect and confidence of his constituents in an unusual degree, and established a reputation for high principles that gained for him the popular appellation of "honest Davis."—His wife, who was a sister of George Bancroft, the historian, died in Worcester, Mass., 24 Jan., 1872, at the age of eighty years.—His son, John Chandler Bancroft, diplomatist, b. in Worcester, Mass., 29 Dec., 1822, was graduated at Harvard in 1840, studied law, and began practice. On 31 Aug., 1849, when Mr. Bancroft left the English court, he succeeded John R. Brodrick as secretary of legation, and acted as charge d'affaires during the absence of the minister, Abbot Lawrence. He was reappointed for the two succeeding years. He resigned on 30 Nov., 1852, was American correspondent of the London "Times" from 1854 till 1861, and during that time practised law in New York city. In 1868 he was elected to the New York legislature, and on 25 March, 1869, was appointed assistant secretary of state, which post he resigned in 1871 to act as agent of the U.S. government before the Geneva Court of arbitration on the Alabama claims. On 24 Jan., 1873, he was reappointed assistant secretary of state. While in the department of state he acted as arbitrator in a dispute between Great Britain and Portugal. In 1871 he was a member, and the secretary of the high commission that concluded the treaty of Washington. He resigned his place on receiving the appointment of minister to the German empire. After his return to Berlin, in 1877, he was made a judge of the U.S. Court of claims in Washington, D.C., and served from January, 1878, till December, 1891. In November, 1892, he was again appointed to the same post, and on 5 Nov., 1893, became reporter of the U.S. supreme court. He has published "Diplomatic and Sub-Treasury Justice" (Worcester, 1847); "The Case of the United States laid before the Tribunal of Arbitration at Geneva." (Washington, 1871); "Treaties of the United States, with Notes" (revised ed., 1873); and voles. 109-118 of "United States Reports." Another son, Samuel Bancroft, b. in Worcester, Mass., 19 April, 1857; drowned at sea, 19 Oct., 1870, was graduated at Williams in 1845, and afterward studied in Germany. He taught in the Worcester high-school for a year, and was settled as pastor of the Unitarian society in Westport, Mass., 1871. In 1876, he was admitted to the Massachusetts bar in 1854, and went to Chicago in 1855. He was mustered into the United States service in 1862 as lieutenant-colonel of the 11th Illinois cavalry. He served with conspicuous gallantry in Stoneman's pursuit of the Confederates after their retreat from Fredericksburg in April, 1862, and in the autumn distinguished himself at Martinsburg and Harper's Ferry, where he was in command of the Union cavalry, and led them, on the night of 14 Sept., 1862, through the enemy's lines to Harpers Ferry, Pa., capturing an ammunition-train on the way. He was promoted colonel, 5 Jan., 1864, and at the close of the war was brevetted brigadier-general. After returning to Chicago, he was elected city attorney. He was lost on the steamer "Cambria" in the voyage to Europe.—His other son, Andrew Bancroft, (w. Mass., 16 Sept., 1851, studied in the universities of Heidelberg, Berlin, and Paris. After holding various posts in the department of state and the diplomatic service, he was appointed clerk to the court of Alabama claims in 1874. He practised law in Washington the next year and was assistant counsel for the United States before the Franco-American claims commission in 1881. On 7 July, 1882, he became assistant secretary of state, and while holding that office was several times acting secretary. On 29 Jan., 1883, he was appointed judge of the U.S. court of claims.—Another son, Horace, manufacturer, b. in Worcester, Mass., 16 March, 1831. He was graduated at Harvard in 1849, and, after beginning the study of law, went to California in 1852, and engaged in manufacturing. He represented San Francisco in Congress from 1877 to 1881. He contributed a paper to the American antiquarian society on the "Like-lihood of an Admixture of Japanese Blood on the Northwest," which was afterward published separately. He also published "Dolor Davis, a Sketch of Life that and that of those Institutions," in the Johns Hopkins series (Baltimore, 1885).—Another son, Andrew McFarland, antiquarian and author, b. in Worcester, Mass., 30 Dec., 1833. He was graduated at the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard university in 1854, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1859. After practising a short time in Massachusetts he went to California, and was for several years a partner of his brother in the manufacturing business. He published articles in the "Overland" and "Atlantic Monthly" magazines, presented a paper on his "Journey in Mexico," "Switzerland, and Portugal," and "The Chronicles of the United States," and contributed to Justin Winsor's "Narrative and Critical History of America" the chapter on "Louisiana and Canada" and that on "Border Warfare during the Revolution."
was chosen professor of law at the University of Virginia. He died from a pistol-shot wound at the hands of a refractory student, whom he was compelled to unmask for an alleged usurpation of his ex-coparrester to the university leg. Among his publications are a treatise on "Estates Tail, Executory Devises, and Contingent Remainders under the Virginia Statutes modifying the Common Law"; "Treatise on Criminal Law, and Guide to Justices of the Peace" (1838); and a treatise on "The Right of Congress to pass Laws expressly and especially for the Protection of Domestic Manufacturers."

DAVIS, John Lee, naval officer, b. in Carlisle, Sullivan Co., Ind., 3 Sept., 1835. He entered the U. S. service as a midshipman on 9 Jan., 1841, was warranted passed midshipman on 10 Aug., 1847, and, while serving as acting lieutenant, commanding one of the boats of the "Preble," of the East India squadron, he boarded a piratical Chinese junk off Macao in November, 1849, with another officer and sixteen men, and captured the vessel and crew. He was commissioned lieutenant on 15 Sept., 1847, was attached to the Gulf squadron in 1861, and, as executive officer of the "Water Witch," took part in engagements with the Confederate ram "Manassas" at the head of the Mississippi passes and the squadron at Pilot Town on the same day, 12 Oct., 1861. He was commissioned commander on 16 July, 1862, and attacked Fort McAllister on 19 Nov., when his vessel was pierced by a solid shot below water. The leak was stopped temporarily, and after the action the vessel was taken on shore and patched at theiful of the tide. He again engaged the fort on 27 Jan. and 1 Feb., 1863, and on 28 Feb., when the privateer "Nashville" was destroyed. On 19 March he sank the blockade-running steamer "Georgia" when she attempted to enter Charleston harbor. He was transferred to the coast survey, to the ironclad "Montana," and took part in the engagements with Forts Sumter, Gregg, Moultrie, and Battery Bee, in the beginning of September, 1863, and in the attacks on Fort Sumter on 5, 9, 10, and 11, and on Fort Moultrie on 10 Nov., 1863. In 1864-5 he commanded the steamer "SIR WILLIAM," of the North Atlantic blockading squadron, which towed the powder-boat "Louisiana" from Norfolk to Fort Fisher in December, and engaged that fort on 24 and 25 Dec., 1864, 13 and 14 Jan., 1865; Fort Anderson, in January, 1865; Fort Fisher, on 18 Feb.; and Fort Strong on 20 and 21 Feb., on which last occasion the vessel was struck under the water-line, but the leak was kept under till dark, and then effectually stopped. He was commissioned commander on 25 July, 1866, promoted captain on 14 Feb., 1873, and was a member of the light-house board in 1876, and of the board of inspection in 1882. He was appointed commodore on 4 Feb., 1883, commanded the Asiatic station in 1883-4, and on 30 Oct., 1885, received his commission as rear-admiral, and was in November, 1886, relieved of his command of the Asiatic squadron.

DAVIS, John W., statesman, b. in Cumberland county, Pa., 17 July, 1799; d. in Carlisle, Ind., 22 Aug., 1859. He received a classical education, studied medicine, and was graduated at the Baltimore medical college in 1821, removing in 1823 to Carlisle, Pa., for medical practice. He was a member of the Indiana house of representatives, being chosen speaker in 1832. In 1834 he was appointed a commissioner to negotiate a treaty with the Indians. He was elected to congress by the democrats, and served from 7 Dec., 1835, till 3 March, 1837, was re-elected and again served from 1839 till 1841, and from 1843 till 1847. During his last term he was speaker of the house of representatives, having been elected 1 Dec., 1845. He was U. S. commissioner to China in 1848-50, and governor of Oregon in 1854-5. He was a member of Congress, and was a member of the University of Virginia committee to keep up the university law. Among his publications are a treatise on "Estates Tail, Executory Devises, and Contingent Remainders under the Virginia Statutes modifying the Common Law"; "Treatise on Criminal Law, and Guide to Justices of the Peace," published in 1838; and a treatise on "The Right of Congress to pass Laws expressly and especially for the Protection of Domestic Manufacturers."

DAVIS, L. Clark, journalist, b. near Sandusky, Ohio, 25 Sept., 1835. He was educated in the common schools, and early turned his attention to journalism, becoming a correspondent of various Philadelphia papers. In 1869 he assumed the management of the Philadelphia "Inquirer," which he has held ever since. To his efforts are due the first passage of laws for regulating the admission of the insane into asylums in Pennsylvania, and the amelioration of their condition. Mr. Davis has been a contributor to magazine literature since 1867, has written many short stories and essays on the dramatic art, and has also published "The Stranded Ship" (New York, 1869).—His wife, Rebecca Harding, author, b. in Washington, Pa., 24 June, 1831, passed her early life in West Virginia, and first attracted attention as a writer by her "Life in the Iron-Mills," published in the "Atlantic Monthly" in 1861. To the same periodical she contributed, a few months later, "A Story of To-Day," published in her own column, under the title of "Margaret Howth" (1861). In 1883 she was married and went to reside in Philadelphia. In 1869 she became an editorial writer on the staff of the New York "Tribune." In addition to sketches, stories, and editorial work, she has published "When West Meets East," "Philadelphia," "At the London "Times," signing his letters "The Genevese Traveller." He was associated with Philip Freneau in the publication of the "Timepiece and Literary Companion" in New York city, which was begun on 15 Sept., 1777, and ceased on 90 Aug. of the following year. From the year before Burr's death Davis was his only intimate friend and associate. He published "Memoirs of Aaron Burr, with Miscellaneous Correspondence" (New York, 1809-7), and edited Burr's "Private Journal during his Residence in Europe" (1839).

DAVIS, Nathan Smith, physician, b. in Greene, Chenango Co., N. Y., 9 Jan., 1817. He was graduated at the medical college in Fairfield, N. Y., in 1837, established himself in practice at Binghamton, contributed notable papers on the nervous system to medical journals, and was instrumental in establishing the National medical association, of which he was president in 1864-5. He removed to New York in 1847, assumed the editorship of the "Annalist" in 1848, and in 1849 went to Chicago, III., to take the chair of physiology and pathology in the recently founded medical school. In 1855 he assumed charge also of the department of practice of medicine. He assisted in organizing a state and city medical association, and was one of the principal founders of Mercy hospital. His connection with the medical college continued until he assumed the editorship of the Chicago "Medical Examiner" in 1860. He also conducted for more than twenty years the "Northwestern Journal," of which he was editor in 1855. He was one of the founders of Northwestern University, the Chicago academy of sciences, and the Washingtonian home for the reformation of inebriates, of which he was chosen president. This office he resigned, and also gave up the editorship of the "Northwestern Journal" in 1863, when he was appointed editor of the "Journal of the American Medical Association." In May, 1886, he was elected president of the International medical congress. In the Chicago medical college, the medical department of the Northwestern university, he assumed the professorship of the principles and practice of medicine and of clinical medicine, and is also dean of the faculty. His principal published writings are an "Essay on the Philosophy of Medicine": "Medical Education and Reform": "Remedial Value and Proper Use of Alcoholic Drinks": "History of Medicine in the United States": "An Experimental Inquiry concerning the Functions of Assimilation, Nutrition, and Animal Heat": "Clinical Lectures" (1879); the chapter on "Bronchitis" in the "American System of Practice of Medicine"; "Lectures on the Principles of Practice of Medicine" (Chicago, 1850), and an article on "Insanity from Acute and Chronic Alcoholism" in the "Hand-Book of Medicine" (New York, 1886).

DAVIS, Nelson Henry, soldier, b. in Oxford, Worcestershire, Mass., 29 Sept., 1828. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1846, and assigned to the 3d infantry. He served in the war with Mexico, received the brevet of 1st lieutenant for gallantry at Contreras and Churubusco, and was also at the siege of Vera Cruz, the battle of Chapultepec, and the capture of the capital of Mexico. He was promoted 1st lieutenant 8 June, 1849, and then served on the frontier, being engaged in several actions while on the Sierra Nevada expedition of 1849-50, and taking part in the Rogue river expedition of 1853. He was made major on 8 March, 1859, at the battle of Bull Run, and from 4 Sept. to 12 Nov., 1861, was colonel of the 7th Massachusetts volunteers. He then became major and assistant inspector-general, and served with the Army of the Potomac, the autumn of 1863, receiving the brevet of lieutenant colonel of cavalry at Gettysburg. He was then transferred to New Mexico, was brevetted colonel 27 June, 1865, for his services against the Apache Indians, and also received the brevet of brigadier-general for his services in the civil war. He was inspector-general of the district of New Mexico in 1868, of the department of Missouri in 1868-75, was on a tour of inspection till 1876, and then became inspector-general of the division of the Atlantic. He was commissioned brigadier-general on 11 March, 1885, and retired on 20 Sept.

DAVIS, Noah, jurist, b. in Haverhill, N. H., 10 Sept., 1818. He was educated at Albion, N. Y., whither his parents removed in 1823, and in the seminary at Lima, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1841, and practised in Gaines, and then in Buffalo. In 1844 he formed a partnership with S. B. Smither, with which he practised in Albion for fourteen years, until he was appointed, in March, 1857, a justice of the New York supreme court, to which office he was subsequently twice elected. After serving for two years as judge, he resigned in November, 1858, having been elected as a Republican to the National house of representatives. He served in congress from 4 March, 1869, till 20 July, 1870, when he resigned, having been appointed by President Grant U. S. attorney for the southern district of New York. He resigned that office on 31 Dec., 1872, being elected a justice of the New York state supreme court for the term expiring in December, 1887. The trial of the case of Edward Stokes for the murder of Fisk, and that of William Mitchell for malfeasance in office, were held before him soon after he took his place on the bench. He was sentenced to a year's imprisonment for each of the twelve counts of the indictment; but, two years later, the court of appeals decided that this cumulative sentence was contrary to law. In 1874 he became presiding judge of the court. In January, 1887, he was retired from the bench, and resumed practice. On his retirement, he said: "It is my nature to form strong convictions, and sometimes I express them too strongly, but neither by speech nor silence have I ever designed to injure any suitor or his counsel. In searching the record of my judicial life I can find no entry that I ever decided any cause or matter contrary to my then convictions of right." A committee of lawyers presented Judge Davis's portrait by Daniel Twedt to the supreme court.

DAVIS, Noah Knowles, educator, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 15 May, 1830. He was graduated at Mercers college, Ga., in 1849, and then spent several years in Philadelphia, chiefly in the study of chemistry. While here he edited the "Model Architect" and the "Carpenter's Guide." In 1853 he became professor of natural science in Howard college, Marion, Ala., and in 1859 principal of the Judson female institute at the same place. In 1868 he was elected president of Bethel college, Russellville, Ky. In 1874 he was called to the chair of moral science of the university of Y. From 1881 to 1883 David Davis is the author of "The Theory of Thought, a Treatise on Deductive Logic" (New York, 1880); and has contributed to various reviews. He has received the degree of LL. D. In religious profession Dr. Davis is a Baptist, and is prominent and active in the councils of that denomination.

DAVIS, Paulina (Ward), reformer, b. in Bloomfield, N. Y., 7 Aug., 1813; d. in Providence, R. I., 24 Aug., 1876. She married Francis Wright, of Utica, N. Y., in 1838, and after his death became in 1849 the wife of Thomas Davis, of Providence, R. I., who was a member of congress in 1838-55. For thirty-five years she labored zealously to promote the rights of women, established "The Una," the first woman-suffrage paper, wrote a history of woman-suffrage reform, and gave lectures in the principal cities of the United States.

DAVIS, Reuben, lawyer, b. in Tennessee, 18 Jan., 1813; d. in Columbus, Miss., 15 Dec., 1873. He studied medicine, and after a few years' practice abandoned that profession for the study of law. He removed to Aberdeen, Miss., and was prosecuting attorney for the 4th judicial district from 1835 till 1839. He was appointed judge of the high court of appeals in 1842, but resigned after four months' service. He served, in the war with Mexico, as colonel of the 2d regiment of Mississippi volunteers. He was a member of the state house of representatives from 1855 till 1857, when he retired and entered the Confederate army as brigadier-general, commanding a brigade of Mississippi militia in Kentucky. He resumed his law practice, and, while defending a prisoner in the St. Louis Court House, was killed by the prosecuting attorney after a verbal altercation.

DAVIS, Richard Bingham, poet, b. in New Brunswick, N. J., in 1790. He was educated at Columbia, but was not graduated. He pursued the business of his father, wood-carving, until 1796, when he became editor of the “Diary,” a daily gazette published in New York, for which he wrote about one year. He then engaged in mercantile business. In appearance he is said to have been somewhat like Oliver Goldsmith, and in manner and person, as well as in speech. His poems are expressions of personal sentiment tinged with melancholy. They were collected and published by the “Calliopene Society,” of which he was a member (New York, 1807). An “Ode to Imagination” shows his attachment to the poetical works of Wordsworth. He was born in the “Street,” his humor. He was also a contributor to the “Drone Papers,” published in the “New York Magazine,” for which he wrote a well-drawn character-sketch of himself, under the name of “Martlet.”

DAVIS, Sylvanus, pioneer, d. in Boston in 1704. In June, 1659, he bought a tract of land of the Indians in Damariscotta, Maine. He resided for some time at Sheepscott, was severely wounded while making his escape from Fort Arowse, and captured by Indians in August, 1676. He accompanied Maj. Walron’s expedition early in 1677, when he became and resided in Falmouth, where he owned land, in 1680. He commanded Fort Loyal, Falmouth, and after five days’ defense was obliged to surrender it to the French and Indians in May, 1690. He was married to Imitte, and exiled four months later. He was a counselor in 1691-2. His account of the conduct of the war is preserved in the Massachusetts historical collections.

DAVIS, Thomas Frederick, clergyman, b. in Wilmington, N. C., 8 Feb., 1804; d. in Camden, S. C., 2 Dec. 1895. He was educated at the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, in 1823, studied law, and practised, but subsequently studied theology, and was ordained deacon in Wilmington by Bishop Ives, 27 Nov., 1831, and priest by the same bishop in Pittsboro, 16 Dec., 1832. He officiated in Pittsboro while in deacon’s orders, became rector of St. James’ church, Wilmington, and St. Luke’s church, Salisbury, N. C. In November, 1846, he removed to South Carolina, and became rector of Grace church, Camden. He was elected bishop of the diocese, and consecrated in St. John’s chapel, New York, 17 Oct., 1855. Bishop Davis received the degree of D. D. from Columbia college in 1853, and the same year from the University of North Carolina.

DAVIS, William Bramwell, physician, b. in Cynthiana, Ky., 1822. He emigrated to the United States from Wales. He was graduated at Wesleyan university in 1852, and in 1853 at Miami medical college, where since 1873 he has been professor of therapeutics. During the civil war he was surgeon of the 187th regiment of Ohio volunteers, and surgeon at the Fort Edward military hospital in Cincinnati. He has been identified with many of the public offices of that city, as well as the medical and educational associations. In 1872 he travelled in Europe. Some of his principal publications are “Report on Vaccination” (Ohio state medical society, 1857); “Constitution of Life Insurance” (Cincinnati medical society, 1875); “Vaccino-Syphilis and Animal Vaccine” (1876); “Intestinal Obstruction” (1880); “Progress of Therapeutics” (1881), and “The Alcoholic Question” (1880).

DAVIS, Woodbury, jurist, b. in Stanchfield, Me., 25 July, 1818; d. in Portland, 15 Aug., 1871. At an early age he removed with his parents to Brooks, Waldo co., where he was educated. He studied law in Belfast, began to practice his profession in Portland, and was elected a judge of the supreme court. In 1846 he was appointed postmaster of Portland, and relinquished law practice. Judge Davis took an active interest in the temperance reform, and was instrumental in shaping the legislation of the state upon that question. He was an anti-slavery man, and one of the founders of the republican party. He contributed many articles on political and legal subjects to the newspapers of his native state, to the New York “Independent,” and to various periodicals, and published “The Beautiful City,” a religious book (New York, 1859).

DAVES, Henry, 1790-1870, “Consumus, b. in Cummington, Mass., 30 Oct., 1816. He was graduated at Yale in 1839, became a teacher, and edited the Greenfield “Gazette,” and subsequently the Adams “Transcript.” He was admitted to the bar in 1842, and served in the legislature from 1848 till 1850, when he became a member of the state senate. He was a member of the Constitutional convention in 1833, and attorney for the western district of Massachusetts, continuing until 1857, when he was elected to congress, and served as a member of the committee on Revolutionary claims. He remained in congress by successive re-elections until 1873. In 1866 he was a delegate to the Loyalists’ convention in Philadelphia, and in 1875 he succeeded Charles Sumner in the senate, and was re-elected in 1884 and 1887. He has been chairman of the committee on ways and means, has served on committees on public buildings and grounds, and inaugurated the measure by which the completion of the Washington monument was undertaken. He is the author of many tariff measures, and assisted in the construction of the wool and woollen tariff of 1868, which was the basis of all wool and woollens from that time until 1883. He is also a member of the committees on appropriations, civil service, fisheries, Revolutionary claims, and Indian and naval affairs. He was appointed on a special committee to investigate the Indian disturbances in the Indian territory, upon which he made a valuable report. The entire system of Indian education due to legislation was created by Mr. Dawes. Among the important bills of his authorship passed are the severalty bill, the Sioux bill, and the bill making Indians subject to DAWES, Thomas, patriot, b. in Boston, 5 Aug., 1781; d. there, 2 Jan., 1809. He was a mechanic, and had received a common-school education. During the controversy with Great Britain he was made colonel of the Boston regiment in 1773, serving until 1778. He often presided at the town-meetings of Boston. He was a member of the house and of the senate, as well as state councillor, and also a member of the Academy of arts and sciences.

—His son, Thomas, jurist, b. in Boston, 8 July, 1757; d. there, 22 July, 1825, was graduated at Harvard in 1777. He was a member of the convention of 1780 and of that which adopted the Federal constitution in 1789. He was judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts from 1792 till 1803, judge of the municipal court from 1803 till 1826, and judge of probate until his death. His literary productions were popular, and his Witticisms proverbial. He published an "Oration" (July, 1787), an "Oration on the Boston Massacre," and the "Law Given on Mount Sinai" (1777). He was a member of the academy of arts and science. His son, Rufus, poet, b. in Boston, 26 Jan., 1803; d. in Washington, D. C., 30 Nov., 1836, entered Harvard in 1820, but was refused a degree, owing to his supposed participation in a breach of discipline. He resented this accusation, which was afterward proved to be unjust, by publishing a satirical poem on the faculty. He studied law, and was admitted to the bar, but never practised. He contributed poems to the "United States Literary Gazette," published in Cambridge, and conducted for a time a weekly paper in Baltimore, called the "Emblem." He published "The Valley of the Nashaway, and other Poems" (1830); "Geraldine," a composition resembling "Don Juan" in form and treatment (1839); "Athens of Damascus," a tragedy founded on the siege of Damascus by the Turks, A. D. 684 (1839); "Nero: an Ode on a poet's love and life" (1840); an "Ode on the Death of Walter Scott;" also several songs and poems, some of which were sung at the laying of the corner-stone of Bunker Hill monument. Mr. Dawes held a government office in one of the departments in Washington during the latter years of his life. He was a Swedesborough, and frequently preached.

DAWES, William, patriot of Lexington. He was despatched to Lexington, with Paul Revere, on 18 April, 1775, and rode through Roxbury, Revere going by way of Charlestown. In the morning of 19 April the message from Warren reached Adams and Hancock. Revere and Dawes, joined by Samuel Prescott, from Concord, rode forward, calling the inhabitants. At Lincoln they were surprised by a party of British officers, and both Dawes and Revere were seized and taken to Lexington, where the British made his separate McConnelsville, Ohio, 8 Jan., 1845. In 1856 he removed with his parents to Newport, Wis., where he received a common-school education. After studying law at Fox Lake, Wis., he was admitted to the bar in 1871. He was engaged in mercantile business until 1877, and since that time has practised his profession. He was a member of the Nebraska constitutional convention in 1875, and was chosen a U.S. senator from that state in 1876. He was chairman of the Republican state central committee of Nebraska from 1878 till 1880. In 1880 he was a delegate to the Republican national convention at Chicago, and was a member of the National Republican committee for Nebraska for a term of four years. Since 1875 he has been trustee and secretary of Doane college at Crete, Neb. He was elected governor of Nebraska in 1882 (re-elected 1884 and 1888); and also DAWSON, Benjamin Franklin, physician, b. in New York city, 28 June, 1847. He studied at Columbia, served in the last year of the civil war as assistant surgeon in the U. S. army, and was graduated at the College of physicians and surgeons in 1866. He then established himself in New York, making a special study of obstetrics and diseases of women and children. He invented a new galvanic battery for galvano-caustic surgery in 1876, the superior qualities of which have done much to advance that branch of surgery. In 1883 he founded the "American Journal of Obstetrics and Diseases of Women and Children," which he edited until 1874. Among his publications are a translation, in conjunction with Prof. Joseph Kamener, of Kloob's Pathological Anatomy of the Female Sexual Organs (1842 and 1846); and of Barnes' "Obstetric Operations," with additions (1870); and several monographs entitled "The Use and Comparative Merits of the Bichloride of Methyline as an Anaesthetic (1874); and "Relations between Alimentation and the Gastro-intestinal Diseases of Infants and Young Children" (1875).

DAWSON, George, journalist, b. in Falkirk, Scotland, 14 March, 1813; d. in Albany, N. Y., 17 Feb., 1883. Though without the advantages of early schooling, he obtained an education through his own exertions. At five years of age he was brought to New York, where he lived with his mother, who had eleven places in a printing-office in Niagara county, N. Y. In 1826 he removed to Rochester and found employment in the office of the "Anti-Masonic Inquirer," edited by Thurlow Weed. In 1830 he accompanied Mr. Weed to Albany, where he became foreman in the office of the "Evening Journal." From 1836 till 1839 he was editor of the Rochester daily "Democrat," and from 1839 till 1843 of the Detroit daily "Advertiser," when he returned to Rochester and resumed the editorial charge of the "Democrat." In 1846 he became associate editor of the Albany "Evening Journal," and, on Mr. Weed's retirement in 1862, assumed control of the paper as senior editor and proprietor, remaining in that relation until 1877. He was postmaster of Albany from 1861 till 1867. In 1850 he travelled in Europe. Though ardently devoted to the republican party, Mr. Dawson was far above the narrow partisan. He was an able and zealous advocate of all patriotic and philanthropic enterprises, and especially of free schools. He was a devout Christian, especially active in the benevolent works of the Baptist church to which he belonged. He gave much time and attention to the subject of Sunday-school missions, in connection with which he was teacher, superintendent, and lay preacher. He was the author of "The Pleasures of Resigning," New York, 1876.

DAWSON, Henry Barton, b. in Gosberton, Lincolnshire, England, 8 June, 1821. He came with his parents to New York in 1834. In 1840 he began contributing to the daily press, and in 1843-6 devoted his evenings to the editorship of the "Crystal Point," a temporary paper. His first historical composition was a "History of the Park" and its vicinity, which was published in the "Corporation Manual" (1855). In 1838 he began the publication, in serial form, of his "Battles of the United States by Sea and Land," and became involved in a controversy concerning the merits of Gen. Israel Putnam. The controversy was carried on by correspondence in the Hartford "Post," and attracted much attention, and the legislature of Connecticut took special action on the subject. The letters were subsequently published in book-form, and copies were sold as high as $50. In 1802 Mr. Dawson made a complete list of every public library in the United States, and published a list of subscribers of monies for the municipal purposes of New York during the occupation of that city by the British army, 1776 to 1783, from the original vouchers. In 1868 he edited the "Pielorialist," the distinguishing feature of his work being the restoration of original text and the rejection of unauthorized mutilations. Its publication called forth an attack by John Jay and James A. Hamilton, and a long controversy ensued, which was afterward reprinted in a volume entitled "Current Fictions Tested by Uncertain Facts" (1874). In 1865 he became editor of the "Gazette," a democratic newspaper published in Yonkers. The first page of the paper was occupied by historical and bibliographical material. Judge Nelson, of the U. S. supreme court, once ordered a case to be re-argumented, and when the time came, it was found that had appeared in the "Gazette" after the case had been argued, might be judically admitted as authorities. In 1880 he was appointed editor of the "Historical Magazine," which in 1877 he enlarged to double its previous size. He is a member of many learned societies, and has published before them a large number of papers. He has published in book-form "Battles of the United States by Sea and Land" (New York, 1868); "The Pielorialist" (1863; 3d ed., 1864); "Current Fictions" (1874); "Recollections of the Jersey Prison-Ship," by Capt. Thomas Dring, one of the Prisoners," from the original manuscript (1863); "Rutgers against Waddington" (1866); and "Westchester County in the Revolution" (1888).

DAWSON, John, statesman, b. in Virginia in 1782; d. in Washington, D. C., 30 March, 1814. He was graduated at Harvard in 1782, studied law, and was admitted to the bar. He was a presidential elector on the Washington ticket in 1792, a member of the Virginia legislature, and a representative of congress from Virginia for nine consecutive terms. From 1807 to March, 1814, he was a member of the United States Senate, and was a member of the House of Representatives 1807-1809. In 1814 he was a member of the American Association for the Promotion of Science, and in 1820 he was a member of the American Philosophical Society. He was a member of the United States Senate from 1807 to 1814, and was elected again in 1814. He was the author of the Homestead bill of 1864. In 1855 he was appointed governor of Kansas, but declined the office. He was a delegate to the Democratic national conventions of 1844, 1848, 1860, and 1868.

DAWSON, John Littleton, lawyer, b. in Uniontown, Pa., 7 Feb., 1819; d. there, 18 Sept., 1870. He was educated at Washington college, studied law, and was admitted to the bar, practising first in Brownsville, Pa. In 1845 he was appointed U. S. district attorney for the western district of Pennsylvania. He was a member of congress from 1851 till 1855, and was elected again in 1857. He was the author of the Homestead bill of 1854. In 1855 he was appointed governor of Kansas, but declined the office. He was a delegate to the Democratic national conventions of 1844, 1848, 1860, and 1868.

DAWSON, Sir John William, Canadian geologist, b. at Pictou, Nova Scotia, 13 Oct., 1820. His father came from the north of Scotland early in the century and settled at Pictou. The son received his early training at the college of Pictou, and, having finished his course there, entered Edinburgh university, returning to Nova Scotia after passing a winter in study. So early, as his tenth year he manifested that love of science which subsequently became his chief characteristic, and while prosecuting the regular course of study at Pictou college he made extensive collections in the natural history of his native province. In 1842 he accompanied Sir Charles Lyell on his scientific tour in Nova Scotia, made several original discoveries in paleontology, and followed up his investigations by studies of the carboniferous rocks of Nova Scotia, on which he contributed two important papers to the Geographical Society of London. In 1846 he returned to Edinburgh university, studying practical chemistry and other subjects. In 1850 he was appointed superintendent of education for Nova Scotia, an office which he held for three years. He also aided materially in establishing a normal school in Nova Scotia, and in regulating the affairs of the University of New Brunswick, as a member of the commission appointed for that purpose. In connection with these labors he published elaborate reports on the schools of Nova Scotia, and a hand-book entitled "Scientific Contributions toward the Improvement of Agriculture." In 1855 he became principal and professor of natural history in McGill college, Montreal. When Prof. Dawson was appointed, the medical department of the college alone was in a flourishing condition, but soon after he assumed the management all the other departments became prosperous. In 1857 he secured the establishment of McGill normal school for the training of Protestant teachers, became its principal, and lectured in it on natural science until 1870. In 1858 he established a school of civil engineering, which was discontinued in 1868 by an act of the legislature, but which he revived in 1871 as the department of practical and applied science in connection with the college over which he presided. Dr. Dawson was elected a fellow of the Geological Society of London in 1854, and of the Royal society in 1862; was elected president of the American association and of the Royal society of Canada in 1882, and of the British association in 1886. He was created a companion of the order of St. Michael and St. George in 1882, and knighted in 1885. In 1852 he discovered the Dendrerpeton acadianum, Pupa retusa, and other fossil reptiles, and in 1864 the Esox canadensis, the most important of his geological discoveries. This fossil had been before noticed by Sir William Logan, but Dr. Dawson, to whom he submitted his specimens, was the first to demonstrate its foraminiferous character and to describe its structure. Hitherto the Laurentian rocks had been regarded as devoid of life, and were known as the ocean, but Dr. Dawson now substituted the name ocean. When the theory of evolution was gaining ground among men of science, Dr. Dawson strongly opposed the extreme view, and he has always shown an aversion to those scientific hypotheses which seem to threaten the foundations of religious faith. In a course of lectures delivered in New York in 1874-5 he contended that the discoveries of modern science, so far as they are facts, harmonize completely with the sacred record. In 1883 Dr. Dawson travelled in Egypt and Syria. His numerous scientific publications include: "The Formation of Gypsum," "Boulder Formation," "The Renewal of Forests destroyed by Fire," "Mode of Accumulation of Coal," and "On the Triassic Red Sandstone of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island." He has published in book-form "Hand-Book of Geography and Physical Science of North America" (1855); "Archaea, or Studies of Creation in Genesis" (1859); "Air-Breathers of the Coal Period"; "Notes on the Post-Pliocene of Canada" (1875); "The Story of the Earth and Man" (New York, 1875); "Science and the Bible" (1876); "The Dawn of Life" (1875); "The Origin of the World" (1877); "Fossil Men and their Modern Representatives" (1878); "The Change of Life in Geological Time" (1880); "Chain of Life" (1884); and "Egypt and Syria" (1885).—His son, George Mercer, Canadian geologist, b. in Pictou, Nova Scotia, 1 Aug., 1849, was educated at McGill college and at the Royal school of mines, London, gaining at the latter the Edward Forbes medal in palaeontology and the Murchison medal in geology, and being graduated as B. S. M. in 1872. In 1872 he made a geological and naturalist's tour in connection with Her Majesty's North American boundary commission, and since then has been assistant director of the geological survey of Canada. He has travelled extensively in British Columbia, the Canadian northwest, and in Europe, in connection with the investigations of the house of representing the general assembly of Manitoba and the Indian commissioner of the northwest in concluding a treaty with the Sauleux tribe of the Ojibway Indians. He resigned the charge of the Dawson route on becoming a candidate for Algoma, for which he was returned at the general election for Ontario in 1875. He resigned his seat in the local legislature, and was elected for Algoma for the Canadian parliament in 1878, and again in 1882. Mr. Dawson has done much to improve his constituency and to ameliorate the condition of the Indians, and in parliament has advocated the formation into a separate province of the great region between the 81st to the 95th meridian—i. e., from French river to the Lake of the Woods.

DAWSON, William C., senator, b. in Greene county, Ga., 17 Jan., 1798; d. in Greensborough, Ga., 5 May, 1856. He was graduated at Franklin college in 1816, and completed his law studies in Litchfield, Conn. In 1818 he was admitted to the bar, and settled in Greensborough, where he was successful as a jury lawyer. He was clerk of the house of representatives of the general assembly of the state for twelve years, and several times senator and representative in the legislature. He was a member of congress from 1836 till 1842, being chairman of the military committee and of the committee on claims. He was appointed judge of the Ocmulgee circuit in 1848, and U. S. senator from 1849 till 1855, serving on important committees, and speaking on many questions of national interest. He published "Laws of Georgia" (1831).

DAY, George Edward, author, b. in Pittsfield, Mass., 19 Dec., 1811; d. in New York, 6 May, 1888, at Yale theological seminary in 1888, when he became assistant instructor there until 1840. From 1840 till 1851 he was settled as a pastor in Marlboro and Northampton, Mass. He was professor of biblical literature in Lane theological seminary, and major of the 9th infantry, 15 May, 1861. He was appointed professor of the Hebrew language, literature, and biblical theology in the theological department of Yale. He edited the "Theological Eclectic" from 1863 till 1871, when it was united with the "Bibliothenica Sacra." He has translated Van Oosterse's "Titus," in Lane's "Commentary," and also Van Oosterse's "Biblical Theology of the New Testament." He was a contributor to Smith's "Bible Dictionary," and has published articles in periodicals and "Reports on the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb" (1845 and 1861).

DAY, Horace, b. in Concord (now Day), Saratoga co., N. Y., 8 Dec., 1822; d. in Providence, R. I., 21 May, 1875. At five years of age he was set to work in a cotton-mill in Hope, R. I., and for several years his time was occupied alternately in the cotton-mill and at school. He studied theology, and in 1846 was ordained and entered upon his first pastorate in Grafton, Mass., where he remained till 1850. While serving in various other places he became connected in 1849 with the "Morning Star" as assistant editor. He was also a contributor. He was a pastor for sixty years, and died at the age of fifty-five years. He visited Europe in 1857 and 1866. In December, 1866, he

Aug., 1867. He was graduated at Yale with high honor in 1795. When Dr. Dwight was appointed president of that college, Mr. Day was invited to be his successor as head-master in Greenfield school, where he remained one year. The following year he became a tutor at Williams, where he remained until 1799, when he was ordained as a clergyman. He began to preach as a candidate for the ministry, but before taking charge of any parish was elected to the professorship of mathematics and natural philosophy at Yale, in 1801, but was not able to enter upon these new duties until 1803. He was professor of the latter office he held until his resignation in 1846. Having previously studied theology, Dr. Day was ordained the same day that he was inaugurated president. In 1817 he received the degree of L.L. D. from Middlebury, in 1818 the degree of D. D. from Yale, and the latter also from Harvard in 1831. His learning and talents, united with kindness of heart and soundness of judgment, secured the respect of his pupils as well as their affection. He published an "Algebra" in 1814, which passed through several editions, of which the latest was issued in 1838, by the joint labors of himself and Prof. Stanley. He wrote also "Men of Superiorities and Solids" (1814); "An Examination of President Edwards' Inquiry as to the Freedom of the Will" (1814); "Plane Trigonometry" (1816); "On the Self-Determining Power of the Will, or Contingent Volition" (1838; 2d ed., 1849); and occasional sermons. He contributed papers to the "American Journal of Science and Arts," the "New Englander," and other periodicals. An address commemorative of his life and character was published, by his friend and relative, Prof. Kingsley (New Haven, 1884).

Henry Noble, clergyman and author, nephew of the second Jeremiah, b. in New Preston, Conn., 4 Aug., 1806, was graduated at Yale in 1828, and was tutor there from 1831 till 1844. He then traveled for fifteen months in Europe, and in 1836 was appointed pastor of the 1st Congregational church in Waterbury, Conn., where he remained until 1840. He was professor of rhetoric and homiletics in Western reserve college, Ohio, from 1840 till 1898. During that time he was engaged in the management of the Cleveland and Pittsburg railroad, and for ten years, that, with three important connecting railroads (two of which he was president) occupied his time. In 1858 he became president of Ohio female college, where he remained his resignation in 1864. Prof. Day has published "The Art of Eloquence" (New Haven, 1844; revised ed., Cincinnati, 1890); "Fundamental Philosophy from Krug" (Hudson, Ohio, 1849); "The Art of Rhetoric" (Hudson, 1850; revised under the name of the "Art of Discourse," New York, 1867); "A Course of Book-keeping" (1881); "The Logic of Sir William Hamilton" (1883); "Elements of Logic" (New York, 1887); "The Art of Composition" (1867); "The American Speller" (1880); "Introduction to the Study of English Literature" (1889); "The Young Composer" (1870); "Logical Praxis" (New Haven, 1872); "The Science of Aesthetics" (1872); "The Elements of Psychology" (New York, 1876); "The Science of Ethics" (1876); "Outlines of Ontological Science, or a Philosophy of Knowldge and of Being" (1878); "The Science of Thought," (1886); and "The Elements of Mental Science" (1886). He has received the degree of D. D. from Farmer's college, Cincinnati, and that of L.L. D. from Ingham university of New York, and also from the State university of Iowa.—Another Day. Another is the name of a novel by Mrs. Sarah P. Conn, 6 July, 1777; d. in Hartford, 1 March, 1855, was graduated at Yale in 1797, studied law at Litchfield, and from September, 1798, till September, 1799, was a tutor in Williams college. He was admitted to the bar in December, 1799, and began practice in 1817, when he was appointed assistant secretary of the state of Connecticut, and in 1810 secretary, an office which he retained until 1855. In May, 1815, he became associate judge of the county court of Hartford, acting in this capacity, with the exception of one year, till May, 1823, when he was made chief judge of that court, and so continued until June, 1833. He was a judge of the city court of Hartford from 1818 till 1831, and one of the committee to prepare the statutes of 1821, and also of 1822 and 1824. He reported the last of the court of errors from 1805 till 1853, which were published in twenty volumes. He also edited several English law-books, amounting altogether to forty volumes, in which he introduced notices of American decisions, and also of later English cases. He was an original member of the "American Law Register," a periodical of which he was president from 1839 until his death.

Day, Mahlon, publisher, b. in Morristown, N. J., 27 Aug., 1790; d. at sea, 27 Sept., 1854. He acquired a competence as a bookseller in New York city, and for fifteen years before his death devoted all his life to charitable and educational objects. He was a member of the Society of Friends. He was lost in the wreck of the steamship "Arctic" off Cape Race, Newfoundland.

Day, Samuel Stearns, missionary, b. in Leeds county, Canada, in 1808; d. in Cortland, N. Y., in October, 1871. He was graduated at the Hamilton literary and theological institution (now Madison university) in 1835, was ordained, and sailed for India, landing at Calcutta in February, 1836. He went to Vizagapatam, and in 1837 to Madras, in order to help himself to his family. He then traveled for a year, and was appointed to the Telagus, a large and intelligent race of Hindoos, numbering about 14,000,000, and occupying the country between Orissa and Madras, removed to Nellore, the centre of his field, in 1840, and labored zealously among the Telugus for eighteen years. He made a short visit to the United States in 1845, and returned to India. He could not endure the climate of the Madras coast, and was compelled to return to his native country in 1863. Where he toiled alone in the east and without apparent results, several churches and schools are now established for the education and training of native missionaries.

Day, Thomas, English author, b. in London, 22 June, 1748; d. 28 Sept., 1789. He studied law, but never practised, having inherited a large fortune. He sympathized with the American patriots, and advocated their cause. Having adopted the peculiar social views of Rousseau, he selected two girls from a foundling hospital, with the intention of educating them and making one of them his wife, but the experiment did not succeed. He is the author of "The Dying Negro," written in conjunction with Mr. Bicknell (1773): "The Devoted Legion," a poem against the war with America (1779); "The Desolation of America," a poem (1777); "Reflections on the Present State of England and the Independence of America" (1782); "Letters of Marius" (1784); "History of Sandford and Merton," his best known book (1785–9); and other works.

1 DAYAN, Charles, lawyer, b. in Amsterdam, N. Y., 16 July, 1777. His early life was spent on a farm, and he received a public-school education and became a teacher. He studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised at Lowville. He was a member of the state senate in 1827–9, being president the second year; acting clerk of the board of supervisors in 1828, and as such was president of the court of errors. He was elected to congress from New York as a democrat, serving from 5 Dec., 1831, to 2 March, 1833. He was a member of the state house of representatives in 1833–8, and was district attorney for Lewis county from 1840 to 1845.

2 DAYE, Stephen, the first printer in the English-American colonies, b. in London in 1611; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 22 Dec., 1688. In connection with the founding of Harvard college in 1638, the first printing-press was established in this country. Through the instrumentality of the Rev. Joseph Glover, a wealthy non-conformist minister, a press and material were shipped from England, accompanied by Mr. Glover and Thomas Daye, whom he had engaged in London. Daye was supposed to be a descendant of John Daye of the most eminent family of early English printers. On the passage over Mr. Glover died, but Daye duly entered upon the work, set up the press, and, by direction of the magistrates and elders, in January, 1639, printed the "Freeman's Oath," which was the first issue of the colonial press. It was claimed that Daye had served an apprenticeship in London; but his deficiencies as a compositor, indicated by errors of punctuation and spelling, by the division of monosyllables by a hyphen at the end of lines, and similar technical blunders, lead to the presumption that, though bred a printer, he had been chiefly accustomed to press-work, in which he was more successful. The second work printed was an almanac, made by William Pierce, mariner (1639); then the Psalms, "newly turned into metre, for the edification and comfort of the saints" (1640). He also printed "Catechism of the Body of Liberties," containing one hundred laws of the colony (1641; 2d ed., 1648), which were ordered to be sold in quires at three shillings each. Daye was superseded in the management of the press, in 1649, by the appointment of the magistrates and elders, although no reason was ever given for their action, of Samuel Green as printer. The general court of Massachusetts, in October, 1641, showed a due appreciation of Daye's thirteen years' work by granting him 300 acres of land for "being the first that sett upon printing."

3 DAYTON, Amos Cooper, physician and clergyman, b. in Plainfield, N. J., 4 Sept., 1813; d. in Perry, Ga., 11 June, 1885. He was graduated at the Medical College of New York city in 1844, and soon removed to the south in search of health. He was at first a Presbyterian, but became disgusted with his church relations, and in 1852, while residing in Vicksburg, Miss., having adopted Baptist views, united with that denomination. Henceforth he was distinguished for his controversial writings. Besides being associate editor of the "Tennessee Banner," he was the author of two religious novels, "Theodosia" and "The Infidel's Daughter." The first had a wide circulation.

4 DAYTON, Elias, Revolutionary officer, b. in Elizabethtown, N. J., in July, 1737; d. there, 17 July, 1807. He began his military career by joining the British forces, and fought in the "Jersey blues" under Wolfe at Quebec. Subsequently he commanded a company of militia, with which he marched on an expedition against the northern Indians. He was a member of the committee of safety at the beginning of the Revolutionary war, and in conjunction with William Alexander, Lord Stirling, commanded a party which captured a British transport off Elizabethtown (July, 1775). About 1777 he served as colonel of the 3d New Jersey regiment, and aided in suppressing the mutiny of the New Jersey line in 1781. He was made brigadier-general in 1788, and was in active service during the entire war, taking a prominent part in the battles of Springfield, Monmouth, Brandywine, and Yorktown. He had three horses shot under him; one at Germantown, one at Springfield, and one at Crosswick's Bridge. After the war he served several terms in the legislature of his native state, and was made major-general of militia, and member of the Continental congress from 1787 till 1788. Upon the formation of the New Jersey Society of the Cincinnati, Gen. Dayton was elected president, which office he held until his death. His son, Jonathan, statesman, b. in Elizabethtown, N. J., 16 Oct., 1790; d. there, 9 Oct., 1824, was graduated at Princeton in 1776, studied law, and was admitted to the bar. He entered the Continental army, and was appointed paymaster of his father's regiment, 26 Aug., 1776. He held other commissions during the war, was in many battles, and at Yorktown had command under Lafayette. He was for a few years a member of the New Jersey House of representatives, and its speaker in 1790. He was a delegate from New Jersey to the convention that framed the Federal constitution in 1787. He was elected to congress from New Jersey in 1791, and re-elected for three consecutive terms, being speaker during the two last congresses, and serving till 3 March 1799. He was elected U. S. senator from New Jersey, and served from 2 Dec., 1800, to 3 March 1803. He was arrested for alleged conspiracy with Aaron Burr, but was not tried. He received the degree of LL. D. from Princeton in 1798.
Daza, Hilarion (da-thal), Bolivian statesman, b. at Sucre, in 1840, of humble parentage, partly Indian. The name of his father, a Spaniard, was Grosoli, but the son adopted his maternal family name, Daza. When eighteen years of age he volunteered in the army of the liberals. Subsequent successful revolutions brought him into notice, and won him the patronage and confidence of Melgarejo. To explore the courses of the rivers Pilcomayo and Bermejo, flowing into the Paraguay, numerous fruitless expeditions have been organized; and in one of these, during the brief lull in political strife that marked the dictatorship of Melgarejo, the year 1857 found young Daza second in command, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. He was conspicuous in January, 1871, in league with his colonel, Juan Granier, against his former friend and patron. On the deposition of Melgarejo, Daza, at the head of his regiment of cuareros, held in check the turbulent factions at La Paz, for which services he was rewarded by President Morales with further promotion and the portfolio of war. As minister and general he succeeded in maintaining order after the death of Morales in 1872, and insured the peaceful accession of the constitutional successor. In the same year he supported the candidature of Bolivian, and on the death of the latter became himself a candidate for the presidency against Salinas (the civil candidate), Obidias, and Vasquez (the representative of the Corral party). When the elections were over a dispute arose as to the majority; and Daza, it is contended, seized the office as his right, and was inaugurated on 4 May, 1876. His government was popular, and troubled with as few revolutions as that of any of his predecessors. At the beginning of the war with Chile, 1 March, 1879, he set out at the head of his troops, leaving the government in charge of Señor Guerra, minister of foreign affairs. Of Daza's part in this war Markham says: "The Bolivian army under his command, 4,000 strong, arrived at Tacna, in Peru, on 30 April, but in the short duration of his chiefship of his forces, was unable to advance from Arica to take the invaders in the rear while they were engaged with the army of Tarapaca. Daza began his march from Tacna with 3,000 men, loitered three days at Arica, started again on 11 Nov., and on the 12th marched over fifteen miles of sandy desert to the little river Victoria. He advanced one more march to the defile of the river Camarones, but there stopped again, and on 16 Nov. abandoned the work he had undertaken, leaving the army of Tarapaca to its fate, and returned to La Paz he heard at Arica, in the Dictatorship of Daza, on 1896 he was nominated by the newly formed republican party for vice-president. In March, 1857, he was made attorney-general for the state of New Jersey, and held that office until 1861, when President Lincoln appointed him minister to France, where he remained until his death. His son, William Lewis, who graduated at Princeton in 1858, and practised law in Trenton, was appointed by President Arthur minister to the Netherlands.

DEALY, Patrick Francis, clergyman, b. in New York, of Irish parentage, in 1836. He was educated in the grammar-schools of New York city, and afterward entered St. John's college, Fordham. After teaching in Fordham and in the Jesuit college of Montreal, he was sent to Europe to finish his theological studies. He continued his ecclesiastical course in France, and afterward in Rome, but, owing to the danger of disturbances there in 1889, was sent by his superiors to the University of Innsbruck. He returned to the United States in 1888, and was appointed professor of rhetoric in St. John's college, Fordham. He was afterward rector of the church of St. Francis Xavier, New York. During his confessorship the church was completed, principally through his instrumentality. He was selected by Cardinal McCloskey to take charge of the first pilgrimage that ever left America for Rome, and was treated with great distinction by the pope and cardinals. He founded the Xavier Union in 1871, and took a prominent part in the formation of the Catholic union, a body consisting of the leading Catholics of the state, which watches over Catholic interests. He was appointed their spiritual director by Cardinal McCloskey, and was the medium of communication between them and the general. On his appointment as rector of Fordham college in 1880, the representative Catholics of New York petitioned the general of the order to allow him to remain in the city, as the numerous societies with which he was connected would suffer by his absence. This was refused, but he was allowed to continue his work with the Xavier and Catholic unions. Father Dealy did much for the development of St. John's college, Fordham. He founded four scholarships of the yearly value of $400, open to competitors without distinction of creed, and established a special scientific course. He was a member of the executive council of the historical societies of New York and Brooklyn, principally on the early history of New York.

DEAN, Amos, lawyer, b. in Barnard, Vt., 16 Feb., 1803; d. 26 Jan., 1888. He was graduated at Union in 1822, studied law, and on his admission to the bar formed a partnership of long continuance with Azor Tabor, and soon attained a high reputation for his legal attainments. In 1833 he projected the Young men's association of Albany, of which he was a lifelong friend and supporter, and in 1854 delivered before its convention, a work which was published. He prepared numerous treatises on law subjects, which have been recognized as standard works. In 1851, on the organization of the law-school, he was a member of the faculty, and he had also filled the chair of medical jurisprudence in the Albany Medical College, and in 1839. He is the author of "Lectures on Phrenology" (1835); "Manual of Law" (1838); "Philosophy of Human Life" (Boston, 1888); "Medical Jurisprudence" (1854); and "Bryan and Stratton's Commercial Law" (New York, 1861). He left unfinished an elaborate work, the "History of Civilization" (7 vols., Albany, 1869-70).
DEAN, Gilbert, jurist, b. in Pleasant Valley, Dutchess co., N. Y., 14 Aug., 1819; d. in Poughkeepsie, 12 Oct., 1870. He was graduated at Yale in 1841. Afterward he studied law, was admitted to the bar in Connecticut, and in May, 1844, in New York. He practiced in Poughkeepsie in 1844-53, and then removed his office to New York city. He was chosen to congress from the districts composed of Dutchess and Putnam counties, and served from 1851 till 1853; was re-elected for a second term, but resigned to accept the office of justicer of the supreme court of New York, to which he was appointed by the governor, in June, 1854, to fill the unexpired term of Seward Barculo, deceased. He served on the bench almost eighteen months, and was during the last year (1855) one of the judges of the court of appeals.

DEAN, James, educator, b. in Windsor, Vt., 26 Nov., 1776; d. in Burlington, Vt., 20 Jan., 1849. He was descended from James Dean, of Stonington. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1800, was a tutor in the University of Vermont in 1807-9, and a professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in 1809-10. In 1810 he was appointed professor in Dartmouth till the supreme court decided in favor of the old college, and the new ceased to exist, when he resumed his place in the University of Vermont, holding it from 1821 till 1854. He published a "Gazetteer of Vermont" (1836), and an address delivered on his induction as professor (1810).

DEAN, John Ward, author, b. in Wiscasset, Me., 13 March, 1815. His youth was spent in Portland, Me. From 1839 till 1849 he resided in Providence, R. I., and since then in and near Boston. He has filled for many years various offices in the New England genealogical society, to whose "Register" he has contributed valuable papers. Among the papers edited by him for the society is a curious piece of ancient writing, "A Declaration of Remarkable Providences in the Course of My Life, by John Dane, of Ipswich, 1898." In May, 1870, Mr. Dean was chosen president of the Prince society, of which he was one of the founders; and he has also been recording secretary of the American statistical association. He has accumulated an amount of historical knowledge such as few men possess. He has edited the first and a portion of the second volumes of the first series, and one number of the fourth volume of the second series, of the "Historical Magazine." He is the author of "Memoir of Rev. Nathaniel Ward," with notices of his family (Albany, 1888); and "Memoir of Rev. Michael Wigglesworth" (Albany, 1871); has published pamphlets, and has also edited the "New England Historical and Genealogical Register."

DEAN, Julia, actress, b. in Pleasant Valley, N. Y., 22 July, 1830; d. in New York city, 6 March, 1896. She was the daughter of Julia Drake, an actress, who married Thomas Fosdick for her first husband, and later Edmund Dean, a well-known manager of Buffalo and Rochester theatres. Her education for the stage was accomplished under his direction. She made her stage debut as Ellen in "The Lady of the Lake," during 1845, in Louisville, Ky. Later in the same year she filled an engagement at the Bowery theatre, New York, and appeared as Julia in "The Hunchback." Her success was flattering, and in November, 1846, she played the same part at the Arch street theatre, Philadelphia. In 1855 she married Dr. Arthur Hayne, of Charleston, S. C. In May, 1856, she sailed for San Francisco, and after an absence of nearly two years returned to the east with the proceeds of a very successful tour. She was divorced from her husband, on the ground of his failure to support her, and in 1860 married James Cooper, of New York. Her last appearance in New York was in October, 1867. She excelled in juvenile tragedy and high comedy parts.

DEAN, Paul, clergyman, b. in Bernard, Vt.; d. in Framingham, Mass., 18 Jan., 1849. In 1806 he was ordained pastor of the Universalist society in Barre, Vt. He was pastor of the Hanover street church, Boston, Mass., from 1818 till 1823, and of the Bulfinch street church from May, 1823, till May, 1840. The denomination was known as "Restorationists," and in 1838 changed its name and has since been Unitarian. He was afterward settled over a Unitarian congregation at Easton, Mass. He published "Lectures on Final Restoration" (1839), and sermons and addresses.

DEAN, William, missionary, b. in Eaton, N. Y., 21 June, 1807. He graduated at the Hamilton literary and theological institution (now Madison university) in 1833, and in the same year was ordained to the Baptist ministry, and sailed from Boston for Siam to engage in missionary work with the American Board. In 1842 he transferred his labors to Hong-Kong, where he remained until 1845, when he returned to spend a year in this country. He resumed his work in Hong-Kong in 1847, and continued it until 1862, when he once more took up his residence in Bangkok. He retired from active work, to spend the closing days in this country. His long, honorable, and fruitful service as a missionary has few parallels. He has received the degree of D. D. His publications, mainly translations, are all in the Chinese language. They embrace "The New Testament" (Canton, 1847; formerly issued as the first issue being printed by Chinamen from wooden blocks); "Revision of the Pentateuch" (1858); "Commentary on Matthew" (1859); "Commentary on Genesis" (1868); "Commentary on Mark" (1870); "Commentary on Matthew" (1870); Stow's "Daily Manna," and smaller tracts.

DEANE, Charles, author, b. in Biddeford, Me., 10 Nov., 1813. He is descended from Walter Deane, one of the first settlers of Taunton, Mass. He was educated at a classical school and at Thornton academy, in New Hampshire. He was at the age of twenty-five years of age he went to Boston, where for twenty-five years he was a merchant. He retired from business in 1864, and became a resident of Cambridge. Mr. Deane acquired a taste for the study of American history many years ago, and his collection of books is among the most valuable in New England relating to its early history. In 1856 he received the degree of LL. D. from Bowdoin. He is a member of the Phi Beta Kappa society, and of the chief historical and kindred societies of the country. Among his publications are "Some Notices of Samuel Gorton" (1860); "The Plymouth Patent" (1854); "Bibliography of Gov. Hutchinson's Publications" (1857); "Wingfield's Discourse of Virginia" (1860); "Letters of Phillis Wheatley" (1864); Smith's "True Relation" (1866); "Reminiscences of John Goddard's Mappe Monde" (1867); "Memoir of George Livemore" (1869); and "The Forms in issuing Letters-Patent by the Crown of England" (1870). Several of these (and others not here enumerated) originally appeared in the publications of the Massachusetts historical society, or in the "Chronicles of America." Mr. Deane has edited Gov. Bradford's "History of Plymouth Plantation" (1856) and Bradford's "Dialogue, or Third Conference," between old men and young men (1870), and several volumes of the Collections and Proceedings of the Massachusetts historical society, of which body he is the recording secretary.

DEANE, James, Indian missionary, b. in Groton, Conn., 20 Aug., 1748; d. in Wesertown, Oneida co., N. Y., 10 Sept., 1833. He was gradu-ated at Groton School 1773-4, and in 1774-5 he was a missionary to the Canadian Indians, and he afterward employed by congress to pacify the northern Indians, a work for which he was peculiarly fitted, being familiar with their language, having been, when twelve years of age, associated with Mr. Sibley and Mr. Mesly, a “Knights of the Sword of the Nations.” During the Revolutionary war he was commissioned as a major, and served as an Indian agent and interpreter at Fort Stanwix. He was taken prisoner by the Indians, and would have been killed but for the pleadings of their women. At the close of the war the Oneidas granted him a tract of land two miles square, near Rome, Oneida co., which he afterward exchanged for a tract in Wesertown, whither he removed in 1786. He was for a long time a judge in Oneida county, and held other offices of trust. Deansville was named in his honor. He wrote an essay on Indian mythology, which is lost.

DEANE, James, naturalist, b. in Coleraine, Mass., 14 Feb., 1801; d. in Greenfield, 8 June, 1858. He passed his early life on his father’s farm, and in 1807 removed to Greenfield. He, after writing for four years in a lawyer’s office, he studied medi- cine. He was graduated as M. D. in 1831, and practised from that date until his death. In the spring of 1835 he discovered fossil footprints in the red sandstone of the Connecticut valley, and, having called the attention of scientific men to the fact, his investigations were afterward extended by Prof. Edward Hitchcock and others. American geologists were soon convinced of the genuineness of the footprints; but those in England were skeptical until a box of impressions, with a com- munication, had been sent by Dr. Deane to Dr. A. Mantell, by whom they were placed before the Geological society of London. At the time of his death he was about publishing an illustrated work embodying the results of twenty-four years of geological study and labor, which has since been issued by the Smithsonian Institution. He contrib- uted frequently to Silliman’s “Journal” and the Boston “Medical and Surgical Journal,” and was the author of a paper on the “Hygienic Con- dition of the Survivors of Ovariotomy,” in which he favored the morality of the operation.

DEANE, John H., lawyer, b. in Canada. He removed to the United States at an early age. He entered Rochester university, but in 1862 left college and enlisted as a private soldier in defence of the Union. He was captured at the battle of Gettysburg, and was for some time confined in a Confederate prison. After being exchanged, he entered the navy and served until the close of the war. He then studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began practice in the city of New York. Mr. Deane has been especially distinguished for his gift to literary institutions under the control of Baptists. To Rochester university he has given $100,000, besides considerable sums to the Roches- ter theological seminary and to Vassar college.

DEANE, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Mansfield, Mass., 30 March, 1784; d. 9 Aug., 1894. He was graduated at Brown in 1803, and in 1810 became pastor of the second church at Scituate, Mass., a charge which he retained for twenty-four years. He published “The Populous Village,” a poem (1828); a “History of Scituate” (1831); and a number of sermons and short poems.—His nephew, William Reed, antiquary, b. in Mansfield, Mass., 21 Aug., 1809; d. there, 16 June, 1871, was en-gaged many years in mercantile life in Boston, and also contributed largely to the Unitarian and the secular press. He wrote valuable articles for the “New England Register” and “The Historical Magazine,” and was thoroughly acquainted with the early history of New England. He published genealogical his- tories of the Deane (in 1849), Leonard (1851), and Watson (1864) families, and also edited “Madam Bovary” and “Little Women.” He died at New York, 26 June, 1898. He was one of the earliest members of and held various offices in the New England historic-genealogical society.

DEANE, Silas, diplomatist, b. in Groton, Conn., 24 Dec., 1737; d. in Deal, England, 23 Aug., 1788. He was graduated at Yale in 1758, and, engaging in mercantile pursuits at Wethersfield, Conn., took a leading part in the movements that led to the outbreak of the Revolution. He was sent as a delegate from Connecticut to the Continental con- gress, 1774-8. In 1776 he was ordered to France as a secret diplomatic and financial agent, where he made arrangements for securing substantial aid from that country, and, with Dr. Franklin and Arthur Lee, negotiated treaties of amity and com- merce between France and the United States that were signed in Paris, 6 Feb., 1778. He also personally obtained the services of Lafayette, De Kalb, and other foreign officers. These contracts were subsequently made the basis of charges against him by congress on the ground of ex- travagance, and he was recalled in consequence of the resolution passed 21 Nov., 1777. Reaching Philadelphia in 1778, he found that many re- ports had been circulated to his discredit. These seem to have originated with his late colleague, Arthur Lee, who had quarrelled with him in Paris, but Deane had warm friends in Jay and Adams, the latter defending him in his mission to France. After a heated controversy with influential members of congress, and being required by that body to make a full statement of his financial transactions in France, he was com- pelled to return to that country to procure the requisite papers. There he found that the publication of certain of his private despatches had embittered the French government against him, and he was thus forced to retire to Holland, whence he passed over to England, where he died in great poverty, estranged from his native land and feeling that he had been unjustly dealt with. In 1842 congress vindicated his memory by dec- iding that a consider- able sum of money was due him, and directed its payment to his heirs. Deane published, under the control of his defence, “Letters to Hon. Robert Morris” (New London, 1784); “An Address to the Free and Independent Citizens of the United States of North America” (Hartford and London, 1784); and “Paris Papers, or Mr. Silas Deane’s Late Inter- cepted Letters to his Brother and other Friends” (New York, 1871).
DEARBORN, Benjamin, inventor, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., in 1755; d. in Boston, 22 Feb., 1838. He served an apprenticeship as a printer, and afterward opened an academy for girls. About 1790 he removed his school to Boston. In 1784, under the signature of "A Friend of Industry," he wrote an article for "The New Hampshire Gazette," in which he first suggested the employment of convicts for labor. He was the inventor of the spring balance.

DEARBORN, Henry, soldier, b. in North Hampton, N. H., 23 Feb., 1751; d. in Roxbury, Mass., 6 June, 1829. After studying medicine, he began his practice at Nottingham Square in 1772. He employed his leisure in the study of the art of war, he set out on the day after the battle of Lexington for Cambridge, at the head of sixty minute-men, reaching that place early the next day. On his return he was appointed captain in Stark's regiment, and subsequently took part in the battle of Bunker Hill, where he covered the retreat of the American forces. In September he accompanied Arnold's expedition to Canada, but was for some time seriously ill. He recovered in time to assist in the attack on Quebec, 31 Dec., where he was made prisoner. He was released on parole in 1776, and exchanged in March, 1777, when he was appointed major in Scammell's regiment. He fought in the battles of Stillwater, Saratoga, Monmouth, and Newtown, distinguishing himself at Monmouth by a successful charge. In 1781 he joined Washington's staff as deputy commissary general, with the rank of colonel, and served at the siege of Yorktown. In June, 1784, he took up his residence at Monmouth, Me. He was chosen brigadier-general of militia in 1787, and major-general in 1789. In 1789 he was appointed U. S. marshal for Maine. He was a consistent democrat, and re-elected to the 4th, serving from 1789 till 1797. President Jefferson appointed him secretary of war, which office he occupied from 1801 till 1809. In the latter year President Madison gave him the composition of the port of Boston, which place he filled until appointed senior major-general in the U. S. army, 27 Jan., 1812, and assigned to the command of the Northern Department. He succeeded in capturing York (now Toronto) on 27 April, 1813, and Fort George on 27 May following. On 6 July he was recalled, on the ostensible ground of impaired health, but really in consequence of being charged with political intrigue, and placed in command of the city of New York. His request for a court of inquiry was not granted. He served from 7 May, 1822, till 30 June, 1824, as minister to Portugal, where he suffered his resignation, which was accepted. He then settled at Roxbury, Mass., where he spent the remainder of his life, paying annual visits to his farm in Maine. In person he was large and commanding, frank in his manners, and remarkable for his integrity. He published an address which he delivered on his resignation, and wrote a journal of his expedition to Canada, imprisonment in Quebec, and other adventures. His son, Henry Alexander Scammell, lawyer, b. in Exeter, N. H., 3 March, 1788; d. in Portland, Me., 29 July, 1851. He was graduated at William and Mary college in 1808, and studied law with Judge Story in Salem, Mass., where for a short time he practised. He succeeded his father in 1812 as collector of the port of Boston, filling that office until 1829. He superintended the forts at Portland, and was appointed brigadier-general of militia, commanding the defences of Boston harbor, in 1812. He was a member of the State constitutional convention of 1820, of the state house of representatives in 1829, and of the state senate in 1830. He served in congress from 5 Dec., 1831, till 2 March, 1833, and acted as delegate from Massachusetts from 1834 till 1845, when he was removed for loaning the state arms to the state of Rhode Island, to be used in suppressing the Dorr rebellion. He also served as mayor of Roxbury, Mass., in 1847-51, being re-elected annually. He was a strenuous advocate of internal improvements, the construction of the Great Western railroad of Massachusetts and the tunnelling of Hoosac mountain being largely due to his labors. He was fond of horticulture and landscape gardening, and the cemeteries of Roxbury and Mount Auburn owe much to his taste. He in a considerable degree conducted a busy public life, and his literary activity was very great, although but few of his works have been published. Among these are "Memoir on the Black Sea, Turkey, and Egypt," with charts (3 vols.). "Boston, Its Internal Improvements and Commerce of the West" (Boston, 1839); and "History of Navigation and Naval Architecture" (2 vols.). His manuscript remains include a "Diary;" a "Life of Maj.-Gen. Dearborn;" "Life of Com. Bainbridge;" "Life of Jesus Christ;" and "Writings on Horticulture." See "Address on Henry Dearborn," by Daniel Goodwin (Chicago, 1884).

DEARBORN, Nathaniel, engraver, b. in 1786; d. in South Reading, Mass., 7 Nov., 1852. He was one of the earliest engravers on wood in Boston, and published "The American Text-Book for the Letters" (Boston); "Boston Notions; an Account of That Village from 1630 to 1847" (1845); "Reminiscences of Boston, and Guide through the City and Environs" (1851); and "Guide through Mount Auburn" (1857).

DEARING, James, soldier, b. in Campbell county, Va., 25 April, 1840; d. in Lynchburg in April, 1895. He was a great-grandson of Col. Charles Lynch, of Revolutionary fame, who gave his name to the summary method of administering justice now known as "Lynch law," through his rough-and-ready way of treating the tories. He was graduated at Hanover, Va., academy, and was appointed a cadet in the U. S. military academy, but resigned in 1861, to join the Confederate army when Virginia passed the ordinance of secession. He was successively lieutenant of the Washington artillery of New Orleans, captain of Latham's battery, major and commander of Denny's artillery battalion, and colonel of a cavalry regiment from North Carolina, and was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general for gallantry at the battle of Plymouth. He participated in the battle of Fredericksburg, of the Army of Northern Virginia and the Army of the Potomac. On the retreat of the Confederate forces from Peters burg to Appomattox Court-House, he was mortally wounded near Farmville in a singular encounter with Brig.-Gen. Theodore Read, of the National army. His body was brought back to the head of their forces, on opposite sides of the Appomattox, at High Bridge, and a duel with pistols ensued. Gen. Read was shot dead, but Gen. Dearing lingered until a few days after the surrender of Lee, when he died in the old City hotel at Lynchburg, Va.

DEBECQ, James, painter, b. in Philadelphia in 1818; died insane. His maternal grandfather was Ralph Izard, the South Carolina patriot. He showed an early talent for art, and studied under John Sanderson in his native city, and in the schools of the National Academy of Design, New York. In 1840 he visited the "far west" of that day, and spent several years at St. Louis in the successful practice of his profession. He was a man of decided ability; but mental derangement cut short his career many years before his death. Among his more important pictures that have become widely known through engravings are "The Turkey Shoot," "Walking the Chalk," "Long Jake," "The Wounded Pawnee," "Indian Guide," "A Group of Sioux," "Hunters on the Prairie," and "The Last Shot." His "Council of the Shawnees at North Bend" portrays an incident in the life of Gen. George Rogers Clarke.

DE AYOLAS, Juan. See AYOLAS.

DE BAR, Benedetti, actor, b. in London, England, 5 Nov., 1812; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 14 Aug., 1877. He made his début at the Theatre Royal, Manchester, in 1830, and in 1832 ran away to the United States in 1834, appearing the following year at the St. Charles theatre, New Orleans, as Sir Benjamin Backbite in the "School for Scandal." In 1837 he opened the old National theatre in New York city, and in 1839 played the old St. Louis theatre, after appearing in many cities of the west. In 1840 he played successfully in New York and London, and in the same year returned to New York, where he played at the Bowery theatre. In 1843 he became stage-manager for Hamblin at the Bowery, in 1846 purchased the Bowery theatre, New York, retaining it for three years, and afterward went on a four years' starring tour, playing in the principal cities of the United States. In 1858 he became proprietor of the St. Charles theatre, New Orleans, and in 1856 of the St. Louis theatre, leasing it in 1857, when he bought it and tenanted it in the Grand opera house of that city. After the death of Backett the dramatic stage lacked a great Falstaff until Mr. De Bar undertook its representation, making a specialty of this character, which others had adopted and soon relinquished. His appearance in Bon Breen in this character, after his success in the west and south, was a dramatic event of note. He acquired a large fortune, being successful both as an actor and manager.—His wife, Florence, b. in Philadelphia in 1828, made her début in 1839 as a danseuse at the Walnut street theatre, Philadelphia. Her maiden name was Valle. She travelled with Fanny Ellsler, and at the old Park theatre in 1848 played the "French Spy." She retired from the stage in New Orleans in December, 1857.

DE BEGNIS, Giuseppe, opera-singer, b. in Lugano, Switzerland, d. in New York city in August, 1849. He began his vocal studies at the west of seven years, and sang soprano till he was nearly fifteen, when his voice broke. He then studied for a comedian, and later resumed lessons as a baritone vocalist. He made his first appearance as an opera-singer in Milan in 1840 and had sufficient success to decide his continuance as a performer on the lyric stage. In 1816 he married the noted prima-donna and famous beauty, Signorina Ronzi. They sang throughout Italy with great success, and in 1819 made their first appearance at the Italian opera in Paris, remaining three seasons. In 1821 they performed in London, and thereafter in the various capital cities of Europe, in concerts and operas. About 1845 De Begnis came to the United States, appearing frequently in New York city in concerts and operas with only moderate success. His voice had lost its freshness, and his style seemed antiquated. He was still notable as one of the purest and most natural of Italian buffo singers; but that kind of vocalist was not appreciated in this country. In the old Rossini comic operas among the flexible and suave accompaniment were altogether remarkable. His countenance was severely marked by small-pox; but in his make-up for performance he gave no evidence of facial disfigurement. Disappointed in his reception by the American public, he longed to return to the scenes of his early success; but the horrors of sea-sickness and hazards of the voyage prevented. He died of cholera, not without means, but neglected and almost forgotten.

DE BERDT, Dennis, colonial agent, b. early in the 18th century; d. in England, about 1771. He was a London merchant, with extensive commercial connections in this country. About November, 1766, when the colonial legislature of Massachusetts dismissed Richard Jackson from its service, the house elected the honest and aged Dennis de Berdt as its own particular agent. From this time he lived in Philadelphia, being a friend to colonial liberty, dated the revolt of the American colonies, and his correspondence and advice conformed to the opinion. Samuel Adams divined the evil designs, now so near their execution, and instructed De Berdt to oppose the establishment of a bill of attainder in the colonies, as useless for protection and dangerous to liberty. "Certainly," said he, "the best way for Great Britain to make her colonies a real and lasting benefit is to give them all consistent indulgence in trade, and to remove any sense of the contrary; that their liberties are in danger. While any act of parliament is in force which has the least appearance of a design to raise a revenue out of them, their jealousy will be awake." The closing of the affairs of Mr. De Berdt's firm in England, which was found in 1765 and had made the fortune of Mr. De Berdt, and the merchant ship taken by Joseph Reed, a young colonial visitor to England, who had practised law in the New Jersey courts, and later had held, as his first political appointment, the office of deputy secretary for the province of New Jersey. He had visited England in 1763-5, and in his success in the west and south, was a dramatic event of note. He acquired a large fortune, being successful both as an actor and manager.—His wife, Florence, b. in Philadelphia in 1828, made her début in 1839 as a danseuse at the Walnut street theatre, Philadelphia. Her maiden name was Valle. She travelled with Fanny Ellsler, and at the old Park theatre in 1848 played the "French Spy." She retired from the stage in New Orleans in December, 1857.

DE BERRY, Edmund, politician, b. in Mount Gilead, N. C., 14 Aug., 1787; d. there, 12 Dec., 1859. He received a public-school education and engaged in agricultural pursuits. He was a member of the state legislature, with occasional intermissions, from 1806 till 1828, and was elected to congress as a whig, serving from 1829 till 1831. He was defeated when a candidate for re-election, but was elected again in 1837 and served from 1838 till 1845, and was again in congress from 1849 till 1851.

DE BHAQUIÈRE, Peter Boyle, Canadian statesman, b. in Dublin, 27 April, 1784; d. in Yorkville (now a part of Toronto), 23 Oct., 1860. He was the youngest of four children, with sufficient success to decide his continuance as a performer on the lyric stage. In 1816 he married the noted prima-donna and famous beauty, Signorina Ronzi. They sang throughout Italy with great success, and in 1819 made their first appearance at the Italian opera in Paris, remaining three seasons. In 1821 they performed in London, and thereafter in the its chancellor, but subsequently resigned. He was also a member of the Anglican synod.

DE BOLT, Rezin A., jurist, b. in Fairfield county, Ohio, in 1823; received a common school education and worked on a farm till his seventeenth year, when he was apprenticed to a tanner. After serving his time he followed his trade for a few years, but in the mean time studied law, and was admitted to the bar in February, 1856. He removed to Missouri in 1858, and began the practice of law. He was appointed school commissioner of Grundy county in 1859, and re-elected to the same office in 1860, serving until the beginning of the civil war. He entered the National service in 1861 as captain in the 23d Missouri infantry, was captured at the battle of Shiloh, 6 April, 1862, and held as prisoner until the following October. In 1863 he resigned his commission on account of impaired health, and resumed his profession, but in 1864 re-entered the army as major in the 44th Missouri infantry, and was mustered out of service in August, 1865. He was elected judge of the circuit court for the 11th district of Missouri in November, 1868, which office he held until his election as a representative from Missouri in the 44th congress, closing his connection with the bar.

DE BONNE, P. A., Canadian jurist, b. about 1750. He was a nephew of the French governor of Canada, Marquis de la Jonquière. He was a member of the executive council in 1784, and also of the legislative assembly, in which he opposed Mr. Chauveau, to mention one only. He eventually became leader of the Canadian party in the house, and displayed great ability as a debater; but, as his expressions were objectionable to the assembly, he was dismissed from the house by a simple vote of its members. He was also a judge in Lower Canada, and was a member of the judiciary who held a seat in the house.

DEBORRE, Preudhomme, soldier. He was a French officer, who had seen thirty-five years of European service, and was given a commission in the American army by the French government. Of that year he commanded a brigade in Sullivan's attack on Staten Island. At the battle of the Brandywine, on 11 Sept., Gen. Deborre claimed the post of honor on the right wing of the army; but Sullivan would not yield this to him, and when Deborre charged the French, the enemy, the former made a long and circuitous march for the purpose of outranging him, which did not accomplish its object, and in consequence of which his brigade was not formed for action when the battle began. Deborre's brigade was the first to give way before the British attack. His insubordination was made the subject of a congressional inquiry, and he resigned his commission. He was unpopular in the army, and totally unfit to command American troops.

DE BOW, James Dunwoody Brownson (debow) (1805-1830), of Charleston, S. C., 10 July, 1830; d. in Elizabeth, N. J., 27 Feb., 1837. He was employed in a commercial house for seven years, was graduated at Charleston college in 1848, and in the following year was admitted to the bar. He had a predilection for scientific science and literature, and was also a French clergymen. He was a contributor to the "Southern Quarterly Review," of which he became editor in 1844. His elaborate article on "Oregon and the Oregon Question" attracted wide attention in the United States and England. He died in France, on 22 March, at the occasion of a debate in the French chamber of deputies. In 1845 Mr. De Bow withdrew from its editorship and removed to New Orleans, where "De Bow's Commercial Review" was established by him, and attained immediate success. In 1848 he became professor of political economy and statistical statistics in the University of Louisiana, and was one of the founders of the Louisiana historical society, since merged into the Academy of science. He left the university about 1850 to assume charge of the census bureau of Louisiana, holding the office for three years, during which he wrote a vast mass of statistical matter relating to the population and products of the state, and the commerce of New Orleans. President Pierce appointed him superintendent of the census in 1858, and he performed the duties of this office two years, continuing to edit his "Review." He devoted himself almost wholly to political economy, writing extensively on commercial statistics and finance, and contributing articles on American topics to the eighth edition of the "Encyclopedia Britannica." He delivered various lectures on literary, agricultural, and commercial associations. Apart from his literary pursuits he was one of the most industrious men of his time, and, notwithstanding his delicate organization and frequent ill health, his public lecturing and executive duties were apparently unabated. He was a specialist in the material and intellectual interests of the south, and was a member of every southern commercial convention subsequent to that of Memphis in 1845, and was president of the Knoxville convention of 1857. During the civil war his "Review" was necessarily suspended, but, in the event of peace, pen were employed in advocacy of the Confederacy, previous to which he had uttered bitter denunciations against the northern states and their institutions. After the overthrow of the Confederacy his views changed, he admitted the superiority of the free-labor system of the northwest to the slave-labor system of the south, and urged the legislatures of the southern states to encourage immigration. His "Review" was first resumed in New York city, and subsequently in Nashville, Tenn. He was author of an "Encyclopedia on the Trade and Commerce of the United States" (2 vols., 1833), and "The Industrial Resources and Statistics of the Southwest," compiled from his "Review" (3 vols., New York, 1853). He collected and prepared for the press, in 1854, a greater part of the material for the three quarto volumes which he compiled the octavo volume entitled "Statistical View of the United States," being a compendium of the Seventh Census (that of 1850), of which 150,000 copies were ordered by congress (Washington, 1854). He was also author of "The Southern States, their Agriculture, Commerce, etc." (1856), and edited a work on mortality statistics.

DE CAMP, John, naval officer, b. in New Jersey in 1812; d. in Burlington, N. J., 28 June, 1873. He was appointed to the navy from Florida in October, 1825, and served on the sloop "Vandalia," of the Brazil squadron, in 1830. He was promoted to passed midshipman in 1833, was in the West India squadron till 1837, and commissioned lieutenant in 1838, and served on the frigate "Constitution" along the coast of Africa in 1854. He was commissioned commander in 1855, and served on the navy-yard, New York, as inspector, and as commander of the store-ship "Relief." He commanded the steam sloop "Iroquois" at the attack upon Forts Jackson and St. Philip, and the capture of New Orleans (April, 1862), and participated in many actions, including Vicksburg, while in command of the "Wissahickon." He was commissioned captain in 1862, and was in the South Atlantic squadron in 1863-4. He was promoted to the rank of commodore in 1866, commanded the receiving-ship "Potomac" in 1868-9, and was retired in 1870 with the rank of rear-admiral.

DECAMPO, Gonzalvo, R. C. archbishop, b. in Madrid, Spain; d. in Lima, Peru, in 1817. He was successively canon of Seville, archdiocetic laborer of Nieblas, and bishop of Cadiz, and in 1614 was consecrated archbishop of Lima. He wrote a treatise on the government of Peru, which has not been printed, and published a work entitled "Carta pastoral á todos los curas de almas de su arzobispado."

DECANESOREA, Indian orator, b. about 1640. He was a chief of the Onondagas, one of the Six Nations. Attending the conference at Albany, held in 1679 with the agent of Virginia, he, with other chiefs, presented the claims of the Indian people. It was said of the speakers, by those who were present at the conference, that they all "had great fluency of words, and much more grace in manner than any man could expect among a people entirely ignorant of the liberal arts and sciences." And of Decanesore it was said that he had "a graceful elocution that would have pleased in any part of the world."

DECACUR, Stephen, naval officer, b. in New York, N. Y., d. in Frankford, near Philadelphia, 14 Nov., 1808. His father was a native of Rochelle, in France, and an officer in the French navy, who had emigrated to the United States, and married an American lady. Stephen was captain of a merchantman at an early age, and during the Revolution commanded the privateers "Royal Louis" and "Fair American," gaining distinction by the capture of English vessels. He was appointed post-captain in the navy on 11 May, 1783, at the beginning of hostilities with France, and in the "Delaware," twenty guns, cruised on the American coast and in the West Indies, and captured the French privateers "Le Croyable" and "Marquis." He commanded a squadron of thirteen vessels on the Guadeloupe station in 1800, and after his discharge from the service, under the peace establishment of 1801, engaged in business in Philadelphia. His son, Stephen, naval officer, b. in Sennepr[U]x, France, 1 Jan., 1779; d. near Bladensburg, Md., 23 March, 1829. He made a voyage with his father in 1787. At the age of seventeen he was employed by Messrs. Gurum and Smith, of Philadelphia (who were agents for the navy), and went to New Jersey to superintend the getting out of the keel-pieces for the frigate "United States," in which ship he was launched, and which he successfully commanded in the war of 1812-5. Through the aid of Com. Barry, he obtained a warrant as midshipman, dated 30 April, 1798, and was placed on board the frigate "United States." He was at that time nineteen years of age, well informed for his age, chivalrous in temper, courteous in his deportment, and adding grace of manner to an attractive person. While attached to the frigate "United States" under Com. Barry, Decatur cruised in the West Indies, capturing several French privateers that were preying upon American commerce, and having a hand in the capture of the self-masted frigate "Almaviva." On one occasion the "United States" chased the French privateer "L'Amour de la Patrie," of six guns, which vessel, in attempting to escape, received a twenty-four-pound shot through the side, from the "United States." She at once shortened sail and surrendered, and Decatur was sent in a boat to take possession. When he got alongside, "L'Amour de la Patrie" was sinking fast, and the crew, stripped of their clothing, were assembled at the side, begging to be taken into the boat. As it was impossible to take on board sixty men, Decatur ordered the French captain to put his helm up and run down to the frigate as the only chance of saving the crew. This was done, and though the vessel sank when within fifty yards of the "United States," the crew overboard were saved to a man. Decatur became a good officer and an excellent sailor. A contemporary said he was a man of an age, an officer of uncommon character and rare promise, one not equalled in a million. Just at the time this remark was made, the cry "Man overboard!" rang through the air, and the two boats were called away. Without hesitation, Decatur sprang from the mizen-chains, and in a few moments his muscular arms were holding the drowning man above the waves, which he continued till the boats reached the spot; when he passed the nearly dying youth into one of the boats, and then climbed in himself. It is of such men that heroes are made, and the one Decatur saved, while himself gaining celebrity, lived to see his preserver attain a fame unsurpassed by that of any officer of his time in the American navy. In 1820 the "United States" was commissioned lieutenant. He sailed again with Com. Barry when he conveyed the commissioners to France. On the return of the "United States" she was laid up for thorough repairs. Decatur obtained orders to the "Norfolk," of eighteen guns, as commander Thomas Cochrane, and in September, 1800, again joined his old ship the "United States." When the French war was ended, and the treaty of peace between France and the United States had been ratified by the senate on 3 Feb., 1801, and promulgated by the president, congress passed a law directing the sale of the whole navy except six ships, and discharging from the service all but nine of the twenty-eight captains, all of the commanders, and all but thirty-six of the one hundred and ten lieutenants. Stephen Decatur was one of those selected to remain in active service. His brother James also remained as a midshipman, while the gallant commander (the elder Decatur) resigned his commission and returned to private life. The discharge of the officers and crews was no sooner effected than the pacha of Tripoli, though the United States paid him yearly tribute, most faithfully and shamefully, felt slighted because our government had presented a fine frigate to the day of Algiers, and had sent him none; and also because one of the ministers of the bey of Tunis had received $40,000 from the United States, whereas he (the pacha) had received but little more. On 10 May, 1801, the impudent pacha declared war against the United States, cut down the American flag-staff, and began hostilities against the American merchant marine, at that time totally unprotected. A squadron of four vessels, under the command of Com. Richard Dale, was fitted out, and Decatur joined the "Essex," one of the squadrons, being selected by Capt. Bainbridge to fill the important place of first lieutenant when he had been ordered to remain in the United States, performing effective service in restraining the Barbary powers from molesting American vessels, and conveying American merchantmen safely into the Atlantic, the "Essex" sailed for New York on 17 June, 1802, reaching that port on 23 July. Decatur joined Capt. James Barron, and sailed again for the Mediterranean. He was transferred to the command of the "Norfolk," of eighteen guns, and afterward to the schooner "Enterprise," of twelve guns, under Capt. Preble. The latter, hearing of the loss of the "Philadephia" off Tripoli by striking on a reef, sailed in the frigate "Constitution" for that place, taking Decatur with him. On 23 Dec. Decatur captured the ketch "Mastico" off Tripoli, which vessel was named the "Intrepid," and afterward was used to destroy the "Philadelphia," then moored under the guns of Tripoli, the Tripolitans having succeeded in getting her afloat and taking her into the harbor. Decatur volunteered for this service, left Syracuse in midwinter, and arrived off Tripoli, 16 Feb., 1804, and, with a picked crew of officers and men, sailed into the harbor, boarded the "Philadelphia," and carried her. Then the order was given to set fire to her, and in ten minutes she was ablaze. Decatur and his crew escaped to the "Intrepid," and made their way out of the harbor amid the rapid firing and falling shot of 141 guns. The "Philadelphia" was totally destroyed. Admiral Nelson pronounced this the "most daring act of the age." In the subsequent attack on Tripoli, Decatur took charge of a division, and greatly distinguished himself in taking vengeance on the Tripolitans for the death of his brother James. He received his commission as a captain, in reward for his gallant services in destroying the "Philadelphia," on 22 May, 1804. He served at Tripoli during the war, and in September was appointed by Preble to the command of the "Constitution," from which he was afterward transferred to the "Philadelphia." Peace between Tripoli and the United States having been concluded, 3 June, 1805, Decatur returned home, laid up the "Congress," and was received most enthusiastically throughout the country. In February, 1806, he was appointed a member of the court-martial that tried Com. James Barron for surrendering the "Chesapeake" to the British man-of-war "Leopard." Decatur was next appointed to command the "Chesapeake." This was during the time that the embargo was laid on British commerce. He was afterward ordered to the frigate "United States," in which ship, in 1810, he hoisted his broad pennant as commodore of the southern station. This command was held by him when war began between England and the United States in 1812. Putting to sea, he soon fell in with the British squadron which he captured after a short, sharp action, in which the enemy's ship was completely dismantled and much cut to pieces. Jury-masts were rigged, and the "Macedonian" brought safely into port. In the spring of 1814 Decatur took command of the frigate "Peacock," and subsequent to the capture of the "Peacock," the "Hornet," and the store-ship "Tom Bowline." He left his squadron in New York to escape the British blockade; but, having grounded in going to sea and injured his vessel, he decided to return to port for repairs, but fell in with four British frigates, to which the "President" was obliged to surrender after a most obstinate resistance, in which one frigate, the "Endymion," was so cut up as to be obliged to haul out (or she drifted out of action). The "President" was not surrendered until she was surrounded by the three other frigates—the "Majestic," the "Pomone," and the "Tenedos"—and when her decks had the appearance of a slaughter-house. She had twenty-five killed and sixty wounded—one quarter of her crew. While the war of 1812 was in progress, the day of Algiers began to capture American merchantmen; and, when peace was established, the United States fitted out two squadrons to punish Algiers for her treachery and the violation of her treaty. Decatur was given the command of one squadron and Bainbridge of the other. On Decatur's arrival in the Mediterranean, he captured the Algerine frigate "Mashouda," forty-six guns, flag-ship of Admiral Rais Hammidah, after a brave resistance. He also captured, subsequently, the Algerine frigate "Estitio." He arrived off Algiers on 28 June, 1815, where peace was concluded on terms very favorable to the United States. It was stipulated that the United States should never pay tribute to the day of Algiers, and all Christian captives were to be released. This treaty and the demands of Decatur gave the death-blow to that cruel system which for centuries, to the shame of Christendom, had elevated the Barbary powers into baseful importance. Decatur next went to Tunis and demanded indemnity from the bey for violating treaty stipulations, which demand was conceded. He then made a similar demand on the sultan of Tripoli, and for the release of Neapolitan and Danish prisoners, all of which was granted, thus ending forever the pretensions of the Barbary powers. For this Decatur received the thanks of all Europe; and, on the assembling of congress in December, 1815, President Madison began his message with the highest eulogy on his success against the Barbary states. Decatur arrived in Washington in January, 1816, and was appointed navy commissioner with Commodores Rodgers and Porter, in which office he gave all his zeal, skill, and experience in building up the young navy of the republic. While attached to the board of navy commissioners Decatur made some remarks of a censorious nature against Com. Barron, which the latter objected to, and which Decatur refused to retract, though he disclaimed any intention to be insulting. A long correspondence ensued, in which Decatur did all that an honorable man could do to remove unfavorable impressions from Com. Barron's mind, but nevertheless the latter challenged Decatur. The meeting occurred at Bladensburg, 23 March, 1820, Capt. Elliott being Barron's second, and Com. Bainbridge Decatur's. When the word "fire" was given, Barron fell, wounded in the hip, where Dea-DeCosta, Benjamin Franklin, clergyman, b. in Charlestown, Mass., 10 July, 1831. He was graduated at the Biblical Institute, Concord, N. H., in 1855, and went to Canada in 1864. His paternal ancestors were Huguenots, who took refuge in England in 1685 upon the revocation of the edict of Nantes. In early life he was a printer. In 1825 he engaged in the study of Swedenborgian theology under the Rev. Thomas Worcester, of Boston, at the time he was superintendent of the publication of the "New Jerusalem Magazine" in that city, the first three numbers of which he set in type and printed with his own hands. Subsequently, by the assistance of a friend, he was enabled to enter Yale, where he was graduated in 1830, and, at the suggestion of the same friend, he began the study of theology in London, to qualify himself for the Swedenborgian ministry. During the two years passed in England he supported himself by his labor as a journeyman printer. His theological studies were continued in Baltimore, and he first preached, on the "Paramount Importance of Spiritual Things," in that city in 1838, and was afterward reprinted in London. After a year of pastoral labor in Bedford, Pa., he went to London, and studied under the Rev. Samuel Noble. On returning to this country he became pastor in Cincinnati, 1833-39, and conducted a periodical called "The Precursor." He subsequently preached in Philadelphia, 1838-45, Baltimore, 1845-50, and New York. In his later days he devoted much attention to mechanical contrivances and inventions of his own. He rendered valuable service to the periodical literature of his church, and issued several volumes of sermons on the fundamental doctrines of Swedenborg. He published also "Freedom and Slavery in the Light of the New Jerusalem," "Sermon illustrative of the Doctrine of the Lord" (Philadelphia, 1841); "History of Lectures delivered at Charleston, S. C." (1841); and "The New Churchman Extra" (1 vol.), a treatise devoted to polemics and church history in the United States and Europe.

DeCoufres,AMES, Canadian journalist, b. in Windsor, Nova Scotia, about 1836. He was educated in his native place and in Halifax. He went to California in 1852, and to British Columbia in 1858, in which year he founded the "British Colonist" newspaper, which he owned and edited from that date until 1863. In 1870 he founded the "Daily Standard," and was its editor and proprietor until 1872, when he retired. The same year he formed an administration in British Columbia, and held the portfolio of president of the executive council (without salary) from the date of the formation of the government until he retired from local politics in 1874, in consequence of the operation of the act against dual representation. Mr. De Cosmos was the first in British Columbia to advocate the introduction of responsible government into the colony, the first to recommend the union of British and Vancouver Island, and the first in the legislature to support the union of British Columbia with the Dominion, and was subsequently instrumental in securing the unanimous acceptance of the terms of union made with Canada. He represented the Vancouver island assembly after the union of that island with British Columbia, and sat in the legislative council almost uninterrupted from 1867 till 1871. In 1871 British Columbia was united to Canada, and Mr. De Cosmos was elected to both the local assembly and the Canadian parliament. He was re-elected to the Dominion parliament in 1872, and again in 1874 and 1878.

DECOULANGES, Richard, clergyman, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 29 March, 1798; d. 20 Nov., 1864. His paternal ancestors were Huguenots, who took refuge in England in 1685 upon the revocation of the edict of Nantes. In early life he was a printer. DeCoudres, Louis, brass-founder, b. in 1789; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 16 Dec., 1872. He was apprenticed at the age of thirteen to James P. Allaire, who was carrying on a small brass and bell foundry. At this establishment the brass castings were made for McQueen, who had a machine-shop, and did the work for Robert Fulton, in applying his steam-engine to the first paddle-wheel boat, "the Clermont," for the Hudson river. Several years later Mr. Allaire established his steam-engine works in Cherry street, New York, which became famous for the number and character of the engines it supplied to the early steamboats. Mr. De Coudres continued with Mr. Allaire more than half a century, some of the time as superintendent of the iron foundry, and all of the time in charge of the brass-casting department, in which art his reputation was pre-eminent. This branch of the Allaire works possessed for many years almost a monopoly in bell-casting. The first great fire-alarm bells put up in the City Hall park were cast under the supervision of Mr. de Coudres.

DEEMS, Charles Force, clergyman, b. in Baltimore, Md., 4 Dec., 1830. He was graduated at Dickinson college, Carlisle, Pa., in 1859, and entered the Methodist ministry in New Jersey. Soon afterward he became general agent for the American Bible Society in North Carolina. In 1841 he accepted the professorship of logic and rhetoric in the University of North Carolina, at Chapel Hill, holding this office five years, after which he was for one year professor of natural sciences in Randolph-Macon college, at Ashland, Va. Returning to North Carolina, he was stationed as Methodist pastor at New Berne, and in 1850 was a delegate to the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, south, which met in St. Louis. While there he was elected to the presidency of Greensboro Female College, and became, in 1852, president of the Centenary college, at Jackson, La. He chose the former, and served till 1854, from which time he was engaged in the regular pastorate till 1858. Afterward he was the presiding elder of the Wilmington and New Berne districts of the North Carolina Conference. At the close of 1863 he went to New York, was occupied for a time in literary pursuits, and subsequently established the Church of the Strangers, of which he is still (1887) the pastor. He was at one time president of Rutgers female college, New York city. He has been the president of the department of Christian studies of Christ College philosophy since 1891, and is now (1887) editor of "Christian Thought," a monthly magazine. He has also edited Frank Leslie's "Sunday Magazine," and five volumes of "The Southern Methodist Pulpit," and compiled three volumes of "Annals of Southern Education." He has been awarded the degree of D. D. from Randolph-Macon college, and that of LL. D. from the University of North Carolina. Besides the publication of several volumes of sermons, and many addresses, he has been a frequent contributor to periodical literature, and is the author of "Trinity of Peace and other Poems" (New York, 1840); "Life of Rev. Dr. Clarke" (1840); "Devotional Melodies" (1842); "Twelve College Sermons" (1844); "The Home Altar" (1850); "What Now!" (1853); "Weights and Wings" (1874); "A Scotch Verdict in Re-Evolution" (1876); and "The Light of the Nations" (1886), in which the author does not attempt to present the biography of Christ, but takes the records of the evangelists who write about the man Jesus, the Son of Mary, as he would the narratives of the classic authors, and strives to represent the consciousness of Jesus without reference to theological conclusions. He has written with considerable force in opposition to the doctrine of evolution.

DEERING, Nathaniel, author, b. 25 June, 1791; d. near Portland, Me., in 1881. His grandfather was among the first to engage in the毛皮 trade, and the enterprise Portland owes so much of its early prosperity. Mr. Deering studied at Phillips Exeter academy, and was graduated at Harvard in 1810. He entered the counting-house of Ass Capp, in Portland, but soon relinquished business pursuits for the study of the law, and in 1818 was admitted to the bar in Boston, and practised in Canaan, and afterward in Milburn (now Skowhegan), Me. It was while Mr. Deering was living at Canaan that Lydia Maria Child wrote a well-known epigram upon his name:

"Whoever was the young lawyer at C. Will surely have prospects most cheering, For what must his person and intellect be, When even his name is N. Deering?"

He returned to Portland in 1836, devoted himself to literary pursuits, and was for some time editor of a political paper, the "Indepent Statesman." While still at Milburn he published "Carabasett," a tragedy founded upon the story of the massacre of Father Rasle and the Norridgewock Indians by the British in 1720. This work was followed by "The Clairvoyants," a comedy, which has been several times produced upon the stage in Boston and Portland. His miscellaneous writings include humorous tales of "down-east" life. His most finished play is "Bozzaris," a tragedy (1851).

DE FOREST, John William, author and soldier, b. in Humphreysville (now Seymour), Conn., 31 March, 1826. He attended a college, but pursed independent studies, mainly abroad, was a student in Latin, and became a fluent speaker of French, Italian, and Spanish. While yet a youth, he passed four years travelling in Europe, and two years in the Levant, residing chiefly in Syria. Again, in 1850, he visited Europe, making extensive tours through Great Britain, France, Italy, Germany, Greece, and Asia Minor. From that time until the civil war began he wrote short stories for periodicals, having already become an author of several books. In 1861, as captain of the 12th Connecticut volunteers, and served constantly in the field till January, 1865, taking an active part under Gen. Weitzel and Banks in the southwestern states, and under Gen. Sheridan in the Shenandoah valley, leaving the army with the brevet of major. Graphic descriptions of battle-scenes in Louisiana, and of Sheridan's battles in the valley of the Shenandoah, were published in "Harper's Monthly" during the war by Maj. De Forest, who was present on all the occasions thus mentioned, and was fortunate enough, while experiencing forty-six days under fire, to receive but one trifling wound. He was one of only two or three American literary men that laid down the pen for the sword. From 1865 till 1868 he remained in the army as adjutant-general of the veteran reserve corps, and afterward as chief of a district under the Freedman's bureau. Since then he has resided in New Haven, except when travelling in Europe. The honorary degree of A. M. was conferred upon him by Amherst college in 1856. Besides essays, a few poems, and about fifty short stories, numerous military sketches, and book-reviews, most of which were anonymous, he, in 1876, contributed to the "Atlantic Monthly" a short serial story, entitled "The Lauson Tragedy." He has published "The History of the Indians of Connecticut, from the Earliest-known Period to 1850 " (Hartford, 1853); " Oriental Acquaintance," a sketch of travels in Asia Minor (New York, 1856); "Witching Times" (New York, Unidentified edition); "The Portable Grandfather," a novel (Boston, 1859); "Miss Ravenel's Conversion " (New York, 1867); "Overland " (New York, 1871); "Kate Beaumont " (Boston, 1872); "The Wetherell Affair " (New York, 1873); " Honest John Van " (New Haven, 1875); "Josephine Van " (New York, 1875); "Pegleg the Mischief " (1876); "Trene Vane " (1877); "Trene, the Missionary " (Boston, 1879); "The Oddest of Courtships, or the Bloody Chasm " (New York, 1881).

DEFREES, John D., politician, b. in Sparta, Tenn., 8 Nov. 1851; d. in Berkeley Springs, West Va., 19 Oct. 1882. In 1818 he was apprenticed to his father a printer in Ohio, and at the same time began to study law. He was admitted to the bar of Indiana in 1836, having removed to that state a few years before to establish a newspaper in conjunction with his brother. He was soon elected to the legislature, and was several times re-elected. In 1844 he resigned his seat in the state senate, and bought the "Indiana State Journal," a weekly paper published at Indianapolis. He removed there and made that paper a daily, which he carried on for a time. In 1848 he sold the paper and was united with the Republican, and in 1856 became the first chairman of the republican state committee, which place he occupied until 1860. Mr. Defrees was a friend of many leading politicians, among whom were Clay, Crittenden, Webster, and the members of the Senate, regarded him as an adroit politician. President Lincoln appointed him to the office of government printer, which he filled for many years.

DEGOLLADO, Santos (day-gol-yah-do), Mexican general, b. in Mexico, 30 July 1819; d. in June, 1861. He had a good education, but little is known of his life until he became prominent at the beginning of 1854 by revolting against the then powerful dictator, Santa Anna, and, together with Epitacio Huerta and Truebit, he raised the city of Puebla. He organized an army about 2,000 strong, at the head of which he marched resolutely toward the city of Mexico, issuing on the way a proclamation, adopting the principles of the "Plan de Ayutla," issued on 11 March, by Gen. Juan Alvarez, who joined him. After engagements with the troops of the dictator and the fleet of the latter (16 Aug., 1856), Gen. Alvarez was proclaimed president, and Degollado with the liberal army entered the capital, 15 Nov., 1855. Degollado belonged to the liberal party, and with Juarez, Lerdo de Tejada, Leon Guzman, and Ezequiel Montes, devoted all his energy to the success of the principles proclaimed at Ayutla, and was one of the deputies who signed the new Federal constitution, 5 Feb., 1857. During the ensuing troubles of the reactionary or church party, headed by Miramon, he was in the field again in all of the liberal government represented by Juarez and commanded the constitutional forces at the unsuccessful battle of Tacubaya, 11 April, 1859, against the reactionary army under Leonardo Marquez. In the same year he was elected governor of Michoacan, which office he filled until 1861, when serious political complications called him to the capital of the republic. Notwithstanding the final defeat of Miramon's forces at the battle of Calpulalpan, 22 Dec., 1860, and his subsequent flight from the country, the church party rose again, and forces under Zulapa, Marquez, and Negrete threatened the government, and Degollado hastened to tender his services, but in the meanwhile he had been again elected to congress. When in June, 1861, his friend, Melchor Ocampo, was taken prisoner by the French, Gen. Cagiga, and, on the road to Morelia, was assassinated at Tepeji by order of Marquez, the government, indignant at this new outrage, took active measures, and Degollado asked of congress permission to take the field against the rebels. Impatient of the arrival of a convoy commanded by Gen. O'Horan, he left the city at the head of 150 men, and, in the dense woods called Monte de las Cruces, met the enemy under command of Galvez and Buiron, who were in ambush. After a desperate fight of several hours, his ammunition was exhausted, his troops scattered, and Degollado taken prisoner. He was robbed and dragged away on foot, when suddenly Galvez's voice was heard, and Degollado was assassinated by his captors.

DE GROOT, Albert, captain, b. on Staten Island about 1810. He was taken into service by Cornelius Vanderbilt, and soon rose to the rank of captain, commanding some of the principal boats on the Hudson. He erected the Prescott House, on Broadway, in 1857, and constructed the steamer "Jenny Lind." During the war he built the steamers "Eudora" and "Hercules," for the command of President Lincoln, and was engaged in the purchase of the navy, he was active in promoting the erection of the Vanderbilt bronzes, and presented to the printers of New York the statue of Benjamin Franklin, which stands in front of the "Times" and "Tribune" buildings.

DE HAAS, John Philip, painter, b. in Holland about 1736; d. in Philadelphia, 3 June, 1786. His ancestors were an ancient family of northern France. In 1750 he removed with his father to the United States, settling in Lancaster county, Pa. He was assigned in the del Fiehn war, and took part in Bouquet's battle with the Indians at Busby Run, near Pittsburgh, 5 and 6 Aug., 1763. In 1776 he was appointed colonel of the 1st Pennsylvania regiment. He served in Canada and at Ticonderoga, and after the battle of Long Island was promoted to brigadier-general. In 1777 he went to Philadelphia, where he spent the latter years of his life. His son served as ensign in his own regiment.

DE HAAS, William Frederick, marine painter, b. in Rotterdam, Holland, in 1830; d. in Faysal, Algeria, 16 April, 1885. He was a native of Rotterdam, and at the age of 16 left the city, emigrated to New York in 1854, and devoted himself to painting coast-scenery. He exhibited at the National academy, New York, in 1867, "Sunrise on the Susquehanna ;" in 1875, "Fishing-Boats off Mt. Desert, " "Boon Island, Coast of Maine," and "Midsummer Noon, Birdehead Beach ;" in 1876, "The Lower Harbor of Halifax " and "Eveing at Halifax ;" in 1877, "Naragansett Pier."-His brother, Maurice Frederick Hendrick, b. in Rotterdam in 1832, studied at Rotterdam and the Hague, and went to London in 1851, where he painted in water colors for a year. He made many sketches on the English and Dutch coast, and in 1857 was appointed artist to the Dutch navy. The subjects of his earlier pictures are chiefly from the English Channel and French coast. Among his pictures are: "Among the Ruins of Jersey, a Day," "After the Wreck," in 1859 he removed to New York, where he was elected an associate to the National academy in 1863, an academician in 1867, and was one of the original members of the American society of painters in water-colors. Among his friends in the country, the church party rose again, and forces under Zulapa, Marquez, and Negrete threatened the government, and Degollado

He was appointed major of the 1st New Jersey battalion, 7 Nov., 1775, and lieutenant-colonel in 1778. Before the close of the war he resigned his commission and resumed law-practice at Morristown. One of his two brothers was also engaged in the service as aide to Gen. Wayne, and fell at Fort Lee in 1780. Colonel De Hart was eminent as a lawyer, and possessed much wit and humor. He was president of the St. Tammany society in 1755. His son, William Chetwood, sol. br. b. in New York state in 1800; d. in Elizabethtown, N. J., 7 Dec., 1746; d. in Morristown, N. J., 16 June, 1801. He practised law before the Revolution. He was appointed major of the 1st New Jersey battalion, 7 Nov., 1775, and lieutenant-colonel in 1778. Before the close of the war he resigned his commission and resumed law-practice at Morristown. One of his two brothers was also engaged in the service as aide to Gen. Wayne, and fell at Fort Lee in 1780. Colonel De Hart was eminent as a lawyer, and possessed much wit and humor. He was president of the St. Tammany society in 1755. His son, William Chetwood, sol. br. b. in New York state in 1800; d. in Elizabethtown, N. J., 2 April, 1848, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1820, and became a lieutenant of ordinance. He served on ordinance duty until 1829, and later as engineer, and was sent to the Philippines in 1832-3. He was also a member of the American Philosophical Society and the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. He died in Philadelphia, 1 Feb., 1853.

DE HAVEN, Edwin J., arctic explorer, b. in Philadelphia in 1819; d. there, 2 Oct., 1885. He was a whaling captain when only two years of age, and after thirty-six years of naval service was placed upon the retired list on account of his impaired vision. His last cruise was completed in 1857, when he resigned. He served in Wilkes's exploring expedition from 1838 till 1842, and commanded the first expedition fitted out by the government with the Grinnell, of New York, to search for Sir John Franklin. It consisted of two small vessels—the "Advance," of 140, and the "Rescue," of 90 tons. This expedition, of which Dr. Kane has written so graphically, left New York, 24 May, 1838, and was absorbed in the 22d of December in the circle of the latter ship. On his return, Lieut. De Haven was employed in the coast survey, and in the national observatory under Lieut. Maury.

DEHON, Theodore, P. E., bishop, b. in Boston, Mass., 8 Dec., 1778; d. in Charleston, S. C., 8 Aug., 1817. He graduated at Harvard in 1795, with the highest honors. He studied theology under the Rev. Dr. Parker, rector of Trinity church, Boston, officiating during that time as lay reader at Cambridge and Newport, R. I. He was ordained deacon by Bishop Boss in Newburyport, Mass., 24 Dec., 1797, and early in January, 1798, entered upon the duties of rector of Trinity church, Newport. He was ordained priest, 9 Oct., 1800. In 1822-3 he visited the south for the benefit of his health, and, after his return home, received urgent invitations from two episcopal provinces, preferring to retire to the city, which were declined. In 1808 he was a deputy from the eastern diocese to the general convention, held in Baltimore, Md. The next year he accepted the rectorship of St. Michael's church, Charleston, and in 1810 removed thither. He was elected bishop of the diocese in February, 1812, being consecrated on 15 Oct. He was present at the general convention held in Philadelphia in May, 1814, and also at that held in New York in May, 1817. On his return to Charleston he was struck with the yo-yo, and died tranquilly and hopefully. His mortal remains were buried in the chancel of St. Michael's church. Bishop Dehon published a number of Episcopal charges and sermons. After his death a selection from his discourses was published, which met with a large sale (London, 1821). He published "History of New York," New York, 1823; "Notes on Niagara," New York, 1823. He was a member of the Kansas House of Representatives in 1857-8, and again in 1859-60, and during the former period was elected speaker. He was subsequently mayor of Lawrence, and treasurer of the University of Kansas. At the beginning of the war he was made colonel of the 1st regiment of Kansas volunteers. He was promoted to brigadier-general, 29 Nov., 1862, but resigned in August of the year following. In 1864 he was commissioned major-general of Kansas militia. He was killed by being thrown from a carriage.

DE KAY, James E., East India pilot, b. in Lisbon, Portugal, in 1792; d. in Oyster Bay, L. I., 21 Nov., 1851. He studied medicine at Edinburgh, and there took his degree as a physician. On his return to the United States he married a daughter of Henry Eckford, the naval architect, whom he subsequendy accompanied to New York, where he was appointed superintendent of the naval yards at Constantinople. Dr. De Kay also became intimate with his brother-in-law, Joseph Rodman Drake, Fitz-Greene Halleck, William Cullen Bryant, and other men of mark in literature and science. He was instructed by Mr. Eckford in negotiations with Brazil and other South American powers, relative to the ships of war that had been ordered by the latter. Upon returning to this country, he settled permanently at Oyster Bay, L. I., devoting himself to the study of natural history and to the New York press as an amateur of Courts-Martial. In 1847 he served in the war with Mexico under Gen. Scott, and was lieutenant-governor of Puebla.

DEKAY, George Washington, soldier, b. in Pine Grove, Schuylkill co., Pa., 30 Nov., 1826; d. near Tucson, Arizona, 11 April, 1884. He received a common-school education, removed to Kansas, and "grew up with the state." He was a member of the Kansas house of representatives in 1857-8, and again in 1859-60, and during the former period was elected speaker. He was subsequently mayor of Lawrence, and treasurer of the University of Kansas. At the beginning of the war he was made colonel of the 1st regiment of Kansas volunteers. In 1847 he served in the war with Mexico under Gen. Scott, and was lieutenant-governor of Puebla.

The results of his researches are contained in five volumes of the "Survey" (1848-9). Besides these, he is the author of "Travels in Turkey" (New York, 1833).—His brother, George Coleman, naval officer, b. in New York city in 1802; d. in Washington, D. C., 31 Jan., 1849. He was prepared for college, but ran away to sea. He became a skilled navigator, and, having been built into the national navy as assistant to the master of the "Caeque," commanded by Capt. Manson, that vessel was captured, though twice the size of De Kay's, and much more heavily armed. When returning to Buenos Ayres in June, 1828, his brig, the "Brandtzen," was driven inshore in the river Plata by a Brazilian squadron. He scuttled the vessel to prevent her capture. swam ashore with his crew, and on reaching Buenos Ayres was made commodore. After the peace he delivered a corvette to the port for Henry Eckford, a commodore in the Ottoman ship-yards. Returning to New York, De Kay married in 1838 Janet, only child of Joseph Rodman Drake, the poet. In 1847 he took the U.S. frigate "Macedonian" to Ireland with supplies for the famine-stricken from the famished masses; having exercised himself to secure the passage of an act of congress permitting a government vessel to be so employed. See "Outline of the Life of Com. George C. De Kay" by Fitz-Greene Halleck (New York, 1847).—George Colemain's son, Joseph Rodman De Kay, soldier, b. 21 Oct., 1806; d. in New York city, 9 June, 1886, served with credit during the civil war on the staffs of Generals Mansfield, Pope, and Hooker, and won the brevet of lieutenant-colonel for gallantry in several battles.—Another son of George Colemain, George Colemain, soldier, b. 24 Aug., 1842; d. in New Orleans, 27 June, 1862, left his studies in Dresden, Saxony, in 1861, returned to the United States, and entered the National service as lieutenant of artillery, and afterward was on the staff of General Thomas W. Hahn, and bore a mortal wound in flight with bushwhackers at Grand Gulf.—Another son of George Colemain, Sidney, soldier, b. 7 March, 1845, ran away from school in the second year of the civil war and joined the 71st New York volunteers. He was afterward made lieutenant in the 8th Connecticut, and served on the staffs of Generals B. F. Butler, Devens, and Terry, and received the brevet of major. After the war he went to Crete to assist the Greeks against the Turks.—Another son, Charles, author, b. in Washington, D. C., 23 July, 1848, has published "The Bohemian Girl" (1876); "The Desperado" (1880); "Vision of Nimrod" (1881); "Vision of Esther" (1882); and "Love Poems of Louis Barnaval" (1883). His best known story is "Mannatha."

DE KOVEN, James, clergyman, b. in Middleton, Conn., 18 Sept., 1801; d. in Racine, Wis., 19 March, 1859. He was graduated at Yale in 1826, and at the General theological seminary in 1854, was ordained priest in 1855, and became rector of the church of St. John Chrysostom, Delafield, Wis., and principal of St. John's hall, the preparatory department for Nashotah theological seminary. In 1899, the church of St. John, and his instrumentality, was merged in Racine college. Mr. De Kovent becoming the warden. He was a leader in the high-church movement in the west, and inaugurated radical changes in the management and discipline of the college. He introduced the Oxford cap and gown in 1861, to be worn both by students and professors; inaugurated the confering a gold tassel to be worn by the student that attained the highest proficiency; invited from England a celebrated teacher of church-music, and established the first Episcopal -supplied choir west of New York city. He was prominent in all matters of church education, and a leader in the diocesan and general conventions. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon him in 1862 by Hobart. In 1873 he lacked but a few votes of being elected bishop of the blind, was expelled for having sent a letter to the questions at issue between the high and low church parties of New England, and Dr. De Kovent was the candidate of the former, being put forward as one of the most powerful orators of the Episcopal pulpit. But more general attention was attracted to him by an address delivered in the convention of 1874. The controversy between the high and low church parties had then assumed a bitter antagonism, and threatened a serious dis- sension if not a final division. The address in question was entitled "The Episcopalian and the Baptist," and Dr. De Kovent was perhaps in consequence elected bishop of Illinois, but was not confirmed by the dioceese. In the year following, his name was again proposed for a bishopric, but was subsequently withdrawn by his friends, there being no hope of a majority, and his influence continued his work as an educator in building up the institution at Racine. By his efforts a commodious edifice was erected for the college chapel, 200 acres of adjoining land was purchased, and costly buildings were put in as extensions and connections to those already standing; until the present pediment was nearly completed. In 1878 he was called to be an assistant rector of Trinity church, New York, but declined. A short time before his death he was elected rector of St. Mark's, Phila- delphia, but had not time to act upon it. He was noted for his kindly courtesy, his genial humor, and his brilliant conversational powers. In the pulpit he displayed many of the best qualities of the sacred orator. His death was caused by slipping on the ice in a lonely place, on his way from the station to the college, and breaking his leg. The weather was cold, and he lay for several hours before it was known and any help reached him. He was the author of several stories for boys and "Sermons Preached on Various Occasions," pub- lished since his death, with a preface by the Rev. Morgan Dix, D. D. New York Times.

DE KROFFT, James Charles Philip, naval officer, b. in the District of Columbia, 12 Jan., 1826; d. there, 29 Oct., 1885. He was appointed midship- man from Illinois in 1841, and attached to the frigate "Congress," in the Mediterranean squadron. During the Mexican war he took part in the first attack on Alvarado in 1846. He was commissioned lieutenant, 15 Sept., 1855, and detailed to the command of the frigate "Niagara" in 1860, in which vessel he was present at the assault on Fort McCrae, one of the defenses of Pensacola, the following year. In 1862-24 he was attached to the navy-yard at Washington, and commanded the steamer "Conemaugh," Western Gulf-blockading squadron, in 1864-6, during which period he as- sisted in the operations against Fort Powell, Mo- bile bay. Commissioned as commander in 1868, and as captain in 1871, he was in charge of the department, and as captain of the "Hartford," as chief of staff of the Asiatic station, and had charge of the Washington and Philadelphia navy-yards. He was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral in June, 1885.

DE KROFFT, Sarah Helen, author, b. near Rochester, N. Y., 26 Oct., 1818. Her maiden name was Aldrich. She obtained a good education by teaching in winter and attending school in summer for seven years. Her attainments included French, Italian, and the higher mathematics. She was graduated at Lima, N. Y., and married Dr. William De Krofft, of Rochester, who died on his wedding-day of injuries received in falling from a carriage. Within the month following she awoke one morning to find her sight entirely gone. She spent a year or two at the New York institution for the blind, with but little success. She then went to Paris, and became a student, and while there began to write for newspapers and periodicals. In 1850 she published a collection of letters under the title "A Place in the Memory," nearly 200,000 copies of which have been sold. She has travelled extensively in the United States. About 1865 she added Latin to the list of her ac- quisitions, and a few years later entered the lecturefield with a discourse on "Darwin and Moses," which has been repeatedly delivered in the principal cities, and many of the larger villages, of New York. His most striking achievement is "Little Jacky," a true story of a blind boy (New York, 1871). She has never recovered her sight.

DELAFIELD, John, merchant, b. in England, 16 March, 1748; d. in New York city, 3 July, 1824. Soon after coming of age he emigrated to this country. Mr. Delafield was one of the book passers and bore letters of marque, and captured a French vessel. Mr. Delafield volunteered in the action, and shared the prize-money to the extent of $100. He landed in New York city, 5 April, 1783, and found himself especially welcomed as the bearer of a manuscript copy of the text of the treaty of peace, which had been handed him at the moment of sailing by an official in the British service. The conditions of peace were known, but the text had not yet been made public in England; and, although the official copy had been forwarded, the "Vigilant" had outstripped as far as the government despatches by some days. After several experiments, Mr. Delafield established himself in New York as a merchant. He was exceptionally successful, retiring in 1786 one of the wealthiest men in the country. Six months afterward he was at the head of the private underwriters of the city. Time brought reverses, as both the French and the English were striving to sweep American commerce from the seas. While many of the private underwriters were obliged to suspend, Mr. Delafield was among those who paid every loss, but only by sacrificing his entire capital and mortgaging his real estate. He was a founder and director of the Mutual insurance company, established 15 June, 1787, that being the first company organized to take risks against fire in the city of New York after the Revolution. On 30 Jan., 1792, he was appointed a director of the branch of the U. S. bank, and was afterward elected to the same office. He was one of forty gentlemen who subscribed $10,000 each, and founded (1 Feb., 1796) the United insurance company, also adding his name to its stock. He went on for many years. His summer residence on the East river, opposite Blackwell's island, known as "Sunswick," built in 1791, was one of the largest and best-appointed private houses near New York. Mr. Delafield had nine sons and three daughters. Two of his sons were physicians. His son John, banker, b. in New York city, 32 Jan., 1786; d. 22 Oct., 1853, was graduated at Columbia in 1802, and immediately obtained employment as confidential clerk and supercargo. A few years later, having embarked in the shipping business, and being on board one of his own vessels, he was driven by stress of weather into the harbor of Corunna, Spain, and witnessed the storming of that city by the French. On the night of 17 Jan., 1808, the enemy having opened fire on the shipping, the captain, W. H., and Mr. Delafield put to sea with a family of noble Spanish refugees in addition to his crew. Although short of provisions and almost in a sinking condition, the vessel was brought safely to London. There he established himself as a banker, 1806-10. During the war of 1812-14 he was in the navy, but in the absence of relatives in England, he was permitted to continue his business, with the privilege of travelling fifteen miles around Ulbbridge, where he had a country seat, and to the city of London. His large fortune was suddenly swept away in a financial crisis, and it was then that his friend, Washington Irving, dedicated to him the graceful story entitled "The Wife," published in the "Sketch-Book." In 1830 he returned to New York and served as cashier and president of the Phœnix banking bank from 1829 till 1833 when he resigned to accept the presidency of the New York banking company. Mr. Delafield was the first president of the New York philharmonic society, which for several years met at his house. He also suggested the plan, and was an original member, of the Musical fund society. He greatly aided in establishing the New York university, and expended time and money in reviving the New York historical society. However deeply engaged in similar pursuits, or in business, he still found leisure to devote to the embellishment of his country seat at Hell Gate, and to the art of marvellous beauty. Owing to the repudiation of their obligations by some of the western states, the New York banking company was forced to suspend, and for a second time Mr. Delafield found himself suddenly impoverished. The remainder of his life was devoted to agriculture, his favorite occupation. He purchased a large estate, "Oaklands," near Geneva, N. Y., and removed there in 1842. Before many years his was known as the model farm of the state. He was one of the first to advocate among the farmers of the state the practical analysis of the soil, scientific drainage, and the value and uses of various kinds of manure. A description of his farm is given in the "Transactions" of the New York state agricultural society for 1847, pp. 200-211, of which association he was for several years chosen president. He was the first president of the State agricultural college, another Joseph, scientist, b. in New York city, 22 Aug., 1790; d. in New York city, 12 Feb., 1875, was educated at Yale in 1806, studied law, and was admitted to practice in 1811. He was appointed lieutenant in the 4th regiment, New York state militia, in 1810, and captain of drafted militia in 1812. At the close of the latter year he was commissioned in the U. S. service as a captain in Hawkins's regiment, and promoted to be major of the 49th infantry, 15 April, 1814, but resigned at the close of the war. He went under the 6th and 7th articles of the treaty of Ghent, for settling off the northern boundary of the United States, and had command of the parties in the field from 1831 till 1838. Both the president and congress formally acknowledged with which Maj. Delafield had discharged his duties. During his sojourn in the north, he began the formation of the collection of minerals that for many years ranked as one of the best in private hands in the country. Maj. Delafield was a member of many scientific associations, both in the United States and in Europe. He served as president of the New York lycceum of natural history from 1827 till 1866, when he declined a re-election, and was a member of the society for fifty-two years. In 1830 Maj. Delafield built at his country seat on the Hudson, in the southern part of Ulbbridge, a b. in "Sunswick," now a part of Long Island City, N. Y., 19 July, 1792; Henry d. in New York city, 15 Feb., 1875; William d. in New York city, 20 Nov., 1853. They were prepared to enter Yale, but their father yielded to their desire to begin business at once. A few years later the firm of H. & W. Delafield was founded, dealing at first with England, then with China, India, and South America, and in the end almost exclusively with the West Indies. Both the brothers held many positions of trust and responsibility in business corporations. Henry, during the reign of the Emperor Souloquen, acted as consul for Hayti. Both brothers served as volunteers during the war of 1812.—Edward, physician, was born in New York Nov. 17, 1812; d. there, 13 Feb., 1875, was graduated at Yale in 1832, and at the College of physicians and surgeons in 1815. He served as a surgeon in the U.S. army in 1814. In 1817 he sailed for London, studied under Sir Astley Cooper and Dr. Abernethy, and passed several months in the hospitals of Paris. In 1820, in connection with Dr. J. Kearny Rodgers, he founded the New York eye and ear infirmary, of which institution he was attending surgeon until 1850, and consulting surgeon until 1870. He soon afterward entered into partnership with Dr. Pettingill, the last immediately found himself possessed of a large and lucrative practice. In 1834 he was appointed one of the attending physicians of the New York hospital, and in 1835 became professor of obstetrics and diseases of women and children in the College of physicians and surgeons. He never resigned his professorship in 1836 for account of his increasing private practice. In 1842 he organized the society for the relief of widows and orphans of medical men, serving as its first president. He was a founder (1865) and first president of the New York ophthalmological society, and in 1858 was chosen president of the College of physicians and surgeons, remaining at its head until his death. From 1858 he was the senior consulting physician of St. Luke’s hospital, and from its establishment in 1857 senior consulting physician of Dr. Pettingill’s hospital. He was president of the medical board. From its foundation in 1854 he served as president of the medical board of the Nursery and child’s hospital. At the organization of the Roosevelt hospital, in 1867, he became a member of the board of governors, and was afterward chosen president. Retaining the office during his life.—Francis, physician, son of Edward, b. in New York city, Aug. 3, 1841, was graduated at Yale in 1860, and at the College of physicians and surgeons in 1863. He was attached for a time to the house staff of Bellevue hospital, and studied medicine in Paris and London. In 1864 he filled the following among other offices: surgeon in the New York eye and ear infirmary, and physician and pathologist to the Roosevelt hospital (1871); physician to Bellevue hospital (1874); adjutant professor (1875), and subsequently (1882) professor, of pathology and the practice of medicine in the New York college of physicians and surgeons; consulting physician to Bellevue hospital (1885); and (1886) first president of the Association of American physicians and pathologists. He has written: "Manual of Physical Diagnosis" (1870); "Hand-book of Post-Mortem Examinations and Morbid Anatomy" (1872); "Studies in Pathological Anatomy" (1882); and "Hand-book of Pathological Anatomy" (1885).—Richard, military engineer, son of John, senior; b. in New York city, 1 Sept., 1798; d. in Wash-ington as 1st lieutenant, and in 1839 was made captain. From 1819 till 1836 he was employed in the construction of the defences of Hampton Roads, as superintending engineer on the fortifications in the vicinity of the Mississippi, and those on or near Delaware river and bay. Promoted to the rank of major in 1838, he was appointed superintendent of the U.S. military academy at West Point, where he remained for seven years, and subsequently held the office from 1856 till March, 1861, when he was relieved, at his own request. From 1846 till 1855 he superintended the defences of New York harbor and the Hudson river improvements, with the exception of ten months, when he acted as chief engineer of the Department of Texas. During the Crimean war (1856-60) he was ordered to Europe in company with Capt. (after- ward Maj.-Gen.) McClellan and Maj. Mordecai to report on any changes that had been made in modern warfare. His elaborate report was printed by congress in 1860. He was made lieutenant-colonel in 1861, colonel in 1863, brigadier-general and chief of engineers in 1864, and received the brevet rank of major-general, 18 May, 1865, "for faithful, meritorious, and distinguished services in the engineer department during the rebellion." He was retired 8 Aug., 1866, his name having been borne on the army register for over forty-five years. He rendered valuable service to the government during the civil war, on the staff of Gov. Morgan, of New York (1861-62), in the reorganization and equipment of the state forces. From 1864 till 1870 he was on duty at Washington as commander of the engineer corps, and in charge of the bureau of engineers of the war department, and served as inspector of the military academy, as member of the light-house board, and of the commission for the improvement of Boston harbor. He was also one of the regents of the Smithsonian institution.

DELAMATER, John, physician, b. in Chatham, N. Y., 18 April, 1787; d. in Cleveland, Ohio, 28 March, 1867. His family (the De Moitres) was of French origin, his ancestors being Huguenot exiles, who found refuge in Holland. His father removed to Duaneburg, N. Y., then in Albany county, where he received a good education for those days, and at the age of nineteen was licensed to practise medicine. He entered into partnership with his uncle, Dr. Dorr, of Chatham, but in 1815 established himself in Sheffield, Mass., and during a residence of eight years in that place his professional ability began to be recognized. In 1833 he was invited to a professorship in the Berkshire medical institute, Pittsfield, Mass., and in 1847 a new medical school was opened by the regents of the state of New York at Fairfield, Herkimer co., Dr. Delamater was assigned to a leading place in its faculty. After residing there eight years he removed to Willoughby, Ohio, having previously visited Cincinnati, where he delivered a course of lectures. Having labored in the Medical institute at Willoughby about six years, he removed in 1849 to Cleveland, where he spent the remainder of his life. He took part in the establishment of the Cleveland medical college, located at Bowdoin, Dartmouth, Geneva, and other colleges throughout the country, and at his death left the manuscript notes of over seventy different courses on almost every branch of medical science. He was an inaccessible student, gifted with a clear mind, a never-failing memory, and a remarkable command of language, and it is doubtful whether, as a college lecturer, he has ever been surpassed in this country. As a consulting physician, his opinions took high rank. In 1860 he resigned his work in connection with the college, and was made professor emeritus, at the same time receiving the degree of L.L.D. He subsequently delivered fifty lectures, taking the place of a member of the faculty called away on duties arising from the civil war, which was his last appearance in public.

DE LANCY, Etienne (Stephen), merchant, b. in Caen, France, 24 Oct., 1663; d. in the city of New York, 18 Nov., 1741. Having been compelled, as a Protestant, to leave France on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (18 Oct., 1685), he escaped into Holland. Deciding to become a British subject and emigrate to America, he crossed to England and took the oath of allegiance to James II. He landed in New York, 7 June, 1686. His mother had given him, on his departure from Caen, a portion of the family jewels. He sold them for £300, became a merchant, and amassed a fortune of £210,000. He married Anne, second daughter of Stephanus van Cortlandt, 23 Jan., 1700. He took a prominent part in public affairs, representing the fourth ward of New York as alderman in 1691–93, and was a member of a assembly for twenty-four years. While sitting in the latter body he gave his salary, during one session, to purchase the first town-clock erected in New York: and with the aid of his partner imported and presented to the city the first fire-engine that had been brought into the province. Mr. De Lancy was buried in the family vault in Trinity church, New York. The three sons that left descendants are mentioned below. His eldest daughter married Sir Peter Warren, K. C. B. The De Lancy house, which is now (1887) the oldest building in the city of New York, was erected in 1700 by Etienne, upon a piece of land given to him by his father-in-law. Mr. De Lancy resided there until he erected a larger house at the present site of his church, which was removed about 1792 to build the City hotel. The site is now occupied by the "Boreel Building." The old house was then converted into a store. At Stephen de Lancy's death, in 1741, it passed to his youngest son, Col. Oliver de Lancy (the Brig.-Gen. De Lancy of the Revolution). Retiring from mercantile life, Oliver de Lancy sold it to Samuel Frances (or Francis, as commonly spelled), a mulatto of French origin, who bought it to establish a tavern, which he named the "Queen's Head," in honor of the new Queen Charlotte. Five years later Frances transferred it to John Jones, who only remained till 1767, when Bolton and Sigell succeeded and kept it till February, 1770. Bolton remained alone till May, 1770, when Samuel Frances (or "Black Sam," as he was called) took it, and held it till the Revolution, during which he was in the service of the British army. He sold it to Mr. Floy, who kept it, first in one room, with its five windows front, that, in 1788, Washington bade farewell to the officers of the Army of the Revolution. Since 1776 many centennial celebrations have been held in the old hostel. Originally it had two stories, with a hip-roof, and raised cornices and balustrades; since 1830 it has been a small Holland brick, with heavy timbers, in the old Dutch style.

James, chief justice and lieutenant-governor of the province of New York, eldest son of the preceding, b. in New York city, 27 Nov., 1700; d. there, 30 July, 1760. He was graduated at Cambridge, England, and subsequently studied law in the Inner Temple, London. Having been admitted to the bar, he returned to New York toward the close of 1725, and soon became prominent in public life. He was made a member of the provincial council in 1729, and in 1731 was appointed second judge of the supreme court. The year previous he had been placed at the head of a commission to frame a new charter for the city of New York. The instrument then prepared, known as "the Montgomerie charter," was rejected by the legislature. De Lancy, who, for his services, was presented with the freedom of the city, he being the first person upon whom that honor was conferred. In 1733, on the removal of Chief Justice Lewis Morris, Judge De Lancy was appointed in his stead, and he retained the office during the remainder of his life. In 1746 occurred a contest between Gov. Clinton and the assembly regarding the former's salary. As the chief justice espoused the popular side in the controversy, he gained the ill-will of the governor, which soon developed into active hostility on the part of the legislature. Clinton, believing De Lancy a danger to his plans, procured a commission from the king bearing date 27 Oct., 1747, appointing De Lancy lieutenant-governor. Instead of delivering it to him as ordered, Clinton pocketed it and wrote an urgent letter to the minister not only advising its withdrawal, but demanding De Lancy's removal from the chief justiceship. With neither of these requests did the home government comply; but Clinton maintained his hostile attitude, and it was only after his own superseded, and the death by suicide of his successor, that he finally delivered the delayed commission (October, 1758). On 19 June, 1754, Gov. De Lancy convened and presided over the first congress ever held in America, a congress of delegates from all the colonies, held by direction of the English government for the purpose of a conference on defence and on the establishing of a church. At this congress that Benjamin Franklin proposed a plan for the union of the colonies by act of parliament. On 31 Oct., 1754, Gov. De Lancy granted the charter of King's (now Columbia) college; but so great was the opposition of the Presbyterians that he kept it in his possession until May of the following year before delivering it to the new corporation. About the same time he attended a council of the governors of the different colonies, held at Alexandria, Va., to concert measures with Gen. Braddock against the French. In September of the same year (1755) Sir Charles Hardy arrived and assumed the functions of governor, the lieutenant-governor returning to the bench. Twenty-two months later, however, Sir Charles, who was at the English navy, having asked for active employment, sailed (2 July, 1757) from New York in command of an expedition against Louisburg, leaving De Lancey again the ruler of the province, which he remained till his death, three years later. Gov. De Lancey was a man of great independence of character, and his death and personal influence, and was undoubtedly one of the ablest of the provincial rulers of New York. Unfortunately, he did not escape the criticisms of his contemporaries. Gov. De Lancey left three sons, two of whom are mentioned below. Of his four daughters, one, Anne, married Judge Thomas Jones, the historian.

James, soldier and political leader, eldest son of the preceding, b. in New York city in 1732; d. in Bath, England, in 1800. He was educated at Eton and Cambridge, and he entered the army on his return to New York at the beginning of the French war, and was in the New York expedition under Sir William Johnson, and commanded the detachment that, aided by a small re-enforcement under Col. Massey, defeated the French force sent to sueor Fort Niagara, and compelled the surrender of that work the day following. He also served as aide-de-camp to Gen. Abercombie in the expedition against Ticonderoga in 1758. On succeeding to his father's estate in 1769, and thus becoming the richest man in America, he took a prominent part in public affairs. He was a member of the assembly in 1769 and 1770, and was a leader of the conservative party, refusing a seat in the convention lest it might hamper his freedom of action. He was the author of the resolution (adopted 25 March, 1775) ordering that a petition be sent to the king, a memorial to the lords, and a remonstrance to the commons, demanding redress of the grievances of the colonists. These were subsequently presented by Edmund Burke, but contemptuously refused and voted down. The remonstrance to the commons was drafted by James De Lancey. In May, 1775, he sailed for England to urge the views of the assembly of New York on the American government. But he was unsuccessful, and, as hostilities had meantime begun, he decided to remain abroad, and in the following year sent for his family. He never returned to this country. His immense estates were confiscated and he was banished, for voting against the resolutions of the congress of 1774. When, in 1788, parliament finally passed an act partially compensating the loyalists for their losses, De Lancey was chosen by those from New York to act as their representative in the board of agents, and he became, after Sir William Pepperell, its most active member. Of his five children, his two sons (one of whom was in the British navy, the other in the army) died bachelors. His eldest daughter married Sir Jukes Granville Clifton, Bart.—John Peter, soldier, brother of the preceding, b. in New York city, 20 July, 1731; d. in Mamaroneck, N. Y., 30 Jan., 1808. He was educated in England, entered the British army in 1771 as ensign, and was promoted to be captain of the 18th regiment of foot. During a portion of the Revolutionary war he served, by special permission, as major of the regiment of Pennsylvania loyalists, and was present at the battles of the Brandywine and Germantown, and at the capture of Pensacola. At the close of the war he returned to his regiment, and was successively stationed in the island of Jersey and at Gibraltar. Resigning from the army, he returned to the United States in 1789, and resided until his death at Mamaroneck.—William Heathcoat, bishop of western New York, son of the preceding, b. in Mamaroneck, N. Y., 8 Oct., 1797; d. in Geneva, N. Y., 5 April, 1865. His education, beginning at the village schools in Mamaroneck, was continued at the academy of New Rochelle under Messrs. Waite and Staples, was continued at private school of the Rev. Seth Hart, at Hempstead, L. I., and at that of the Rev. Dr. Lewis Ernst Eizenbroad, at Jamaica, L. I. He founded and personally supported the school at the place where he was graduated in 1817. He studied divinity under the Rev. John Henry Hobart, then bishop of New York, and was ordained deacon on 28 Dec., 1819, and priest, 6 March, 1822. As deacon he was chosen by the vestry of Grace church, N. Y., in the spring of 1820, to take temporary charge of that parish, and served till January, 1821, when the Rev. Dr. Wainwright was elected rector. Mr. De Lancey was immediately chosen by the vestry of Trinity church, N. Y., for three months, to fill the vacancy caused by Dr. Wainwright's absence on his campaign of 1816. In 1821 he was called to St. Thomas's church, Mamaroneck, a parish he had founded while in Yale, with the aid of his father and Peter Jay Munro, and served it for ten months without salary, also aiding in securing the erection of a church edifice. In March, 1822, as soon as he was ordained priest, Mr. De Lancey went to Philadelphia, on the invitation of the venerable Bishop White, at the suggestion of Bishop Hobart, to become the former's personal assistant in the three united churches the two Christ churches, St. Peter's and St. James. Thus began that intimate friendship with Bishop White which was only terminated by the death of the latter in the summer of 1838, a friendship so marked that Bishop White called him his adopted son, and consulted with him privately on all matters of importance, and the confidence of that venerable prelate to so great an extent as he, and no man knew directly from the bishop so many of the details of the history of the inception and progress of the Protestant Episcopal church from the close of the Revolutionary war to the year 1824. He died Mr. De Lancey on 8 March, 1828, was unanimously elected by the vestry of the three united churches in Philadelphia one of the assistant ministers of the parish, the other two being the Rev. James Abercrombie, D. D., and the Rev. Jackson Kemper, D. D. In May, 1823, he was chosen secretary of the Convention of the diocese of Pennsylvania, and was annually re-elected till 1830, when he declined further re-election. In the same year (1823) he was chosen secretary to the house of bishops, and re-elected by them to the office in 1826. In 1827 he was called to St. Thomas's church, and the wonderers coming to Philadelphia to deliver the call in person. But he deemed it his duty to remain where he was. In the same year, though but not quite thirty years of age, Mr. De Lancey was unanimously elected provost of the University of Pennsylvania, which had somewhat declined. At the request of Bishop White and Horace Binney, Mr. De Lancey, though he much preferred to continue in his chosen profession, accepted the office. This was that old "college in Philadelphia" founded by Benjamin Franklin, to which the noted men of that day. He also received (in 1827) the degree of D. D. from his alma mater, being the youngest person upon whom, to that time, that honor had been conferred. He remained provost five years, and, having brought the university back to a prosperous condition (taking it with 21 students and leaving it with 125), resigned, to resume his professional duties. In 1838, he was elected (the three united churches being separated in that year) assistant minister of St. Peter's church, Philadelphia, with the reversion of the rectories. The death of Bishop White, who was continued rector of all three. That same year Dr. De Lancey was rector of St. Peter's until 1839, when, upon the division of the diocese of New York, then embracing the whole state, he was selected bishop of western New York. In 1848, Dr. De Lancey continued rector of St. Peter's until 1839, when, upon the division of the diocese of New York, then embracing the whole state, he was elected bishop of western New York. He was born in New York, that half of the state west of a north-and-south line just east of the city of Utica. He was consecrated at Auburn in the new diocese on 7 May, 1839, Bishop Griswold, of Connecticut, being the consecrator, assisted by Bishop George W. Doane, of New Jersey, and Bishop Henry R. Onderdonk and Benjamin T. Onderdonk, of Pennsylvania and New York respectively. Bishop De Lancey removed to Geneva, New York, nearly the centre of the new diocese, and the seat of Geneva college, where he resided during his episcopate. At that date, 1839, there was not a railroad in the state of New York west of Utica, except a horse-line with wooden rails between Syracuse and Auburn, nor did a railroad reach Geneva until late in 1841. His labors, therefore, in travelling continually over so large a territory, by horse-power only, during the latter part of his term of office, were extremely arduous. In 1852 Bishop De Lancey and the bishop of Michigan were sent by the house of bishops as delegates to the celebration in London of the 150th anniversary of the Society for the propagation of the gospel in foreign parts in connection with the visitation from the Archbishop of Canterbury. This was the first time the American church was ever represented officially in England, and the first time that American bishops took part officially with Anglican bishops in the public services in St. Paul's cathedral and Westminster Abbey. On this occasion the degree of D. C. L. was conferred by the University of Oxford upon Bishop De Lancey. He had previously spent a year (1855-56) in Europe, and in 1859 he again went there on account of his wife's health, and travelled extensively. During this visit he was invited by the Archbishop of Canterbury to assist as a consecrator in the consecration of an English bishop for British Columbia, in Westminster Abbey, the first time an American bishop ever united in the consecration of an English bishop. The legislation of the American church was to四十-six years of his episcopate, and her institutions as a whole, notably that of the General theological seminary, bear the impress of his judgment, his foresight, his influence, and his firm and decided, yet always courteous, character. He first proposed the adoption of the presbytery system in the American church, and the change in the organization of the General theological seminary, which, though it did not occur till nearly twenty years after his death, has resulted, though in a slightly different manner, in making it practically a diocesan institution. To him we owe the existence of Geneva (now Hobart) college, the endowment that saved it from extinction being the result of his personal influence and labor with the vestry of Trinity church, and also the founding of De Vaux college at Niagara, and the Training school at Geneva. He was the first to persuade with and his advice to his personal friend, Judge De Vaux, and the latter to his individual exertions in raising the funds. In the grounds of the latter stands a fine stone church, erected after his death by friends in Philadelpia and western New York, as his monument. He was nearly six feet high, of graceful mien and commanding presence, united with the most courteous manners and great vivacity, and was one of the most agreeable of men. He was a most eloquent and forcible speaker, and few clergyman could have had the services of so influential a churchman, and, addresses, and a few miscellaneous pamphlets, Bishop De Lancey published no other works.—Edward Floyd, lawyer, eldest son of William Heathcoke, b. in Mamaroneck, N. Y., 28 Oct., 1821, was educated at the University of Pennsylvania and at Hobart college, being the first graduate of the latter institution in 1843. He attended the law-school of Harvard in 1844-5, and was admitted to the bar in December, 1846, beginning to practice in the city of New York, where he has since resided. He has held various charitable and religious enterprises. He is president of the Mamaroneck Medical Society, a member of the New York Academy of Medicine, of the American Historical Association (1880-81). In 1879 he was elected domestic corresponding secretary of the New York historical society, which office he still holds. He has edited Jones's "History of New York during the Revolutionary War" (New York, 1879), and the "Secret Correspondence of the New York Convention of 1878" (1880-1). In 1884 he was the author of "Motive of the Hon. James De Lancey, Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of New York" (Albany, 1851), and vol. iv., "Documentary History of New York" (1851); "The Capture of Fort Washington the Result of Treason" (New York, 1877); "Memoir of James W. Beekman" (New York, 1879); "Maurice of William Allen, Chief Justice of Pennsylvania" (Philadelphia, 1879); "Origin and History of Manors in the Province of New York" (New York, 1886); and "History of Mamaroneck, N. Y." (New York, 1886).—Peter, member of assembly, second son of Etienne, b. in New York city, 26 Aug., 1705; d. in West Farms, Westchester co., N. Y., 17 Oct., 1770. He was a man of great wealth and influence, and sat in the New York assembly from 1750 till 1768, when he declined re-election in favor of his second son, John. He had six sons, several of whom are mentioned below. Of his five daughters, Alice married Ralph Izard, the South Carolina senator, and Susan became the wife of Col. W. Hardman System, a system appointed in New York after the peace of 1783.—Stephen, lawyer and loyalist, son of the preceeding, b. in the city of New York about 1740; d. in Annapolis, Nova Scotia, in 1801. In 1765 he was commissioned a deputy in the city and county of Albany, which latter then comprised all of the province west of Hudson river, and north of Ulster county. Later he was also recorder of the same city, and several times served as a commissioner to treat with the Indians. He was a member of the convention of New York, 1775. On June 26, 1776, he was dining with the mayor and a number of loyalists in celebration of the king's birthday, when he and others were seized by the Revolutionary party and thrown into prison. A few days later they were taken to Hartford, Conn., where they remained "the victims of the charge of "disaffection," until liberated, on 22 Dec. by order of Gov. Trumbull. De Lancey did not take up arms, but remained in New York until 1783, when he removed to Annapolis, Nova Scotia, where in 1786 he was made a member of the council.

John, lawyer, brother of the preceding, b. in the city of New York about 1741; d. there in 1829. He was the third sheriff of Westchester county in 1769, and succeeded his father as sheriff of Westchester county, 1776-8. He was a member of the general committee of one hundred (May, 1776), and of the provincial council for the city of New York in 1775-6. He was not attainted of treason, nor was his property confiscated. James, soldier, brother of the preceding, b. in West Farms, Westchester Co., N. Y., 1729. He served in Annapolis, Nova Scotia, in 1800. He succeeded his brother, John, as high sheriff of his native county in 1770, and served till 1776. He took no part in the Revolution till 1777, when Gov. Tryon commissioned him captain of a troop of light-horse of fifty men, called the "30th" regiment of the colonial militia, and selected from the Westchester militia regiment, then commanded by Col. Hewlett. At their head he began those rapid and successful raids within the enemy's lines in Westchester and Connecticut that made him famous. He succeeded Hewlett as colonel of the regiment (then called the "30th"), after Hewlett's death, 1778. He was twice taken prisoner as a combatant, twice taken prisoner as a prisoner of war, and his troop was twice captured. Many plans to this end were laid by Washington and his generals; but the alertness, dash, and courage of his leader always served to bring them to naught. At the close of the war he returned to Nova Scotia, having been attainted and his estate confiscated by the act of 1779. After his arrival in Nova Scotia, he was appointed member of the council, in which body he sat for several years. By many biographical writers (notably Sabine) he has been confounded with his cousin, Daniel, described during the Revolution as a soldier and loyalist, brother of the preceding, d. in Madison county, N. Y., in 1855. He was the youngest son of Peter, ran away from home to join the British army, and received a commission as adjutant in 1798. He was killed at the battle of White Plains, N. Y., after the war, he resided in the city of New York and in Poughkeepsie, subsequently removing to Madison county.

Oliver, soldier, youngest son of Etienne, b. in New York city, 16 Sept., 1706; d. in Beverley, Yorkshire, England, May 9, 1753. He was originally a merchant, being a member of the firm founded by his father. He early took an active part in public affairs, and was noted for his decision of character and his personal popularity. He represented the city of New York in the assembly in 1736-90, and in 1775. On June 26, 1776, he was dining with the mayor and a number of loyalists in celebration of the king's birthday, when he and others were seized by the Revolutionary party and thrown into prison. A few days later they were taken to Hartford, Conn., where they remained "the victims of the charge of "disaffection," until liberated, on 22 Dec. by order of Gov. Trumbull. De Lancey did not take up arms, but remained in New York until 1783, when he removed to Annapolis, Nova Scotia, where in 1786 he was made a member of the council.

In the attack on Fort Ticonderoga, 8 July, 1758, he supported Lord Howe, and was near that officer when he fell mortally wounded. In November of the same year he served in New York again voted him its thanks for his services, and also as a member of the regiment of light-horse of fifty men, called the "30th" regiment of the colonial militia, and selected from the Westchester militia regiment, then commanded by Col. Hewlett. At their head he began those rapid and successful raids within the enemy's lines in Westchester and Connecticut that made him famous. Stephen, lawyer and soldier, eldest son of the preceding, b. in New York city about 1740; d. in Portsmouth, N. H., Dec. 1798. He was educated in England, and practised law in New York before the Revolutionary war. He was major during the war, and was also colonel of the "30th" regiment of the colonial militia, and selected from the Westchester militia regiment, then commanded by Col. Hewlett. vessel bound for Portsmouth, N. H., where he died and was buried a few days after his arrival.—Sir William Howe, soldier, only son of the preceding, b. in New York on 20th July, 1715, in consequence of wounds received at the battle of Waterloo. He was educated in England, and early entered the British army. He served with great distinction under Wellington in Spain, and was several times honorably mentioned in his dispatches. At the close of the war he served in the Night of the Bath. When Napoleon landed from Elba, Wellington, in forming his staff, insisted on having De Lancey appointed as his quartermaster-general.

The officer really entitled to the promotion was Sir William's brother-in-law, Sir Hudson Lowe; but, as Wellington had conceived a dislike for him, he refused to accept that officer in that capacity. The military authorities, however, insisted on his appointment, and it was only when Wellington made the promotion of De Lancey a sine qua non of his acceptance of the supreme command that the former yielded. Six weeks before the battle of Waterloo, Sir William married the daughter of Sir James Hall, of Dunglass, the Scotch scientist. His bride accompanied him on the continent. On the second day of the battle Sir William was knocked from his horse by a spent ball, and it was at first supposed that he had been instantly killed. Thirty-six hours afterward he was discovered still alive and in his senses, but incapable of motion, although without any visible wound. Notwithstanding the skill of the surgeons, he soon succumbed to his injuries nine days after the battle.—Oliver, Jr., soldier, brother of the preceding, b. in New York city in 1752; d. in Edinburgh, Scotland, 3 Sept., 1822. He was educated in England, and entered the 14th dragoons, as cornet, in 1766. As May, 1773, he was appointed captain to the 17th light dragoons, in which he remained for forty-nine years, rising through every grade, and succeeding the first Duke of Newcastle as its colonel, 20 May, 1795. In 1774 he was sent to America with despatches for the commander-in-chief, and orders to proceed to New York and recruit horses for the regiment. Having discharged his commissions, he joined his comrades on their arrival at Boston, 34 May, 1775, and in the following month witnessed the engagement on Bunker Hill. On the landing of Howe at Gravesend bay in August, Oliver took command of a detachment of the 17th, captured an American patrol, and seized the pass through the Long Island hills, which enabled the British general to turn the American left and win the battle of Long Island. On the evening of the 29th of the same month Sir William Erskine, with the 17th light dragoons and the 71st foot, about 700 men in all, surprised and seized at Carpenter's house, Jamaica, L. I., Gen. Woodhull and many of his men. The general, who tried to escape under cover of the night, being discovered by the sentries getting over a board fence, was cut down, severely wounded in the head and arm, and only saved from instant death by the interference of Capt. De Lancey. He, however, died of the injuries then received, in spite of careful nursing, on the 30th of the following month. In 1776, Troup, 17 Jan., 1776, before the committee of the New York convention, it is declared that Woodhull said he surrendered to Oliver De Lancey, and that after the delivery of his sword the latter struck him; and that others of the party, following his example, cut and hacked him in the manner he then was." On this sole authority rests the charge against De Lancey, first made public in 1844. On the other hand, William Warne swore before the New York committee of safety, on 14th April, 1815, in consideration of his most prominent services, that "one of the light-horsemen told him that he had taken Gen. Woodhull in the dark in a barn, and that before he would answer, when he spoke to the general, he had cut him on the head and both arms." These are the only statements made under oath that refer to the meeting at the manse, and it is asserted that "one of the testimony is to the effect that De Lancey, by his interference, saved Woodhull's life. The two families were related, and one of the great-grandsons of the American general to-day bears the Christian name of De Lancey. In 1777-78 De Lancey served with his regiment in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, being promoted major, 3 June, 1778, and deputy quartermaster-general in the South Carolina expedition. He was present at the siege of Charleston. In 1781 he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel, and appointed adjutant-general in America, in 1780, to succeed Maj. Andr. After the conclusion of hostilities he was made the head of a commission to settle the accounts of the war. In 1794 he was promoted to be lieutenant-colonel of his regiment, and subsequently colonel. After being a deputy-adjutant-general, he was appointed barrack-master general of the office which he held for ten years. On 3 Oct., 1794, he was named major-general, in 1801 lieutenant-general, and in 1812 general. He sat for many years in parliament as a representative of Maidstone. Gen. De Lancey died on 10 Nov., 1816. He died while on a visit to his sister, Lady Dundas.

Delano, Amasa, traveller, b. in Duxbury, Mass., 21 Feb., 1783; d. in 1817. His father, Samuel, was a soldier in the old French war, and an earnest patriot in 1776. Amasa enlisted in the army in 1777, but was compelled by his father to leave on account of his youth. He afterward served in the militia, and in 1779 sailed one cruise in the privateer "Mars." He became a sailor on a merchantman in 1781, and in 1788-6 assisted his father in his trade of ship-building. His first voyage as commandant was made in 1786 in a vessel belonging to his uncle. He afterward made many voyages to all parts of the world. In 1810 the authorities of St. Bartholomew, West Indies, tried to seize his ship, the "Pereverance," for an alleged violation of the revenue laws, but he put to sea under fire of the batteries and escaped. He published a work entitled "Narrative of Voyages and Travels" (Boston, 1817).

Delano, Columbus, congressman, b. in Shoreham, Vt., 5 June, 1800. He removed to Mount Vernon, Ohio, in 1807, was educated at the common schools, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1811. He practised at Mount Vernon, and became eminent as an advocate and criminal lawyer. He was a delegate in 1860 to the National republican convention at Chicago which nominated Lincoln andHamlin. In 1862 he was colonel general of Ohio in 1861, and was a member of the Ohio house of representatives in 1863, and was elected a member of congress from that state in 1844, 1864, and 1866. He was a delegate in 1864 to the National republican convention at Baltimore, which nominated McClellan and Hamlin. In 5 March, 1869, he was appointed by President Grant commissioner of internal revenue, and while he held office reorganized the bureau, thereby increasing the receipts over 100 per cent in eight months. He succeeded Jacob D. Cox as secretary of the interior in October, 1870, a position that he retained till 1875. Mr. Delano has for many years.
been one of the trustees of Kenyon college, Ohio, which conferred on him the degree of LL.D., and in connection with which he has endowed a grammar school called Delano hall.

DELAUN, John Ferris, diplomatist, b. in New York city, 24 April, 1815; d. there, 14 Feb., 1885, was the son of John F. Delaune, an old New York shipping-merchant, who left a large fortune as a son was graduated at Columbia in 1833, studied law, and was admitted to the bar, but never practiced. After residing in New York for over twenty years he went abroad, and, when he had passed five years in travel, was attached to the American legation at Vienna. In 1866 he was made a war of the legation, a place that he re-ained until 1888, when he resigned, owing to his office being abolished. While in Vienna he made a large and curious collection of brio-a-brac, clocks, pictures, and statuary. He returned to New York in 1884, and a commission in lunacy was soon afterward appointed to take charge of his affairs, on account of his mental incapacity. By his will, made in 1866, he left an estate worth about $600,- 000, and a subsequent codicil provided for the endowment of a Delaune institute for the relief of the insane. An act was brought for the construction of the will, and judgment declaring the invalidity of that trust was rendered in February, 1877.—His brother, Isaac Clason, lawyer, b. in New York city, 27 Oct., 1817; d. there, 17 July, 1886. He was graduated at Columbia in 1844, studied law, and was admitted to the bar. He was elected to congress from New York as a fusionist, and served from 4 July, 1861, till 3 March, 1863.

DELAUNE, Joseph, publisher, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 20 Dec., 1777; d. there, 31 May, 1824. He early opened a bookstore in Philadelphia, and in 1812, was a leading figure in the city. In 1813 he published "Epitome Historiae Sacrae," and in 1813 began the serial publication of his "Repository of the Lives and Portraits of Distinguished Americans," a series of engravings with biographical notices. Subsequently he exhibited his gallery of portraits in the largest cities of the Union.

DESAUNE, J., educateur, b. in Côtes du Nord, France, in 1812; d. in Paris in 1849. He studied theology in the seminary of St. Brieux, and after his ordination was appointed assistant in the cathedral there. In 1839 he resolved to devote himself to the American mission. On reaching New York he received charge of the missions of St. Patrick's, St. Peter's, and St. Mary's, in Davies county, and in 1842 was appointed pastor of Madison. In the latter town he established the order of the Sisters of Providence, and built an academy for them. He also opened a school for boys. In the summer of 1846 he became president of St. Mary's college, Louisville, Ky., which he conducted for two years. His success was so pronounced that he was invited in 1849 to take charge of a similar institution in Rochester, N. Y., but was compelled to abandon the enterprise by illness, and went to Europe.

DELANEY, Edward Cornelius, reformer, b. in Schenectady county, N. Y., in 1793; d. in Schenectady, 15 Jan., 1871. He was a wine-merchant, and acquired a fortune. At one time he owned the largest store in Albany, and built a large house, which he erected. In 1828, in company with Dr. Eliphalet Nott, he formed the State temperance society in Schenectady, and entered with zeal into the cause of temperance reform, devoting his ample means to its promotion, spending much of his time traveling, and writing, and employing others in all these ways to further the cause. He met with great opposition in this work. In 1833 he wrote to the Albany "Evening Journal," charging an Albany brewer with using filthy and dangerous water for making the brewer prosecuted him for libel, and the trial, which took place in 1840 and attracted wide attention, occupied six days, and resulted in a verdict for Delavan. After this, several similar suits that had been begun against him for damages aggregating $800,000, were abandoned. Mr. Delavan had the proceedings of this trial printed in pamphlet-form for distribution as a tract. He procured, about 1840, several drawings of the human stomach when discussed by the use of alcoholic drinks, from post-mortem examinations made by Prof. Sewall, of Washington D. C. These he had engraved and printed in colors, and made very effective use of them. He also published for years, at his own expense, a periodical advocating, often with illustrations, the temperance cause; this was subsequently merged in the "Journal of the American Temperance Union," to whose funds he was a most liberal contributor. He had trained himself to public speaking, and became an efficient advocate of the cause he had so much at heart. Mr. Delavan presented to Union college a collection of shells and minerals at $400. He lost a large part of his property a few years before his death. He published numerous articles and tracts, and "Temperance in Wine Countries" (1880).

DELAWARR, or DELAWARE, Thomas West, Lord, governor of Virginia, d. at sea, 7 June, 1618. He succeeded his father as third Lord Delawarr in 1602, and in 1609 was appointed governor and captain-general of Virginia. He arrived at Jamestown, 9 June, 1610, with three ships, after a voyage of three months and a half. His commission from Perring Watton, published with the courage of the colonists, had been re-duced almost to despair, owing to privation, disci-pline, government, and his judicious and energetic management soon restored order and industry. He established a post at Riquotou (now Hampton), at the mouth of James river, and built two forts, which he named Henry and Charles, in honor of the king's sons. Being ill, in March, 1611, he embarked for Nevis, in the West Indies; but, having been driven north by opposing winds, they entered the mouth of a large river, called by the natives Chickokochki, but which received the name of Delaware in his honor. He then sailed for England; but in April, 1618, urged by the council to return in consequence of the oppressive rule of Argall, he sailed again for Virginia, but died on the voyage. He expended large sums in establishing the colony of Virginia, and was universally regarded as a noble and philanthropic man. The present Earl Delawarr, Reginald Windsor Delawarr, is his direct descendant. He published "A True Relation to the Council of Virginia" (1611; reprinted, 1858).
DE LEON, David Camden, surgeon, b. in South Carolina in 1832; d. in Santa Fé, New Mexico, 5 Sept. 1872. He was educated in his native state, and graduated in medicine at the University of Pennsylvania in 1836. He entered the U. S. army as assistant surgeon on 21 Aug., 1838, served in the Seminole war, and was then stationed for several years upon the western frontier. At the beginning of the Mexican war he was put in command of the forces west of the Rio Grande, and was present at most of the battles in the campaign against Mexico, and entered that city when it surrendered. For these services, as well as for gallantry in action, where he several times took the place of commanding officer in 1847, had his name engraved on the tablet in the hospital at Santa Fé. De Leon twice received the thanks of congress, but was again assigned to frontier duty in Mexico, on the ground of his great energy and hardihood. He was promoted to surgeon, with the rank of major, on 29 Aug., 1838, and on 18 Feb., 1841, resigned his commission and was placed at the head of the medical department of the Confederate army. At the close of the war he went to Mexico, but after a year's residence in that country he returned to New Mexico, where he had been stationed for many years, and owned property, continuing in prominent business and dealing in the same line of business on which he had been trained in France, include "Essai sur la liberté" (New Orleans, 1847); "Etudes sur les passions" (1849); "Quelques mots sur le nationalisme," translated into English (1854); "Fève jaune," a treatise on the epidemic of 1846 (1859); "Le roi coton" and "Confédérate et Cie" (1874); "Une épidémie de fièvre jaune qui a régné à la nouvelle Orleans et dans les campagnes," a work of much learning and careful research (1868); "L'école du peuple," a one-act comedy in verse; "Les chroniques Indiennes" (1877); and a memoir on the history of the Mexican expedition to California. Delagadillo, Diego (del-gah-deel-yo), Spanish judge, b. in Granada, Spain, in the latter part of the 15th century; d. there in 1533. He was graduated as a lawyer at the university of Alcalá, and in 1537 appointed judge of the first audience or supreme court of New Spain. He left Seville in August, and landed at Vera Cruz on 6 Dec., 1538. Two other judges having died during the voyage, Delagadillo and Ortiz de Mattienzo alone founded the audience in the city of Mexico. He appointed himself several repartimientos, and re-organized the system of giving the Spanish coat of arms to all the Indians in the country. He issued a decree for the extermination of the Indians, and caused a great number of them to be killed. His name was noted in the infected province. He was appointed to the bishopric of Oaxaca, which he held for several years, and during his time there he was noted for his cruel treatment of the Indians. He was a great friend and assistant of Father Bartolomé de las Casas, the great protector of the Indians, and gave him much valuable information for his "Historia de Indias" and other writings. His writings were published in the chapter of Santo Domingo, Mexico. DELINIERES-BREMONT, Jacques Antoine Marie, Spanish viceroy, b. in Niort, France, 6 Feb., 1756; d. in Buenos Ayres, 28 Aug., 1806. He entered the service of the order of Malta and afterward the Spanish navy, where he was appointed to the rank of captain, and during the war with Great Britain was sent on a mission to South America. When Buenos Ayres was captured in June, 1806, by the English under Beresford, Deliniers collected a force and marched against the conquerors, who capitulated 12 Aug., with a loss of 3,041 killed, 1,200 prisoners, 700 muskets, 20 guns, and 3 standards. After Montevideo had been recaptured by the British forces under Auchmuty, 3 Feb., 1807, Deliniers was attacked by them in the vicinity of Buenos Ayres, driven within its walls, and besieged by an army of 10,000 men under Gen. Whitelock; but he defended the city valiantly, caused great losses to the British, took on 5 July, 1,000 prisoners, forced them to raise the siege, and soon afterward, in consequence of the capitulation of 7 Jan., 1807, was able to return to the church and the bishops. To make himself popular among the Spanish colonists and the natives, he founded Antequera (now Oajaca), quelled a dangerous revolt of the Indians in that province, imported the mulberry-tree and the silk worm in 1586, being the first to introduce the olive-tree in the following year. In the mean while his acts of maladministration had reached their utmost, when Cortés returned from Vera Cruz, 15 July, 1531, and resolved to put an end to the whole audience, and the judge were in accord, and intended to depose Cortés; but Archbishop Lumárraga succeeded in checking them. The audience was called to answer before other courts; 123 suits were begun, and Delgadillo, like the other members of the audience, was sentenced to lose all his regalia, and was placed in the Audiencia. He returned to Spain, and retired to his native city, where a severe illness, brought on by his troubles, ended his life. DELGADO, Pedro (del-gah-do), Spanish missionary, b. in Burgos, Old Castile, in 1487; d. in the city of Mexico in 1532. He was about the length of the higher Castilian nobility, and had great influence at the court of Queen Isabella. Young Delgado was sent to Valladolid to study, but, being out of health, returned home. Some time afterward he entered a Dominican convent at Salamanca, where he studied arts and theology, and on being ordained priest, went at once to Ocaña with Father Juan Hurtado, where they founded a convent and college, which is still a school for Spanish missionaries. Father Betanzos took him to New Spain in 1520, and Delgado was appointed prior of the Dominican convent in the city of Mexico, and provincial of his order in 1538. He was the first master of novices and preacher-general in that province, and took much interest in the conversion and instruction of the Indians, whose language he learned in order to preach and teach among them. He was the best friend and assistant of Father Bartolomé de las Casas, the great protector of the Indians, and gave him much valuable information for his "Historia de Indias" and other writings. Charles V., having been informed by Ocaña, sent him to Spain in 1538, and he remained there until his death. Deliniers was appointed Bishop of Charcas, Peru, but he declined the appointment, preferring to continue his work in Mexico, where he remained for the rest of his life, devoting himself entirely to literary and scientific teaching and to charity. He published works in the chap-given the title of Count of Buenos Ayres, and ordered to return to Europe, but retired to Men- donna. His death, in 1782, was a great loss to Buenos Ayres, and soon compelled Cisneros to abdicate; but when Delinius, at the head of 2,000 men, whom he had collected, marched upon the capital to re-establish the royal authority, he was defeated and captured by the revolutionists, and he died in Buenos Ayres.

DELETT, James, member of congress, b. in Ire- land in 1788; d. in C liable, Ala., 21 Dec., 1848. His parents emigrated from Ireland and settled in South Carolina when he was a boy. He was gradu- ated at the college of South Carolina in 1810, studied law in Columbia, was on the bench in 1818, and was for a time a commissioner in equity. In 1817 he removed to Alabama and settled in C laibre, Monroe co., where he distin- guished himself as a lawyer, and by speculation in land became wealthy. He was appointed a judge of the circuit court, and frequently represented his county in the state legislature. He was a repre- sentative in congress from Alabama from 1839 till 1841, and again from 1843 till 1845.

DELLIUS, Godfredus, clergyman, b. in Hol- land; d. in Amsterdam, Nov. 2, 1703. His father was a merchant and he was educated in the theological seminary of Leiden, and from 1700 to 1703 was pastor to the Dutch church in Stockholm, Sweden. He was a member of the Dutch States-General, and died in Amsterdam.

DELLIUS, Peter, a farmer, b. in Amsterdam, 1679, was a member of the Amsterdam town council, and a director of the East India Company. He was a member of the Dutch States-General, and died in Amsterdam.

DELMAR, Alexander, political economist, b. in New York city, 9 Aug., 1836. His father was a native of New York and white a New York lawyer, and his mother was a native of New York. Delmar was educated at the University of Pennsylvania, and became a lawyer in 1854, and became financial editor of "Hunt's Merchants' Magazine," and of several New York papers. He established the "Social Science Review," and was its editor in 1864-6. He was called upon to organize the U. S. bureau of statistics in 1866, was its director in 1867-8, and in 1867 became president of the Washington statistical society. He is the author of "Gold Money and Paper Money" (New York, 1863); "Treatise on Taxation"; "Essays on Political Economy" (1869); "The National Banking System" (1865); "Statistical History of the United States" (1867); "What is Free Trade?" (1868); "Letter on the Finances" (1869); "The Suppressed Report" (1869); and "The Re- sources, Productions, and Social Condition of Egypt" (1874).

DELMONTE, Felix Maria, Dominican lawyer, b. in Santo Domingo city, Dominican Republic, about 1810. He was educated in his native city, where he was admitted to the bar. He was a member of La Trinitaria, a secret society founded by Duarte to free the country from Haytian rule. Delmonte had been active in the government of the republic, and has been married to a member of the Dominican congress. He has published "Las virgenes de Galindo," an historical tale in verse; "El Mendigo," a drama; "Ozema," a drama; and many lyrical poems. Several of his poems are included in the "Poesas Contemporaneas" (Madrid), and in the "Lira Quisequeyana." (Santo Domingo).

DELMONTE Y TEJADA, Antonio, b. in Santiago de los Caballeros, Santo Domingo, in 1783; d. in 1861. He took part against the revolted slaves of Haiti, and was afterward admitted to the bar in 1805 in Santo Domingo city, but emigrated to Cuba, where he spent the rest of his life. He published "Historia de Santo Domingo," the story of the island from the discovery until the present day (2 vols., Havana).

DE LONG, George Washington, explorer, b. in New York city, 22 Aug., 1844; d. in Siberia, 30 Oct., 1881. His early education was obtained in the public schools of Brooklyn. He was appointed an acting midshipman at the U. S. naval academy in 1861, graduated in 1865, and was noted to be eligible for his next rank, lieutenant, 12 March, 1868; lieutenant, 20 March, 1889; and lieutenant-commander, 1 Nov., 1879. He served in the European squadron in 1865-6 and 1873-4, in the South Atlantic fleet in 1870, on the North Atlantic station in 1874, and was executive officer of the school-ship "St. Mary's," off New York city, in 1875-8. On 1 March, 1871, he married Miss Emma J. Wotton, the ceremony taking place on the U. S. steamer "Shenandoah," in the harbor of Havre, owing to the impracticability of complying with French laws as to marriage on French soil. In 1873 he was serving on the "Juniiata," which, commanded by Capt. D. L. Brain, was ordered to search for the missing arctic steamer "Polaris" and its crew. Supplementary to the movements of the "Tigress" in the north water of Baffin's bay, Capt. Brain thought search along the coast of the Arctic very important, and detached Liet. De Long with the steam launch "Juniiata." He left Upernivik, 2 Aug., with Liet. Charles W. Chipp and seven others, crossed Melville bay in a steam launch thirty-two feet long, and reached a point less than ten miles from Cape York, but was compelled to return to the ship by the landing or further pursuing the search. From Oc- tober, 1873, till 1878, Liet. De Long served as ex-executive officer on the school-ship “St. Mary’s.” The “Jeanette” (which, as the “Pandora,” had made two arctic voyages under Sir Allen Young) was purchased by James Gordon Bennett, Jr., and strengthened and fitted out at his expense for a three years’ voyage of exploration via Bering strait. By special act of congress the government assumed authority, while Mr. Bennett met the expense. The “Jeanette” sailed from San Francisco, under Lieut. De Long’s command, 8 July, 1879. The equipage numbered thirty-three, including five officers of the navy. Touching at Unalaska, St. Michael’s, and St. Lawrence bay, De Long proceeded to Cape Serdze Kamen, Siberia, to search for Nordenskiold, who left before his arrival. Steaming northward and taking the pack, the “Jeanette” was beset, 5 Sept., 1879, off Herald island, in about 71° 35’ N., 75° W. The vessel never escaped the pack, and, after drifting over 600 miles to the northwest, in a devious course, making twice the distance, was crushed by the ice in 77° 15’ N., 135° E., 13 June, 1881. Lieut.-Com. De Long and his party were thus adrift in the polar sea 130 geographical miles from the new Siberian islands, and over 300 from the nearest point of the mainland of Asia, having started southward with his party, and reached Bennett island, 28 July, and Thule island (one of the new Siberian group), 20 Aug., 1881. The party had made this rugged journey so far alternately by sledge and boat. From this point they proceeded in boats, under the command respectively of De Long, Lieut. Chipp, and Chief Engineer George W. Melville. Chipp’s boat was with eight men, in a gale on 12 Sept., off the Lena delta; but Melville, with nine others, reached, through one of the eastern mouths of the river, a small village on the Lena. De Long, Dr. Ambler, and thirteen others reached the main mouth of the Lena, 17 Sept., having travelled about 2,800 miles, and reached the main-land at a point 500 miles distant from their lost ship. Obliged by new ice to abandon their boat and travel overland, they proceeded slowly up the Lena, much embarrassed by sick and helpless men and their cumbersome records. On 9 Oct. they could go no farther. Two men, sent forward by De Long to obtain relief, survived, but the others perished of exposure and starvation within twenty-five miles of a Siberian settlement. De Long’s diary, written up to the last day, shows that he and two others were living on 30 Oct. at Nerses and Nindere, the men sent forward by De Long, fell in with natives on 22 Oct., and with Melville, 29 Oct., at Belun. Melville pushed his search, without success, northward to the extremity of the Lena delta in November, and, renewing his search in March, 1882, found the dead bodies and the records of the expedition on the 29th of that month. By direction of the U. S. government, the remains of De Long and his unfortunate companions were brought to his native city, where they were interred with distinguished honors on 22 Feb., 1884. De Long’s monument is in the highest latitude in Asiatic seas, and the discovery of Jeanette, Henrietta, and Bennett islands, appear at first to be meagre and inadequate results from so long and disastrous a voyage. But to the positive results must be added negative discoveries; for before De Long’s name is first the thought of Wrangel land shrank, from a continent supposed to extend from the confines of Asia to Greenland, into a small island. But the hydrographical conditions of the 30,000 square miles of the polar ocean charted by De Long clearly indicate the character of the 50,000 other square miles of area to the south, where doubtless a shallow sea exists, with occasional small islands of no great size. When Wrangel island proved to be an inconsiderable land, De Long’s expedition was doomed to comparative failure, and Bering strait was closed as a road to high latitudes; for without a protecting coast no vessel can hope to navigate the polar seas. The valuable hydrographic, magnetic, and meteorological observations of the expedition still remain inaccessible and undiscovered (1887), although ten times the amount necessary for their proper publication is the result of the observations of the expedition, with the result fortunately of illustrating Commander De Long’s many admirable qualities as an officer and a man. The court of inquiry, in its findings, said officially: “Special commendation is due, particularly, to Commander De Long for the high qualities displayed by him in the conduct of the expedition.” De Long’s journals have been edited by his widow, under the title “The Voyage of the Jeanette” (Boston, 1883), and the story of the search is to be found in Melville’s “In the Lena Delta” (Boston, 1886). DELORME, Louis, Canadian lawyer, b. in Montreal, 29 Dec., 1824. He was educated at St. Sulpice college, Montreal, and at the College of St. Hyacinthe, studied law, and was admitted to the bar of Lower Canada in 1847. He represented St. Hyacinthe in the Legislative Assembly from 1870 to 1878, and was the first to propose the money-order system between the United States and Canada. He was appointed clerk of the legislative assembly of the province of Quebec in May, 1879. DELVALLE or DEL VALLE, Aristóbolo (del-val-yay), b. in Buenos Ayres in 1847. He was graduated at the university of his native city, and began practice at the bar in 1860. He identified himself with the national autonomous party, was soon acknowledged as one of its leaders, and elected in 1874 senator for the province of Buenos Ayres. He was re-elected for several terms, and distinguished himself as an orator and defender of the autonomy of the provinces against encroachments of the Federal power. In 1875 his party nominated him for governor of the province, but he was defeated. In 1879 he again ran, in a most favorable state of the American-Argentine relations, and was elected. Delvalle continues one of the most influential members of the Federal senate. He has published “Introducción al derecho administrativo” (Buenos Ayres).
DEMAREST, David D., clergyman, b. in Harrison, Bergen co., N. J., 30 June, 1819. He was graduated at Rutgers in 1837, and at the New Brunswick theological seminary in 1840, and entered the ministry of the Reformed Dutch church. After holding pastorates in Catskill, Flatbush (Ulster co.), New Brunswick, and Hudson, he became, in 1845, professor of pastoral theology and sacred rhetoric in New Brunswick seminary. He received the degree of D. D. from Princeton in 1857. Dr. Demarest has published sermons and addresses, and "History and Characteristics of the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church" (New York, 1850); "Practical Theology," (ibid., 1851); "Entigino about the Hackensack," a paper read before the Huguenot society of America, 13 April, 1885 (New Brunswick, 1886). He was also one of the editing committees of the "Centennial of the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Church in America" (New York, 1885), and has contributed largely to the "Christian Intelligencer," and to other magazines and reviews.

DEMAREST, John, clergyman, b. in New Bridge, N. J., in 1763; d. in 1837. When a boy, he was taken prisoner by a drunken Hessian trooper, who laid aside his pick handle and thus escaped. A boy under his direction and thus escaped. He studied under Dr. Solomon Froeligh, and was licensed as a minister in the Reformed Dutch church in 1789. He owned the farm at Tappan where Maj. John André was buried. In August, 1821, the British government, at the request of Mr. Demarest, who afterward returned to Europe, and thus escaped. The Duke of York, uncle of Queen Victoria, was on board, and was entertained by Mr. Demarest, who afterward received from the duke a gold-lined snuff-box, made from the cedar-tree whose roots had been found entwined with his skeleton. André's sisters sent him a silver communion service, designed for the use of a Roman Catholic priest, under a mistaken idea that such was his character. Mr. Demarest returned the service, with explanations, and it was replaced by a large silver cup, appropriately inscribed. Dr. Demarest was elected to the Reformed church, with Dr. Solomon Froeligh, in 1822, and was suspended in 1824.—His grandson, James, b. in Williamsburg, L. I., 28 June, 1833, was graduated at Union in 1852, and at New Brunswick seminary in 1856, and has held pastorates in Newark, N. J., Chicago, III., and Kingston and Port Field, N. Y., and has published numerous sermons, including "Duty of the Reformed Church in the Future as foreseen by its Course in the Past" (in Centennial Discourses, 1870). The Union college gave him the degree of D. D. in 1877.

DEMNIER, or DEmmNER, Jean Nicolas (day-men-yay), French statesman, b. in Franche-Coïme in 1751; d. in Paris in 1814. He was deputy to the états généraux in 1789. He took also a prominent part in the deliberations of the constituent assembly, which elected him to serve on the legislative committee. When the assembly dissolved, Demnier, foreseeing the reign of terror, left France in 1791. He came to New York, where he remained five years, and on his return was made a senator by Consul Bonaparte in 1800. Labeled as a "traitor of the American cause"; "Esprit des usages et des coutumes des differents peuples" (3 vols., 1776-80); "Essai sur les états unis" (1786); and "L'Amérique indépendante" (4 vols., 1790).

DEMERS, Jérôme (de-merz), Canadian educator and chemist, b. in Québec city, Canada, 1 Aug., 1774; d. in Quebec, 17 May, 1833. He was educated at the seminary of Quebec, where he finished his classical course in 1798, and his theological course in 1798. On 24 August of the latter year he was ordained a priest of the Roman Catholic church. He became director of the Seminary of Quebec on 10 Aug., 1800, and was its superior in 1815-21, 1824-30, and 1836-43, following the rule of the seminary, which permits the same person to hold the office only six years in succession. Father Demers became vicar-general in 1825. During his connection with the seminary, a period of over fifty years, he taught, successively or at the same time, physics, chemistry, astronomy, architecture, philosophy, and theology. He was distinguished as an orator, pulpit orator, and writer, and much to promote a taste for natural philosophy and the fine arts. He published "Institutiones Philosophicae" (Quebec, 1835), and left manuscript treatises on physics, astronomy, and architecture.

er recruited especially for Gen. Butler's New Orleans expedition. After the passage of the forts his regiment was the first to reach New Orleans, and was engaged in the capture of the custom-house. Col. Deming was on detached duty, acting as mayor of the city from October, 1862, till February, 1863. He then resigned, returned home, and in April, 1863, was elected to Congress as a Republican, and served two terms, being known as a lawyer and a statesman, and as an early life he had been a member of the New York legislature, and chairman of that on expenditures in the war department. In 1866 he was a delegate to the Loyalists' convention in Philadelphia, and from 1868 till his death was U. S. collector of internal revenue for his district. Mr. Deming was one of the most eloquent public speakers in the United States, a gentleman of fine culture and of refined literary taste. He published translations of Eugene Sue's "Mysteries of Paris" and "Wandering Jew" (1840), a eulogy of Abraham Lincoln, delivered by invitation of the Connecticut legislature in 1865, "Life of Ulysses S. Grant" (Hartford, 1869), and various addresses.

DEMING, William, the first maker of wrought-iron cannon, b. in 1730; d. in Mifflin, Cumberland co., Pa., 19 Dec., 1830. He was employed in the Revolutionary army, and contributed two wrought-iron cannon to the New York Arsenal. During the war one of these was captured by the British at the battle of the Brandywine, and is still preserved in the Tower of London. These singular pieces of ordnance are described as being "made of wrought-iron staves, hooped like a barrel, with bands of the same material, excepting that there were four layers of staves, breaking joints, all of which were finally bound together, and then boxed and breeched like other cannon." The first gun was made at Middlesex, Pa., the second was begun at Mount Holly Springs, Pa., but in the patriotic blood with which they could find no one to assist him, on account of the heat, which is said to have been so great as to have melted the lead buttons on his coat, it was not completed. The British are said to have offered a large sum of ready money and a stated annuity to any one who would instruct them in the process of manufacture; but the sturdy artisan was not to be seduced from his allegiance. Although he had striven to serve the republic, with traditional ingratitude it refused to compensate him until near the close of his long career.

DEMPSTER, Peter ( dubious), Canadian R. C. bishop, b. in Montreal, 20 July, 1743; d. in Longueil, 17 Jan., 1806. He was parish priest of Longueil, and vicar-general of the diocese of Quebec. During the invasion of Canada by Arnold and Montgomery, in 1775, he was busy in preventing the Canadians from joining the invaders. As Bishop of Quebec, he was often in danger on the route from the United States to Canada, the British authorities suggested his presentation as coadjutor bishop of Quebec, but, feeling that his presence at Longueil would be useful to them in case of another invasion from the United States, they persuaded him to reside there. He was consecrated at Montreal in 1794, and in 1797 Bishop Hubert resigned the see of Quebec in his favor. Bishop Denaut was accused of subserviency to those in power; but on a noteworthy occasion, he showed firmness of character. As soon as he succeeded to the bishopric he found the aid of a coadjutor necessary. Both the people and the clergy wished the cure of Quebec, Joseph Octavius Plessis, to be appointed. The Duke of Kent, father of Queen Victoria, was then holding court in Quebec, and at this time was on an intrigue with a married woman in the neighboring village of Beauport. The parish priest of this town secretely favored the liaison, and, to reward his complaisance, the young prince used every effort to have him appointed coadjutor bishop. Bishop Denaut insisted on the choice of Plessis, who had been elected by the clergy, and declared that they neither should nor would hold another election. In presence of this unexpected resistance, the Canadian government withdrew their candidate, and Bishop Denaut then retired to Longueil, where he spent the remainder of his life.

DENGLER, Frank, sculptor, b. in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1836. He went abroad while young, studied in the Munich academy of fine arts, and received there in 1874 a silver medal for his group of "Sleeping Beauty." He was then an instructor in modelling in the Boston museum art school, but resigned in 1877 on account of failing health, and removed to Covington, Ky., and afterward to Cincinnati. Among his works are "Azoo and Melda" (1877), an ideal head of "America," and several statues in the "New World".
death was the result of a fall on the stage in Indianopolis, Ind. She had been married four times. — The deceased, a well known actress, was also a popular actress. They resembled each other in person, manner, and ability, and for a time were quite popular in melodramatic characters.

DENIO, Hiram, jurist, b. in Rome, N. Y., 21 May, 1799; d. in Utica, N. Y., 5 Nov., 1871. After a brief course at Kolin, he was admitted to study law in his seventeenth year, was admitted to the bar in 1821, and began practice in Rome. He was district attorney in 1825–34, and in 1826 removed to Utica. He was circuit judge for the fifth circuit in 1834–8, and in 1838 formed a law partnership with Ward Hunt. In January, 1838, he was appointed United States Marshal, a vacancy on the bench of the court of appeals, and twice afterward was elected to the same office, serving till 1866. He had also been bank commissioner and clerk of the supreme court, and from 1838 till his death was a trustee of Hamilton college, which afterward conferred on him the degree of LL. D. Judge Denio was a democrat, but voted for Abraham Lincoln, and supported the war measures of the government. He was considered one of the ablest jurists that ever sat on the bench of the circuit court. He published "Hope of Cases argued and determined in the Supreme Court and in the Court for the Correction of Error" (3 vols., 1845–50), and with William Tracy prepared an edition of the Revised Statutes of New York (2 vols., 1853).

DENIS, Ferdinand, French explorer, b. in Paris, 13 Aug., 1798; d. in 1874. He travelled several times through America, once for five years, 1816 till 1821. He was appointed librarian of the Ste. Geneviève library in Paris in 1801, and held this place till nearly the time of his death. He was the author of the institution of America, the most notable of which are "L'histoire du Brésil" (1823); "Les voyages de Malouet dans les forêts de la Guyane," and a contributor to the Brazilian review, "Cororographia Bresilica." heavy artillery. He has written a great number of poems and articles for periodicals, and is author of the following works: "The Upper Institution," "The Globe Institution," "The Daily Tar and Life and Labors of Rev. Jabez S. Swan" (New Haven, 1879); "History of the First Rhode Island Cavalry"; "Westerly and its Wonders for Two Hundred and Fifty Years"; "Picturesque Narragansett Sea. Illustrated by New Bedford, Martha's Vineyard, and Nantucket"; "History of the Third Rhode Island Heavy Artillery Regiment": and "Picturesque Rhode Island."—His brother, John Ledyard, educator, b. in Stonington, Conn., 19 Sept., 1826. His education was received at the Connecticut literary institution and at Worcester academy, and he established the Mystic river academy. Settling in Norwich, Conn., in 1855, he became subsequently secretary and treasurer of the Henry Bill publishing company, and president of the Connecticut Baptist education society. He received the degree of A. M. from Brown in 1855. He is the author of a "Pictorial History of the Wars of the United States," and has edited an "Illustrated History of the New World," in English and in German.

DENISON, George Taylor, Canadian lawyer, b. in London, England, 30 May, 1837. He was educated at Upper Canada college, Toronto, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1840. He served as a volunteer in the rebellion of 1837, participated in the siege of Navy Island, and was one of the officers that obtained the information which led to the capture and destruction of the steamer "Caroline." In 1848 he was appointed to the command of a cavalry troop (raised by his father, Lieut.-Col. G. T. Denison), now known as the governor-general's body-guard, and in 1855 took an active part in organizing the militia under the new law passed that year, which was the foundation of the present military system of Canada. He organized the Toronto field battery, and in 1860, at the request of Sir Edmund Head, the governor-general, organized the queen's own rifles.—His son, George Taylor, b. in Toronto, 31 Aug., 1839, was educated at Upper Canada college, and is an LL. D. of Toronto university. He was gazetted to the active militia in 1855 as a cornet, was made a major in 1862, and promoted to the command of the governor-general's body-guard in 1886, a command which he held until his death. He was admitted to the bar in 1861, and in 1886 he served during the Fenian raid, commanding the outposts on the Niagara river, in the autumn of that year, under Col. (now Lord) Wolseley. In 1872, and again in 1878, he was sent to Great Britain to represent the Ontario government in emigration matters. In 1872 he contested Algoma for the house of commons, but was defeated. In 1877 he was appointed police magistrate of Toronto, and in 1885 served in the Riel rebellion in the northwest. In 1889 Col. Denison was appointed an original member of the English language committee of the Royal society of Canada, and in 1885 was elected its president. He is the author of "Manual of Outpost Duties" (Toronto, 1866); "History of the Fenian Raid" (1866); "Modern Cavalry" (London, England, 1876); and "Naval Review" (London, 1877). The two last named have been translated into Russian, German, and Hungarian. The "History of Cavalry" was awarded the 5,000 rubles offered by the emperor of Russia as a prize for the best work on that subject. Col. Denison visited Russia for until his death receiving the prize, and was presented to the Czar and Czarina.

Another son, Frederick Charles, soldier, b. in Toronto, 22 Nov., 1849, was educated at Upper Canada college, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1870. He served for some months in the administrative department, and in 1871 married a girl then a school teacher. The same year was gazetted cornet in the governor-general's body-guard, serving in this capacity on the Niagara frontier during the Fenian raid in 1886. He served as an orderly to Col. Wolseley on the Red river expedition of 1870, and rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel in 1884, when he sailed from Quebec in command of a force of Canadian voyageurs, to aid in the campaign in the Sou- dan for the relief of Gen. Gordon. Col. Denison accompanied Gen. Earle's column, and took part in the battle of Kirkcudbright. The services rendered by the Canadian boatmen were thought so valuable that they received the thanks of the imperial parliament, and their officer was made a companion of the order of St. Michael and St. George. He is a fellow of the Royal historical society of England, and is the author of the "Historical Record of the Governor-General's Body-Guard," with its standing orders.

DENNETT, John Richard, journalist, b. in Chatham, New Brunswick, in 1837; d. in West- borough, Mass., 26 November, 1874. His family removed to Westborough, Mass., while he was a boy, and he was fitted for college in the Woburn high school, and graduated at Harvard in 1862. While in college he was editor of the "Harvard Magazine." His class-day poem, far superior to most such performances, was especially noticed by James Russell Lowell, for its freshness and grace. After graduation he went to Beaufort, S. C., to superin- tend a plantation, and remained there until after the civil war, when he travelled extensively through the southern states to study their political position and prospects. He was the author of a "History of the War," which attained much popularity under his management. He gathered around him a number of writers, each of whom contributed to a special de- partment. Among his compositions was "The Lay Preacher," a series of essays, which gave his au- thor reputation as a graceful and humorous writer, and were widely copied. In 1775 he became bankrupt, and Denne was persuaded to be- come a candidate for congress. He was defeated, and in 1799 went to Philadelphia to become private secretary to Thomas Pickering, secretary of state. He remained here until 1812, when he became editor of the "United States Gazette," became editor of the "Portfolio" in Philadelphia in 1801, in connection with Asbury Dickens. This was originally a weekly quarterly, but in the course of five years it became a monthly octavo. Denne continued to be its edit- or until his death, under the pen-name of "Oliver Old School." The staff of able writers, among whom were Charles Brocken Brown and John Quincy Adams (whose "Letters from Silesia," were originally published in it), maintained the "Portraits" of the famous people, appearing on the frontispiece of the first volume. It was said, after the death of Brockden Brown, that Dennie was the only man in the country that made literature a profession. His appearance was described by Buckingham in this manner: "He was of medium height, and of slender frame; was attentive to his dews, appearing one May morning at the office in a pea-green coat, white vest, nankeen small-clothes, white silk stockings and pumps, fastened with silver buckles which covered at least half the foot from the instep to the toe." He wrote very rapidly, and deferred the preparation of his "copy" until after the middle of the day. One of the best of his lay sermons was written at the village tavern, where he and his friends were amusing themselves with cards. It was delivered by piece-meal, at four or five different times, and if he happened to be engaged in a game, he would ask some one to play his hand for him while he "gave the devil his due." Dennie founded in Philadelphia the "Tuesday Club," which included most of the contributors to the "Portfolio." His work was confined principally to periodicals, but two of his longer works were published in the "Lay Preacher," or "Sermons for Idle Readers" (Walpole, N. H., 1796), and a volume of "The Lay Preacher," collected by John E. Hall (Philadelphia, 1817). He aimed to unite "the familiarity of Franklin with the simplicity of Sterne." Among his ingenious essays were published "The History of a Guinea" and "The History of a Guinea," both of which were translated into German.

DENNIS, George R., senator, b. in White Haven, Somerset co., Md., 8 April, 1822. He was graduated at the Polytechnic institute of Troy, N. Y., and entered the University of Virginia. He studied medicine at the University of Pennsylvania, was graduated there in 1844, and, after practicing for seven years, he retired and has since devoted his attention to agriculture. He was a delegate to the National convention that nominated Fillmore in 1856, and to the Democratic national convention in 1860, serving as one of the vice-presidents. He was elected to the Maryland state senate in 1854, to the house of delegates in 1857, and to the senate again in 1871. While filling this office he was elected U. S. senator from Maryland as a Democrat, serving until 1877.

DENNISON, William, war governor of Ohio, b. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 23 Nov., 1815; d. in Columbus, 15 June, 1882. His father was a prosperous business man, and had him prepared for college in the best schools of Cincinnati. He was graduated at Miami in 1835, studied law in Cincinnati, under the direction of Nathaniel Pendleton and Stephen Fales, and practised in that city. He published, in 1848, in which year he was chosen to the state legislature. About this period Mr. Dennison became interested in banking and in railroad affairs, and was president of the exchange bank and president of the Columbus and Xenia railroad company. In 1856 he was a delegate to the first National convention of the Republican party. He was chosen governor of Ohio in 1860 by the Republicans, and delivered his inaugural address in the general assembly in 1861. At his suggestion the legislature voted $3,000,000 to protect the state the "from invasion and insurrection," and conferred power upon the executive to raise troops. Gov. Dennison was an anti-slavery man and an ardent admirer of President Lincoln; in his first message to the general assembly in 1864, and was elected chairmain. He was appointed by President Lincoln postmaster-general in 1864, and continued in that office, under President Johnson, until his resignation in 1866. Gov. Dennison was a member of the National Republican convention at Chicago in 1860, and was leader of the friends of Senator John Sherman during the struggle for the nomination. He was also a candidate for senator in that year, and was contributed largely to Dennison college, Granville, Ohio.

DENNY, Thomas, banker, b. in Leicester, Mass., 1804; d. in New York city, 21 Oct., 1874. He was graduated at Harvard, with honors, in 1823, studied law in Boston, and was admitted to the bar, but subsequently removed to New York, engaged in mercantile pursuits. In 1853 he became a member of the Stock Exchange, and in 1858 formed the banking-house of Thomas Denny & Co. Mr. Denny took deep interest in the promotion of education and philanthropic and Christian effort. He was a founder of the Free School of the city of New York, and of the Free School for girls, in 12th street, in that city. He was one of the founders of the Society for improving the condition of the poor, a director of the New York juvenile asylum, trustee of the Society for the relief of the ruptured and disabled, and one of the managers of the City mission.

DENNY, William, deputy governor of Pennsylvania, from August, 1756, till October, 1759. On his arrival in the colony he was warmly welcomed; but his determination to enforce the acts of the proprietors soon rendered him unpopular. He had frequent disagreements with the colonial assembly, but his need of money finally became such that he signed a bill taxing the proprietary interests, which action led to his recall.

DENONVILLE, Jacques René de Brésay, Marquis de, French governor of Canada. In 1668 he succeeded De la Barre as governor of Canada, and retained that office for four years. He was a brave soldier, but his administration of the duties of his office was such as brought the French colony in Canada to the verge of ruin. Acting on the advice of Louis XIV., he, in 1687, sent forty-one of the warriors of the Five Nations across the ocean to be chained to the oar in the galleys of Marseilles, and followed up this act of cruelty with an unprovoked attack upon the Senecas. They and other Indians were so successfully routed, after the massacre of the French at Lachine, there was hardly a French post left between Three Rivers and Mackinaw. During the period of his governorship he found a most determined opponent in the French claims to the territories eastward of Lake Dongan, a New York, who in opposing Denonville and the French, was acting contrary to the instructions he had received from King Charles.
It was Denonville who recommended the purchase of New York by the French.

DENT, Frederick P., lawyer, b. in Cumberland Co., Md., in 1780; d. in Washington, D. C., 15 Dec., 1873. He was trained in commercial pursuits, and became a merchant in Pittsburg and subsequently in St. Louis, accumulated wealth, and had a wide reputation for hospitality. He was the father of Mr. George P. DENT, a prominent lawyer of St. Louis. Mr. FREDERICK DENT was a rigid and aggressive democrat, his views coinciding with the Benton-Jackson school, and he held these opinions tenaciously to the last of his life. John W. Forney, in his "Anecdotes of Public Men," refers to him as a very interesting old gentleman, kind, humorous, and generous, indicating an independent spirit in his views, and exhibiting a wonderfully retentive memory for by-gone days.

Mr. Dent was a member of his son-in-law's household after Gen. Grant became commander of the National armies, and his farm, "White Haven," near St. Louis, became the General's property. At his son, Frederick Tracy, soldier, b. in White Haven, St. Louis Co., Mo., 17 Dec., 1830. He was graduated at the U.S. military academy in 1853, made brevet 2d lieutenant, and served on frontier duty and in garrison prior to the Mexican War. He was present at the battle of Puebla and the capture of Vera Cruz, the capture of San Antonio, and the battles of Churubusco, where he was severely wounded, and Molino del Rey, receiving for gallant and meritorious conduct the brevets of 1st lieutenant and captain. He served thereafter on the Pacific road survey, on frontier duty in Idaho, in removing the Seminole Indians, and at various points in Texas, Virginia, and Washington territory, until he joined the Yakima expedition in 1866. He participated in the Yakima campaign in 1866, and was there being engaged in the combat of "Four Lakes" in 1868, in that of Spokane Plain in the same year, and in the skirmish on that river. After frontier duty at Fort Walla Walla he became a member of the Snake river, Oregon, expedition, to rescue the survivors of the massacre of the Salmon Valley (1863), at which time, 1868, he was promoted to the rank of major, and was in command of a regiment in the army of the Potomac in 1868, in New York city called to suppress anticipated riots, from September, 1868, to January, 1869, serving as a member of the military commission of the state of New York from December, 1868, to January, 1869, appointed a lieutenant, 11 July, 1799, and was in the same ship when she took the French privateer "La Vengeance," 1 Feb., 1800. He was in command of the schooners "Nautius" and "Scourage," in Freake's squadron, during the Tripolitan war, and took part in the capture of Tripoli. He was appointed a captain, 20 Dec., 1811.

DENTON, Richard, clergyman, b. in Yorkshire, England, in 1836; d. in Essex, England, in 1862. He was graduated at Cambridge in 1802, and was for seven years Presbyterian minister of Coyle chapel, parish of Halifax, in the north of England. The act of uniformity compelled him to relinquish his charge and to emigrate to America, where he arrived in 1809, in company with John Winthrop and Sir Richard Saltonstall. He first went to Watertown, Mass.; then in 1815 he began the settlement of Wethersfield. In 1816 his name appears among the early settlers of Stamford, and in 1844 he is recorded as one of the original proprietors of Hempstead, L. I., where he established a Presbyterian church. A republic candidate in 1856, ran over the state, and was returned as a representative in New York, where he remained until his death. He wrote "Soliloquia Sacra," which was much praised by his contemporaries. His son, Daniel, wrote "A Brief Description of New York" (London, 1670), which was republished in New York in 1843, with notes by W. H. B. Kneeland. The book is supposed to be the first printed description in English of New York and New Jersey.
DENVER, James W., politician, b. in Winchester, Va., in 1818. He received a public-school education, emigrated in childhood with his parents to Ohio, removed to Missouri in 1841, where he studied law, and was admitted to the bar. He was appointed captain of the 12th infantry in March, 1847, and served in the war with Mexico till July, 1848. In California in 1850, he was appointed a member of a relief committee to protect emigrants, and was chosen a state senator in 1852. While a member of this body in 1852, he had a controversy with Edward Gilbert, ex-member of congress, in regard to some legislation, which resulted in a challenge from Gilbert, that was accepted by Denver. Rifles were the weapons, and Gilbert was killed by the second shot. In 1853 Mr. Denver was appointed secretary of state of California, and from 1855 till 1857 served in congress. He was appointed by President Buchanan as minister of Indian affairs, but resigned, and was made governor of Kansas. Resigning this post in 1859, he was reappointed commissioner of Indian affairs, which office he held till March, 1859. In 1861 he entered the National service, was made brigadier-general, served in the western states, and resigned in March, 1863. Afterward he settled in Washington, D.C., to practise his profession as an attorney. John W. Forney, in his "Anecdotes of Public Men," says: "Gen. Denver, while in congress, as chairman of the committee on the Pacific railroad, presented in a conclusive manner the facts demonstrating the practicality of that great enterprise, and the advantages to be derived from it."

DE PALM, Joseph Henry Louis, baron, diplomatist, b. in Augsburg, Germany, 10 May, 1809; d. 21 May, 1879, his father was Colonel and Adjutant-General Baron Johann de Palm, prince of the Roman empire, and his mother the Countess Freyen von Seiboldt of Thunefeld. The Baron de Palm was for a long time in the German diplomatic service, and was also chamberlain to the king of Bavaria. In 1822 he came to the United States and spent some time among the Indians in the northwest, and subsequently he resided in New York, where, a short time before his death, he joined the Theosophical society, to which he left his property. In accordance with his wish his body was cremated.

DE PAUW, John, lawyer, b. in Kentucky; d. in Indiana in 1838. His father, Charles, a native of Ghent, French Flanders, accompanied Lafayette to America, and fought in the war of the Revolution. When the son had reached manhood he removed from Kentucky to Washington county, Ind., and, as agent for the county, surveyed, plotted, and sold the lots in Salem. He was by profession an attorney-at-law, became a judge, and was also a general of militia. — His son, Washington Charles, manufacturer, b. in Salem, Ind., 4 Jan., 1822, was educated at Washington county seminary, and at the age of sixteen, by the death of his father, was thrown entirely on his own resources. When nineteen years of age he entered the office of the county clerk, and became subsequently clerk of the circuit court of Indiana, resigning in February, 1856. He afterwards engaged in milling, combining farming with this business, and also dealt extensively in grain. He has declined the nominations for lieutenant-governor and governor of Indiana, as well as other offices, on political preferences during the last thirty years. After ten years' incessant study, and the expenditure of half a million dollars, Mr. De Pauw finally succeeded in making plate-glass equal to any in the world, and has been successfully engaged in its manufacture in New Albany, Ind. He has become wealthy, and has used his means freely to enlarge the city of New Albany. He established and largely endowed De Pauw university, Greenfield, Ind., De Pauw female college, at New Albany, and has also expended large sums in building churches, moving to California in 1855, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began his active work at an exciting period in our political life. He served in the New York assembly in 1861-2, and during the second session was chairman of the ways and means committee, and also a state senator, served in the western states, and resigned in March, 1863. Afterward he settled in Washington, D.C., to practise his profession as an attorney. John W. Forney, in his "Anecdotes of Public Men," says: "Gen. DE PEYSTER, Johannes, merchant, b. in Haarlem, Holland, about 1630; d. in New Amsterdam—Avenue of New York, about 1685. The name was originally spelled "Peyster," "Peyster," or "Pester." He came of a French Huguenot family that took refuge in the United Provinces about 1626. After the time of the massacre of St. Bartholomew. He emigrated to the New World and settled first in New Amsterdam. Of his sons (besides Abraham, mentioned below), JOHANNES filled the mayor's chair; ISAAC was a member of the provincial legislature; and CORNELIUS was the first chamberlain of the city of New York, besides acting in various other public capacities. JOHN was the last of the preceding, b. in New York city, 8 July, 1658; d. there, 10 Aug., 1738. He was a merchant, and amassed much wealth. He was mayor of New York in 1691-5, and subsequently became chief justice of the province and president of the king's council in 1698.

He was also appointed colonel of the forces of the city and county of New York, and treasurer of the province with New York and New Jersey. The mansion erected by him in 1693, which is the site of the present city hall, remained standing until 1856. It occupied the site now partly covered by the buildings numbered 178 and 180 Pearl street. The bell presented by him to the Middle Dutch church, in Nassau street, a short time before his death, now hangs in the City Hall, 11 Vesey street; 2nd avenue and 24th street, and is in constant use. His eldest son, ABRAHAM, was treasurer of the province from 1721 till 1767. —ARENT SCHUYLER, soldier, grandson of Col. Abraham Schuyler, b. in New York city, 27 June, 1758; d. in Dumfries, Scotland, in November, 1789. He entered the 8th regiment of foot in 1755, served in various parts of North America under his uncle, Col. Peter Schuyler, and commanded at Detroit, Mackinac, and various places in Upper Canada during the American Revolutionary war. The Indian tribes of the north-west were then hostile to the British, but De Peyster, by his tact and the adoption of conciliatory measures, entirely weaned them from the colonists. Having risen to the rank of colonel, and commanded his regiment many years, he retired to Dumfries, Scotland, until his death. During the French revolution he had a large share in enlisting and drilling the 1st regiment of Dumfries volunteers, one of the original members of which was Robert Burns, who dedicated to him his poem on "Life," and with whom he once carried on a poetical controversy in the columns of the Dumfries "Journal." His nephew, Capt. ARENT SCHUYLER DE PEYSTER, an American navigator, sailed several times around the globe, and, in a passage from the western coast of America to Calcutta, discovered in the South Pacific a group of seventeen islands in the unvisited part of the world.
regiment of New York militia, and, on the military reorganization of the state, he was assigned to the command of the 22d district, and in 1851 was promoted brigadier-general. In 1855 he was appointed adjutant-general, which office he soon resigned, but, in April, 1866, was brevetted major-general. Gen. De Peyster assisted in the organization of the permanent police of the city of New York, and is the author of a series of reports in favor of a paid fire department, with fire-escapes and steam-engines (1852–3). He has been a voluminous contributor to periodical literature, besides writing numerous works on military topics. Among the latter are "Life of Field-Marshal Torstenson" (1855); "The Dutch at the North Pole" (1857); "Caesarinus, the Dutch Augustus" (1858); "Life of Baron Cohorn" (1860); and "Personal and Military History of Gen. Philip Kearny" (1869).—John Watts, Jr., soldier, son of the preceding, b. in New York, 2 Dec., 1841; d. there 12 April, 1873. In March, 1863, he left the law-school of Columbia college and joined the staff of Gen. Philip Kearny as volunteer aide, participating in the battle of Williamsburg. For a time he commanded the cavalry of New York, and was afterward major of the 1st New York artillery, and still later served on the staff of Gen. Peck. He was then prostrated by fever, and, after a severe illness of several months, returned to the field in the winter of 1863. For his zeal, capacity, and energy, displayed in the Chancellorville campaign and in the battle of Fredericksburg, he was promoted to be lieutenant-colonel and colonel. He remained with the army until midsummer of the same year, when his increasing weakness compelled him to resign.

DE PUY, William Walter, lawyer, b. in Pompey Hill, Onondaga co., N. Y., in 1820; d. 2 Feb., 1876. He studied law, and was admitted to the bar of New York. He was private secretary to Gov. Horatio Seymour during his term of 1853–4, and subsequently served as U. S. consul at Carthagin and as secretary of legation at Berlin in 1854, which place he resigned to take part in the political struggle of 1860. From President Lincoln he received the appointment of secretary of the state of Nebraska, organized that territory, and served as the first speaker of its legislative body. He was also an Indian agent to the Pawnees, under President Lincoln, and devoted much time and energy to the reformation of the Indian service of the government. For several years he edited and published a newspaper in Indianapolis, Ind., in support of the liberal party, being a warm friend of Gov. Chase. He was a constant contributor of political articles to the press, the author of several popular poems, and of the following works: "Kossuth and his Generals," with a brief history of Hungary (New York, 1851); "Louis Napoleon and his Times," with a memoir of the Bonaparte family (1853); "Ethian Allen and the Green Mountain Heroes of '76," with the early history of Vermont (1853); and "Threscore Yours and Beyond" (1873).

DEQUEN, John, missionary, b. in France in the early part of the 17th century; d. in Quebec in 1651. He came to Canada in 1646, and served chiefly in Quebec. He was superior of the Jesuits of Canada from 1656 till his death, which was occasioned by his devotion to the sick during a season of pestilence. He was the author of the "Règlement de la nouvelle France" for 1656.

DERBIGNY, Pierre Auguste Charles Bourisgay, fifth governor of Louisiana, b. in France; d. in New Orleans, 6 Oct., 1859. Compelled to leave France during the Revolution, he first went to Santo Domingo, and thence to the United States, living for a while in Pittsburgh, Penn., where he married the sister of Chevalier de Lozier. He removed to Missouri and to Florida, and finally settled in Louisiana. In 1803 he acted as Mayor Borse's secretary, and in the latter part of the same year his linguistic acquirements led Gov. Claiborne to appoint him postmaster of the city of New Orleans, and the author of a series of reports in favor of a paid fire department, with fire-escapes and steam-engines (1852–3). He has been a voluminous contributor to periodical literature, besides writing numerous works on military topics. Among the latter are "Life of Field-Marshal Torstenson" (1855); "The Dutch at the North Pole" (1857); "Caesarinus, the Dutch Augustus" (1858); "Life of Baron Cohorn" (1860); and "Personal and Military History of Gen. He was then prostrated by fever, and, after a severe illness of several months, returned to the field in the winter of 1863. For his zeal, capacity, and energy, displayed in the Chancellorville campaign and in the battle of Fredericksburg, he was promoted to be lieutenant-colonel and colonel. He remained with the army until midsummer of the same year, when his increasing weakness compelled him to resign.

DE PUY, William Walter, lawyer, b. in Pompey Hill, Onondaga co., N. Y., in 1820; d. 2 Feb., 1876. He studied law, and was admitted to the bar of New York. He was private secretary to Gov. Horatio Seymour during his term of 1853–4, and subsequently served as U. S. consul at Carthagin and as secretary of legation at Berlin in 1854, which place he resigned to take part in the political struggle of 1860. From President Lincoln he received the appointment of secretary of the state of Nebraska, organized that territory, and served as the first speaker of its legislative body. He was also an Indian agent to the Pawnees, under President Lincoln, and devoted much time and energy to the reformation of the Indian service of the government. For several years he edited and published a newspaper in Indianapolis, Ind., in support of the liberal party, being a warm friend of Gov. Chase. He was a constant contributor of political articles to the press, the author of several popular poems, and of the following works: "Kossuth and his Generals," with a brief history of Hungary (New York, 1851); "Louis Napoleon and his Times," with a memoir of the Bonaparte family (1853); "Ethian Allen and the Green Mountain Heroes of '76," with the early history of Vermont (1853); and "Threscore Yours and Beyond" (1873).

DEQUEN, John, missionary, b. in France in the early part of the 17th century; d. in Quebec in 1651. He came to Canada in 1646, and served chiefly in Quebec. He was superior of the Jesuits of Canada from 1656 till his death, which was occasioned by his devotion to the sick during a season of pestilence. He was the author of the "Règlement de la nouvelle France" for 1656.

DERBIGNY, Pierre Auguste Charles Bourisgay, fifth governor of Louisiana, b. in France; d. in New Orleans, 6 Oct., 1859. Compelled to leave France during the Revolution, he first went to Santo Domingo, and thence to the United States, living for a while in Pittsburgh, Penn., where he married the sister of Chevalier de Lozier. He removed to Missouri and to Florida, and finally settled in Louisiana. In 1803 he acted as Mayor Borse's secretary, and in the latter part of the same year his linguistic acquirements led Gov. Claiborne to appoint him postmaster of the city of New Orleans, and the author of a series of reports in favor of a paid fire department, with fire-escapes and steam-engines (1852–3). He has been a voluminous contributor to periodical literature, besides writing numerous works on military topics. Among the latter are "Life of Field-Marshal Torstenson" (1855); "The Dutch at the North Pole" (1857); "Caesarinus, the Dutch Augustus" (1858); "Life of Baron Cohorn" (1860); and "Personal and Military History of Gen. Philip Kearny" (1869).—John Watts, Jr., soldier, son of the preceding, b. in New York, 2 Dec., 1841; d. there 12 April, 1873. In March, 1863, he left the law-school of Columbia college and joined the staff of Gen. Philip Kearny as volunteer aide, participating in the battle of Williamsburg. He was a time commander of New York cavalry, and was afterward major of the 1st New York artillery, and still later served on the staff of Gen. Peck. He was then prostrated by fever, and, after a severe illness of several months, returned to the field in the winter of 1863. For his zeal, capacity, and energy, displayed in the Chancellorville campaign and in the battle of Fredericksburg, he was promoted to be lieutenant-colonel and colonel. He remained with the army until midsummer of the same year, when his increasing weakness compelled him to resign.

DERBY, James Cephas, publisher, b. in Little Falls, N. Y., 20 July, 1818. He was educated at the grammar-school in Herkimer, N. Y. He was apprenticed to the book-selling business in Auburn, N. Y., in 1833, and afterward was in business on his own account, both there and in New York city. Among the American authors whose works he published were the Cary sisters, B. P. Shillaber, S. G. Goodrich, Henry W dikoff, Henry Ward Beecher, Augusta J. Evans, Thomas Bailey Aldrich, and Marion Harland. He retained for years the friendship of such men as H. Seward, Alexander H. Stephens, and Horace Greeley. He is himself the author of "Fifty Years among Authors, Books, and Publishers" (New York, 1884).

DERBY, Richard, merchant, b. in Salem, Mass., 12 Sept., 1712; d. there 9 Nov., 1786. In 1736 he went master of the slop "Raiser," sailing from Salem for Cadiz and Malaga, and in 1742 master and part owner of the "Volant," bound for Barbadoes and the French islands. In 1737 Capt. Derby appears to have retired from the sea, relinquishing his command to his son John and Richard, and become a merchant of Salem. His vessels were exposed not only to the dangers of the sea but also to the French and English cruisers. During the French war, 1756–63, he owned several ships and brigantines. He took a decided part in seeking redress from the British ministry for wrongs done to American shipping by English privateers. From 1768, till 1772, he was a member of the general court, in 1774, 1776, and 1777 a member of the governor's council. In 1774-5, his son Richard was a delegate to the Provincial congress. In the narrative of the march of Leslie to Salem it is related that Capt. Derby was sought of some of the buildings that Col. Leslie desired to seize. Meeting the old gentleman before his house in Salem, he demanded the surrender of the cannon, and "urged him to deliver them up without resistance." Derby's reply was as significant as that of the old Spartan: "Find them, if you can! take them, if you can! they will never be surrendered!" His widow founded the Derby Academy, at Hingham. His eldest son, Richard, was an ardent patriot; and another of his sons, John Derby, was an owner of the ship "Columbia," which, on her second voyage, discovered Columbia river. By a remarkable concurrence of events, and by the uncommon speed of two ships, owned by his father and brother, he carried to England the first news of the battle of Lexington, returned to Salem with the first intelligence of the effect it produced in London, and landed the British fleet before Boston, at Cambridge, and at the close of the war brought to America from France the first news of peace.

—His son, Elias Hasket, merchant, b. in Salem, Mass., 16 Aug., 1789; d. there, 8 Sept., 1798. In early life he kept the books and conducted the correspondence of his father, and he seems to have been the accountant of his family. From 1780 till 1775 he not only took charge of the books, wharves, and other property, but, imbuing the spirit of his father, and acquiring through him and his captains a knowledge of commerce, he engaged extensively in trade with the English and French islands. He made important improvements in shipbuilding, and warmly espoused the cause of the colonists. He loaned the government a large proportion of the supplies for the army, furnished books for the troops in camp, and the French fleet with coal, and was the leader in building a frigate for the nation. He was also extensively and successfully engaged in privateering against British commerce. As the war progressed, he established ship-yards, studied naval architecture, and built a class of vessels of the war model, and speed to any previously launched in the colonies, which were able to cope with a British sloop-of-war. He united with his townsman in the equipment of 158 private armed vessels fitted out at Salem, mounting more than 2,000 guns. In 1784 he opened the trade to St. Petersburg, and from 1785 till 1799 there is record of his sending at least 37 different vessels on 125 voyages, of which 45 were to the East Indies or China. In 1791 he embarked in the regular trade with India, and is called the father of American commerce with that country. After this his ships made many voyages to foreign ports. He first displayed the American flag before the fortress of Calcutta, and his were the first American ships that carried cargoes of cotton from Bombay to China. In 1795, under President John Adams, a treaty of commerce was concluded, which was to produce $10,000 of the $75,000 raised by citizens at once. Its establishment was the result of Mr. Derby's advice to the president and congress, which body in June passed an act authorizing the president to accept such vessels as citizens might build for the national service, and to issue a six-per-cent stock to indemnify the subscribers. Though the war seriously impaired the trade and fortunes of ship-owners, yet at Mr. Derby's death he left an estate that exceeded $1,000,000, supposed to be the largest fortune in the province during the last century; but he had contributed still more to the growth of his town, state, and the commerce of his country. His mansion, which he had occupied but a few months previous to his death, required an expensive style of living, and in consequence many of the buildings were struck from his orders after his death, and finally gave way to the Salem square and market-space that now bear the name of Derby.—His eldest son, Elias Hasket, Jr., merchant, b. in Salem, Mass., 10 Jan., 1786; d. in Londonderry, N. H., 16 Sept., 1858. His father showed high appreciation of his services, as having by two important voyages, contributed largely to his fortune—the one to the isle of France, the other to Naples. For ten years after his father's death he occupied the paternal mansion, but, finding his fortune impaired by the requirements of its luxurious appointments and the adverse course of trade, he resumed business. On one voyage from London to Lisbon he found that large flocks of merino sheep had crossed the mountains to escape the French armies, and determined to take a flock to the United States. Until this period the export of merinos had been prohibited in France, and the country was so coarse that an English traveller had predicted it would never rival England in cloth. Gen. Derby embarked with a flock of 1,100 merinos of the Montaron breed, and in 1811 landed them in New York, whence they were sent to "Ten Hills," near Boston. During the war he established the first broadcloth loom ever erected in the state. He remained a year in the isle of France in charge of his father's vessel, and was the first to display our ensign in the ports of Bombay and Calcutta, establishing the trade in those parts. After a residence of three years in India, the result of one of his voyages was a profit of $100,000 to his father. Soon afterward he sent a ship on the first voyage from the United States to Mocha, in the Red Sea. The children of the senior Elias Hasket completed the Dupont frigate, building it 2,000 feet into the harbor, contributed largely to the construction of a bridge and avenue, and levelled and improved the common. He received an honorary degree from Harvard university in 1808.—His eldest son, Elias Hasket, lawyer, b. in Salem, Mass., 24 Sept., 1809; d. Feb. 18, 1880, was graduated with high honors at Harvard in 1824, studied law with Daniel Webster, began practice in Boston in 1827, and attained reputation as a railroad attorney. Before legislative committees he encountered successfully the ablest counsel of the state, and secured the extension of many important lines of road. To his unremitting efforts was largely due the construction and completion of the Hoosac tunnel. He was also zealous in his efforts to secure the construction of iron-clad vessels during the Civil war, and was promoting the commercial interests of Boston. As U.S. commissioner in 1867, Mr. Derby transmitted to Sec. Seward an exhaustive report on the relations of the United States with the British provinces and the condition of the question of the fisheries. It was largely through his influence that the Hoos- jute was introduced into the United States. He was the author of "Two Months Abroad" (Boston, 1844); "Catholic Letters" (Boston, 1856); "The Overland Route to the Pacific," and numerous articles in periodicals and newspapers, some of them under the pen-name of "Massachusetts."

DE ROSET

b. in Salem, Mass., 13 Feb., 1819; d. in Boston, Mass., 20 June, 1874, was graduated at Harvard in 1838 in the collegiate department, and in 1843 in the medical school, and began practice in Boston, giving much attention to sanitary science. He had acquired a lucrative practice and a wide reputation by his writings on sanitary subjects before the formation of the army in 1861, in which he was commissioned surgeon in the 23rd Massachusetts volunteers, serving for four years, and holding several important offices, among them those of medical inspector of the Department of Virginia and North Carolina, and surgeon-in-Chief of divisions, finally attaining the rank of brevet lieutenant-colonel of volunteers. His service was regarded as most valuable, not only to his regiment but to the health and sanitary condition of the army, and the government gave him the last-named commission when his health had compelled him to leave the army. After the war he was appointed to the command of the Soldiers' hospital at Augusta, Me., but he returned to Boston in 1866, was appointed one of the surgeons at the City hospital, and early set about the establishment of a central board of health in the city, the latter being still in the possession of the family.
He was appointed by the president of the United States to be post-physician, which office he held for many years. During two or more terms he served in the town government. His writings were conduced to effect many important sanitary reforms, no copies of which are known to exist. A pamphlet, "De febribus intermittentibus," a Latin thesis, delivered at his graduation, was published in 1790. His son, Mose John, physician, b. in Indies. In 1784 he was matriculated at Princeton. At the close of the first session of his collegiate course, a fellow-student, Robert Goodloe Harper, observing his rigid economy and close attention to duties, and his determination to remain at the coldge during vacation, for want of funds to defray the expenses of the journey home, offered to be his teacher in the studies of the next year. The offer was gladly accepted, and at the opening of the next session De Rosset was promoted to an advanced class, completing his course in three years.

While at the medical college he enjoyed the friendship of Dr. Benjamin Rush, with whom he held a long correspondence, while he was secretary and executive officer from January, 1866, until his death. In 1872 he was appointed to the new professorship of hygiene at Harvard medical college. His eight health registration reports were published, and gave rise to new views and reforms in sanitary science. He published a series of articles in the annual report of the Massachusetts board of health, which brought him to the notice of sanitarians at home and abroad. He issued a treatise on "Anthracite and Health" (Boston, 1868).

tom-house, and after his return to his native town died after his removal to New York. Under the pen-name "John Phoenix" he wrote a series of sketches and burlesques, which were published with the title of "Phenixiana" (New York, 1855).
He was also the author of "The Squibb Papers" (1859), under which name other of his articles were published after his death.

ing no relief, returned to Wilmington in September, 1881. During his residence in Baltimore he published a translation of Bouchardat’s “Annual Abstract of Therapeutics, Materia Medica, Pharmacy, and Toxictology for 1867.” His writings were chiefly contributions to medical journals, his last appearing in the St. Louis Medical and Surgical Journal, and the American Journal of the Medical Sciences” for October, 1878, entitled “The Muscle of Accommodation, and its Mode of Action.” He devised a new and efficient form of inhaler for anesthesia, and a new form of cannula scissors for operating war wounds. He served in the army in China in 1851 on special assignments that after the extraction of the lens the nictitating fossa disappears, and the anterior surface of the vitreous becomes convex.

DE ROTTMENBURG, Baron, British soldier, b. about 1756; d. in England in 1882. After serving in the British army in different parts of the world and attaining the rank of brigadier-general in May, 1810, he was transferred to the staff in Canada. He took command of the garrison of Quebec, and the same year was promoted to major-general. At the beginning of the American war in 1812 he was assigned to the Montreal district, took command of the force in Upper Canada in 1813, and was appointed also administrator of that province. In 1814—5 he commanded the left division of the army in Canada, and in September of the latter year returned to England. His son, the Baron De Rottenburg at his father’s death, was b. about 1807. He entered the British army as a cornet in 1825, and in 1837 served in Canada during the rebellion, and received the brevet rank of major. Subsequently he served in the 4th foot, and was appointed adjutant-general in Canada. In July, 1855, he was appointed adjutant-general of the militia of Upper Canada, which rank he retained until June, 1858, when he was appointed to the lieutenant-colonel of the 100th regiment (Canadian), recently organized and embarked for the United States.

DE RUSSE, Louis G., soldier, b. in New York in 1796; d. in Grand Ecore, La., 17 Dec., 1864. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1814, and made 3d lieutenant in the 1st artillery. He served in the war of 1812—5, with Great Britain, as acting assistant surgeon, in temporary defenses for New York city and its environs, and in garrison in New York harbor in 1815—6, when he was made battalion adjutant of artillery. In 1819 he became topographer of a commission to establish the northern boundary of the United States under the treaty of Ghent. He became captain of the 3d artillery in 1825, and in the following year was made paymaster and major. In 1842 he was dropped from the army, and became a planter at Natchitoches, La. In 1846 he served in the Mexican war at Tampico, and became colonel of the 1st Louisiana volunteers. He completed the defenses of the place, opened a new channel to Tamesse river, held various civil offices, and was engaged in the fight at Callabosa river and in the skirmish of Tantayuka. He was a civil engineer from 1835 till 1845, and was stationed at New York city in 1837. He was major-general of Louisiana militia from 1848 till 1861, when he entered the Confederate army.

DESAULNIERS, Louis Leon L., Canadian physician, b. in Sainte-Marguerite-d’Youville, Quebec, 16 Feb., 1823. He was educated at Nicolet seminary, and at Harvard, where he was graduated in 1846. He was lieutenant-colonel of volunteers of the county of St. Maurice, and was elected to the Canadian assembly for this constituency in 1854, serving from the same till 1861, and from 1861 till 1867. In 1868 he resigned to accept the office of inspector of prisons and asylums for the province of Quebec. He was elected to the Dominion parliament, in 1878, and again in 1882.
DE SAUSSURE, Henry William, jurist, b. in Poostaligo, S. C., 16 Aug., 1763; d. in Charleston, 29 Oct., 1846. He was born from an ancient family of Lorraine, France. His grandfather, Henry, emigrated to South Carolina in 1730, and Daniel, his father, took an active part in the Revolution, and was president of the state senate in 1780-1. Henry William served as a volunteer during the siege of Charleston in 1780, and passed two months in a prison-ship. He was sent to Philadelphia to be exchanged, studied law with Jared Ingersoll, and was admitted to the bar of Philadelphia in 1784, and in 1785 to that of Charleston. He was a delegate to the South Carolina constitutional convention of October, 1788, and in 1789 was a member of the legislature. In 1794 President Washington appointed him director of the U. S. mint. When dining with him on one occasion, Gen. Washington said: "I have long desired to see gold coined at the Mint, but your predecessor found the people of the mint would be gratified if it could be accomplished." The director replied, "I will try!" and a few weeks afterward he carried to the president a handful of gold eagles. The first gold coined at the Mint of the United States was 30th November, 1795, and received from Washington an autograph letter regretting his determination to retire, and expressing "entire satisfaction" with his administration. He then returned to practice the law in South Carolina, and was elected a chancellor of the state in 1796, 1797, 1798, and 1800, and the number of decrees in the circuit court of equity and the court of appeals was 2,888, and of these Chancellor De Saussure delivered 1,314. In 1837 his health became impaired, and he resigned. Gov. Butler, in communicating to the legislature the resignation of the chancellor, said, 1800, in 1796, 1797, and 1798, a number of decrees in the circuit court of equity and the court of appeals was 2,888, and of these Chancellor De Saussure delivered 1,314. In 1837 his health became impaired, and he resigned. Gov. Butler, in communicating to the legislature the resignation of the chancellor, said: "The Atlantic Neptune" (2 vols., Columbia, S. C., 23 July, 1822; d. 1 Feb., 1898, was graduated at South Carolina college in 1843, and was admitted to the bar in 1845. He was a member of the legislature for ten years, was in command of the state troops that took possession of Fort Moultrie when Maj. Anderson evacuated it in December, 1860, as lieutenant-colonel was in command of the artillery on Morris Island during the bombardment of Fort Sumter in April, 1861, and was treasurer, and subsequently adjutant and inspector-general, of South Carolina. He was president of the state society of the Cincinnati, the St. Andrews society, the Charleston library society, the St. Cecilia society, and the Huguenot society of South Carolina. His published addresses include "The Stamp Act of Great Britain, and the Resistance of the Colonies," showing that South Carolina, on 26 March, 1776, adopted a constitution by which the royal government ceased to exist there: "The Centennial Celebration of the Organization of the Cincinnati"; "Mémoire de Gen. William Moultrie"; and "Muster-roll of the South Carolina Soldiers of the Continental Line and Militia who served during the Revolution." He also prepared an address on the celebration by the Huguenot society of America of the bi-centennial anniversary of the revolution of the Edict of Nantes (New York, 1883). preme court of Nova Scotia. He was clerk of the assembly in 1772, and appointed councillor in 1783.

DESHA, Joseph, soldier, b. in Pennsylvania, 9 Dec., 1785; d. in Georgetown, Ky., 13 Oct., 1842. His brother, George, was a soldier in the Indian wars under Generals Wayne and Harrison in 1794, and fought at the battle of the Thames in 1813 as a major-general. He was at one time a member of the Kentucky legislature, and was elected to Congress, serving from 26 Oct., 1807, till 3 March, 1811. He was a volunteer in the United States army from 1834 till 1848. His brother, Robert, soldier, b. in Pennsylvania; d. in Mobile, Ala., 8 Feb., 1849, removed to Tennessee in early life, served in the war of 1812 as captain of the 24th infantry, was brevetted major for services in the attempt to capture Fort Mackinaw, 4 Aug., 1814, and promoted brigadier-major in the following October. From 3 Dec., 1827, till 3 March, 1831, he was a representative in Congress from Tennessee. He afterward became a merchant in Mobile, Ala.

DESHON, George, missionary, b. in New London, Conn., 30 Jan., 1802. He was graduated at the U.S. military academy in 1843, being classmate and room-mate of Gen. Grant. He had stood next to the head of his class, and after graduation was for some time instructor in mathematics and ethics. He held the rank of major in the army, but left it on his conversion to the Catholic faith in 1851. He studied theology in Cumberland, Md., and was ordained priest in 1855. Having joined the Redemptorist order, he was sent on several missions, and was very successful in making converts. He was one of the leading men in founding the congregation of St. Paul, of which he has since been a member. He has superseded the erection of the church of St. Paul, New York, which is the largest, save one, in the United States, attending to all engineering work himself. Father Deshon is the author of "A Guide for Catholic Young Women" (New York, 1860), which has had the most extensive circulation of any Catholic book ever published in this country.

DESIREE, sister superior, b. in Janakhp, Belgium, in 1815; d. in Lowell, Mass., in 1879. She received her education in her native place, and entered the congregation of Sisters of Notre Dame at Namur. After taking her vows in 1845, she came to the United States, and was stationed at Cincinnati until 1852, when she was sent to Lowell to found a convent and schools for Catholic girls. During the twenty-seven years that she resided in Lowell she erected four large brick edifices for the accommodation of her pupils.

DESMARDINS, T. C. Alphonse, Canadian journalist, b. in Terrebonne, province of Quebec, 5 May, 1841. He was educated at Maseon college and at Nicolet seminary, was admitted to the bar in 1868, and practised in Montreal until 1868, when he abandoned law for journalism, and became one of the editors of "L’Ordre." In 1872 he was appointed editor and one of the directors of "Le Nouveau Monde," retaining this position for four years. In 1882 he was elected president of Le credit foncier du bas Canada, in 1883 director of the Richelieu and Ontario navigation company, and in 1885 vice-president of the Montreal and Western railway company. He took an active part in organizing the Canadian paper zouave contingent, which went to assist the pope in 1888, and in 1872 was created a knight of the order of Pius IX., in recognition of this and other services to the church. He was one of the authors of the "Programme Catholique" (1871), proposed as a basis upon which the opposing sections of the conservative party might agree. He was first returned to the Dominion parliament for Hochelaga, province of Quebec, in 1874, was re-elected in 1878, and by acclamation in 1882.

DE SMET, Peter John, missionary, b. in Termonde, Belgium, 31 Dec., 1801; d. in St. Louis, Mo., in May, 1872. He studied in the Episcopal seminary of Meclhin, and while there he felt called to devote himself to the conversion of the Indians. When Bishop Neriux visited Belgium in search of missionaries, Father Sim, with five other students, volunteered to accompany him. The government gave orders to stop them, but they escaped from the officers and sailed from Amsterdam in 1821. After a short stay in Philadelphia, De Smet entered the Jesuit novitiate at White Marsh, Md. Here he took the Jesuit habit, but after two years the house was dissolved, and he was about to return to Belgium, when he was invited by Bishop Dubourg to Florissant, where he completed his education and took his vows. In 1828 he went to St. Louis and took part in establishing the University of St. Louis, in which he was afterward professor. In 1838 he was sent to establish a mission among the Pottawatamies on Sugar creek. He built a chapel, and beside it the log-huts of himself, Father Verreydt, and a lay brother. He erected a school, which was soon crowded with pupils, and in a short time converted most of the tribe. In 1840 he begged the bishop of St. Louis to permit him to labor among the Flatheads of the Rocky mountains. When it was represented to him that there was no money for such an expedition, he said that sufficient means would assuredly come from Europe, and set out on 30 April, 1840, from Westport, with the annual caravan of the American fur company, whose destination was Green River. He arrived on 14 July in the camp of Peter Valley, where about 1,000 Indians had assembled to meet him. They had retained traditions of the French missionaries of two centuries before, and De Smet found it easy to convert them. With the aid of an interpreter, he translated the Lord’s prayer, the creed, and the commandments into their language, and in a fortnight all the Flatheads knew these prayers and commandments, which were afterward explained to them. During his journey back to St. Louis he was on several occasions surrounded by war-parties of the Blackfeet, but as soon as they recognized his black gown and crucifix they showed the greatest veneration for him. He thus laid the foundation of the extraordinary influence that he afterward exercised over the Indians. In the spring of 1841 he set out again, with two other missionaries and three lay brothers, all expert mechanics, and, after passing through several tribes, crossed the Platte and met at Fort Hall a body of Flatheads, who had come 800 miles to escort the missionaries. On 24 Sept. the party reached Bitter-root river, where it was decided to form a permanent settlement. A plan... for a mission village was drawn up, a cross planted, and the mission of St. Mary's begun. The lay brothers built a church and residence, while De Smet went to the Blackfeet to obtain permission. On his return, the Blackfoot warriors went on the winter chase, and he remained in the village familiarizing himself with the language, into which he translated the catechism. He then resolved to visit Fort Vancouver, hoping to find there the supplies necessary to make St. Mary's a fixed post. On his way he visited several tribes, and taught them the ordinary prayers and rudiments of religion. After a narrow escape from drowning in Columbia river, he reached Fort Vancouver, but was deceived in his hope of finding supplies, and on his return to St. Mary's he resolved to cross the wilderness again to St. Louis. There he laid the condition of his mission before his superiors, who directed him to go to Europe and appeal for aid to the people of Belgium and France. He excited great enthusiasm for his work in those countries, several priests of his order asked permission to join him, and the Sisters of the Congregation of our Lady volunteered to undertake the instruction of the Flathead children. He sailed from Antwerp in December, 1843, with five Jesuits and six Sisters, and reached Fort Vancouver in April, 1844. He was ordered to go on the Willamette river for a central mission, and at once began to clear ground and erect buildings. The work advanced so rapidly that in October the Sisters, who had already begun their school in the open air, were able to enter their convent. In 1845 he began a mission among the Yakamas, Skokomished, Chinooks, Chinookese, Omenekas, Flatshaws, and Kutenays, which extended to the water-shed of the Saskatchewan and Columbia, the camps of the wandering Assiniboins and Creeks, and the stations of Fort St. Anne and Bompasna. He visited Europe several times in search of aid for his work. Indeed, he calculated that his journeys up to 1858, by land and water, must have been more than five times the circumference of the earth. The ability and influence of Father De Smet were cordially acknowledged by the government of the United States, and his aid was often sought in preventing Indian wars. Thus he put an end to the Sioux war, and in Oregon he induced the Yumas and other tribes, under Kamiakim, to cease hostilities. He was chaplain in the expedition to Utah, and opened new missions among the tribes in that territory. During his last visit to Europe he met with a severe accident, in which several of his ribs were broken, and on his return to St. Louis he wasted slowly away. Father De Smet was made a knight of the order of Leopold by the king of the Belgians. His best-known works, which have been translated into English, are "The Oregon Missions and Travels over the Rocky Mountains," "Indian Letters and Sketches," "Western Missions and Missionaries," and "New Indian Sketches."

DE SOTO, Peter, pioneer, b. in France, 21 April, 1800; d. in Detroit, Mich., 8 March, 1880. He came to this country in early life, and settled first in Gallipolis, Ohio, and then in Pittsburg, Pa. Later he removed to Detroit, Mich., where he resided until his death. Congress, in 1807, gave him a tract of land on Detroit river, in return for his loyalty to the United States. Subsequently, he became U. S. marshal for the territory of Michigan, and in 1839 state treasurer. From his long residence in Detroit, he came to be regarded as one of the most influential men of the city, as well as a leading spirit among the French population.

DE SOLE, Abraham, clergyman, b. in London, 18 Sept., 1835; d. in New York, 5 June, 1882. He was called to the ministry of the Portuguese synagogue in Montreal, Canada, in 1846, soon identified himself with the various literary and scientific bodies of his adopted country, and was appointed in 1858 professor of Hebrew and oriental literature at McGill University. He received the degree of LL. D. in 1858, and was elected president of the Natural history society of Montreal. In 1872 Dr. De Sole opened the session of the U. S. Congress with prayer. He labored by pen and in the pulpit to promote the welfare of his co-religionists, and was an eloquent exponent of conservative Judaism. His published works include "Scripture Zoology," "The Sanitary Institutions of the Hebrews," "Mosaic Cosmogony," "Sinaitic Inscriptions," "Notes on the Jews of Persia," and minor writings on Jewish history and literature.

DE SOTO, Fernando, Spanish discoverer, b. in Xeres de los Caballeros, Estremadura, Spain, about 1490; d. on the banks of the Mississippi in June, 1542. He was the descendant of a noble but impoverished family, and was indebted to Pedrarias Davila for the means of pursuing a course at the university, where he distinguished himself in literary studies and in athletic performances. In 1519 he accompanied Davila, who had been made viceroy of Guatemala, to his second expedition to America, during which he showed great ability and determination of character, especially as an opponent of the oppressive measures of his superior officers. He served on the expedition to Nicaragua in 1527 under Hernández, who afterward perished by the hand of Davila in consequence of not heeding his advice. In 1531 he withdrew from the service of his patron and explored the coasts of Guatemala and Yucatan, and ascended upward of 700 miles in search of a strait, which was supposed to connect the two oceans. Later he joined Pizarro in his expedition to Peru, with the promise of being made second in command. In 1538 he was sent with fifty horsemen and a few targetees to explore the highlands of Peru. He penetrated through a pass in the mountains, and discovered the great national road that led to the Peruvian capital. De Soto was sent by Pizarro as ambassador to visit the Inca Atahuapla, after whose capture he expostulated with his chief for treacherously refusing to release the Peruvian monarch, but in vain, although an immense sum had been paid for his ransom. He was prominent in the engagement that completed the conquest of Peru, and was the hero of the battle that resulted in the capture of Cuzco. Subsequently De Soto, who had landed in America with nothing of his own save his sword and target, returned to Spain with a fortune of $500,000, which enabled him to marry the daughter of his old patron Davila, to whom he had long been attached, and to maintain "all the state that the house of a nobleman requireth." The tales of returned adventurers fostered a belief in Spain that the treasures of the northern hemisphere would be found to rival in value the riches of Cortes; and De Soto, confident, in his desire to excel Cortes in glory and surpass Pizarro in wealth, sought permission from Charles V, to conquer Florida at his own expense. This privilege was readily conceded, and De Soto was made governor of Florida. Volunteers for the expedition assembled in great numbers, both from Spain and Portugal, and De Soto selected from the "flower of the peninsula" only those who were in the "bloom of life," and, with a force of 600 men, 24 ecclesiastics, and 20 officers, sailed early in April from San Lucar. The fleet soon reached Santiago de Cuba, and then stopped at Havana, where the women were to remain until after the conquest.

Leaving his wife in command, he crossed the gulf of Mexico and anchored in the bay of Espiritu Santo (now Tampa bay) on 25 May, 1539. When the soldiers were landed, De Soto, confident of success, sent his ships back to Cuba, and at the head of his followers began the long search for gold. His forces were greater in numbers and more perfect in equipment than those that had triumphed over the empires of Mexico and Peru. Everything was expected to be plentiful. Death was carefully kept secret; chains for captives, the implements of a forge, weapons of all kinds then in use, blood-hounds as auxiliaries against the natives, ample stores of food, and finally a drove of hogs, which would soon swarm in the favoring climate, where the meats furnished them with abundant sustenance. To the greed for wealth religious zeal was added, priests with their assistants accompanying the expedition. Ornaments for the service of the mass were provided, and every festival was to be kept in every religious practice observed.

The route was through a country already made hostile by the violence of the Spanish invader, Narvaez, and the Indians, in their efforts to rid themselves of the Spaniards, continually lured them onward by stories of wealth in regions still remote, which receded as they advanced. The party, therefore, marched northward at first, and then passed into the country of the Appalachians, where they spent the winter. Juan Ortiz, who had been captured by the Indians from Narvaez, and enslaved by them, could give no account of any land where gold or silver could be found. An exploring party, however, discovered Ochus, the harbor of Pensacola, and a message was sent to Cuba, desiring that in the following year supplies might be sent to that place. Meanwhile, discontent had arisen among the Spaniards, and when they appealed to De Soto to return, he refused, saying: "I will not turn back till I have seen the poverty of the country with my own eyes." In March, 1540, they resumed their march, proceeding in a northeasterly direction, and on 18 Oct. reached the village of Marilla or Mobile, on Alabama river, where, in an agreement with the natives, the Spaniards lost more than 50 men and 42 horses, and it was claimed that 2,500 Indians were killed. Ships had meanwhile arrived at Ochus, but De Soto proudly refused to send back any message of his fortunes. He then went to the northward, and on January 29, discovered the Chickasaws. In the spring of 1541 he made a demand on the chief of these Indians for 200 men to carry the burdens of the company. The chief hesitated, and in the night fired the village where the Spaniards were encamped. Forty of De Soto's followers perished in the flames, and all the baggage was destroyed. A delay of some weeks ensued, during which forges were erected, swords newly tempered, and ashen lances made. In April, De Soto resumed his march in a northwesterly direction, and, after journeying for seven days through a wilderness, he reached the Mississippi river. A month was spent on the banks, constructing barges large enough to hold three horsemen each, and then the army passed over to the western side; thence northward to Pocahoa, where he remained ten days, and then marched successively by the Mississippi until he reached the highlands of White river, which was the western limit of the expedition. Turning south, he proceeded on his journey, passing by the hot springs of Arkansas, which his companions at first supposed to be the fabled fountain of youth, and spent his third winter in Antiamque, on Washita river. In the following spring De Soto determined to descend this river to its junction. He finally reached the Mississippi again, and while descending its banks was stricken with malignant fever. Worn out by long disappointments, and his pride changed to a wasting melancholy, he realized that death was near at hand. He gathered his followers around him, and, after appointing Luis de Mocoso his successor, succumbed to the disease on the following day. The news of his death was conveyed to the Spanish governor, whom he was regarded as possessing supernatural powers, and at midnight, wrapped in his mantle, the body of the great discoverer was lowered into the waters of the river he had discovered. His followers, reduced to half their original numbers, passed the ensuing winter in the forests of Arkansas, where they built seven frail boats, in which they drifted down to the gulf of Mexico, and then followed the shore to the Mexican town of Panuco, where they dispersed. De Soto's wife expired in Havana three days after hearing of his fate. See "Life, Travels, and Adventures of Ferdinand de Soto," by Lambert A. Wilmer (Philadelphia, 1858); "Narratives of the Career of Hernando de Soto in the Conquest of Florida, as told by a Knight of Elvas," by Luis de Narvaez, and translated by Biedura, factor of the Expedition," translated by Buckingham Smith (New York, 1866), being number five of the Bradford club series; and Bancroft's "History of the United States" (vol. 1, New York, 1863).
DESSALINES, Jean Jacques, Haytian emperor, b. in Guinea, Africa, in 1758; d. in Hayti, 17 Oct., 1806. He was brought, when young, to Cape Francois (now Cape Haytiens), where he was purchased by a French adventurer, under the name of Jean Jacques, and sent to France, where he was educated. He became a soldier in the French army, and rose to the rank of general. In 1791, he led an insurrection against the French government, and was appointed to the post of governor of Hayti. He succeeded to the throne upon the death of Dessalines, and reigned till the fall of 1804. He was a great scholar and a great soldier, and is remembered as one of the most able and valiant generals of the French army. He was a great friend of liberty and a great benefactor to the people of Hayti.

DESTREHAM, Jean Noel, senator, b. about 1750. He was a citizen of Louisiana, and in 1805 one of the authors of a pamphlet attacking the territorial government. He was a member of the state convention of 1811, and voted against the distribution of public lands to the state. He was a member of the United States Senate from Louisiana, and served as a member of the convention that framed the constitution of the United States. He was a great friend of liberty and a great benefactor to the people of Louisiana.

DETMOLD, William Ludwig, surgeon, b. in Hanover, Germany, 27 Dec., 1806. His father was court physician to the king of Hanover. William received his medical degree from the University of Göttingen in 1830, and enlisted as surgeon in the Royal Hanoverian Grenadier-Guard. He came to the United States in 1837, and was appointed surgeon in the United States Army. He was a great friend of liberty and a great benefactor to the people of the United States.
DE TROBIAND, Philippe Régis, soldier, b. in the Château des Rochettes, near Tours, France, 4 June, 1810. His full name and title were Philippe Régis Denis de Kerédern, Baron de la Roche. On becoming an American citizen, he modified the name and dropped the title. His early education was for a military career. He studied at the College Saint Louis in Paris, the college of Rouen, where his father was in command, and the college of Reims, changing his prospects, and he was graduated at the University of Orleans as bachelier-ès-lettres in 1834, and at Poitiers as licencié-en-droit in 1838. He came to the United States in 1841, edited and published the "Revue de nouveau monde" in New York in 1840-50, and was joint editor of the "Courrier des États-Unis" in 1854-51. On 28 Aug. of the last-named year he entered the National army as colonel of the 55th New York regiment. He was engaged at Yorktown and Williamsburg, commanded a brigade of the 8th army corps in 1862-3, and was at Fredericksburg. He was made brigadier-general of volunteers in January, 1864, and commanded the defences of New York city from May till June of that year. As commander of a brigade in the 8th army corps he was at Deep Bottom, Petersburg, Hatchers Run, Five Forks, and was chief of a division in the operations that ended in Lee's surrender. For his services in this campaign he was brevetted major-general of volunteers on 9 April, 1865. He entered the regular army as colonel of the 21st regiment in 1867, was brevetted brigadier-general, U. S. army, 2 March, 1867, and commanded the district of Dakota in August of that year. He was transferred to the 13th infantry on 15 March, 1869, and commanded the district of Montana, and afterward that of Green River. He was mustered out, on account of age, on 20 March, 1879, and is now (1887) a resident of New Orleans, La. He has published "Les gentilshommes de l'Ouest," a novel (Paris, 1841), and "Quatre ans de campagnes à l'armée du Potomac" (2 vols., Paris, 1842).
DEVEREUX, Edward Gaston, Canadian surveyor, b. in La Charité Sur Loire Nievre, France, in 1849. He was educated at the naval school in Brest, and afterward joined the French navy, and had charge of extensive hydrographic surveys in the South Sea islands, Peru, and elsewhere. He retired from the navy in 1874 and went to Canada, inspector of Dominion land surveys, and in 1883 was appointed surveyor-general of Canada. He is a fellow of the Royal astronomical society and of the Royal society of Canada. He is the author of "Astronomic and Geodetic Calculations," and of several scientific papers.

DEVIERS, James A., soldier, b. in 1826. He had been an officer in the French army, and afterward became colonel of the 11th Ohio volunteers. At the beginning of the civil war in the United States he was taken prisoner, 17 July, 1861, and sent to Richmond. About the middle of September following he was exchanged. Under the guise of a mendicant Frenchman, aged, infirm, and nearly blind, he succeeded in obtaining the commandant's permission to go to Fort Monroe, under a flag of truce, that he might embark "for his dear old home in France." After two weeks' delay he was supposed Frenchman was assisted on board a transport at Norfolk and taken to the Union boat. When safely under his own flag, he cast off his pack, green goggle, and rags, thanked the officers for their politeness, shouted a loud "huzzas for the Jemmy," and proceeded on his way, bearing with him pleasing information that they had just parted with Col. De Villiers, of the 11th Ohio. He arrived safely in Washington, rejoined his regiment, and was made brigadier-general, 10 Oct., 1861. He had been the military instructor of Col. Elmer E. Ellsworth. He received his discharge from the army on 28 April, 1862, and returned to France.

DEVIN, Thomas C., b. in New York city in 1822; d. there, 4 April, 1878. He received a common-school education, followed the trade of a printer, and became lieutenant-colonel of the 1st New York mounted rifles. In 1862, Mr. Devin's property on the banks of Bull Run, Mr. Devin accosted Thurlow Weed, at that time a stranger to him, and said that he wished authority to raise a cavalry company for immediate service. Mr. Weed telegraphed to Gov. Morgan for a captain's commission for Mr. Devin, obtained it, and in two days the company had been recruited and was on its way to Washington. At the end of the three months for which he had enlisted he entered the service again as colonel of the 6th New York cavalry. His command was attached to the cavalry corps of the Army of the Potomac, and participated in all the battles fought by that corps from Antietam to Lee's surrender. At Five Forks he commanded his brigade, and carried the Confederate earthworks. He was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers, 15 Aug., 1864, for bravery at Fisher's Hill, 18 Sept., 1864, and for gallantry at Fisher's Hill, and brigadier-general for services at Sailor's Creek. He then commanded the district of Arizona, and on 25 June, 1777, became colonel of the 8th cavalry. Gen. Grant, in a conversation with Thurlow Weed, described him as "the ablest cavalry officer in the national army."

DEVIN, Thomas, Canadian surveyor, b. in the county Westmeath, Ireland, in 1823. He was educated in Fox's engineer's academy, and in the corps of Royal engineers, and, after being employed on the survey of Maine, went to Canada. He became connected with the surveying department in Canada in 1846, and was deputy surveyor-general in 1873-9. In 1849 he constructed the government map of Canada from Lake Superior to Nova Scotia (new ed., including Manitoba, 1879), and also constructed the first geological map of the Hudson bay territory before the Canadian government obtained control of it. He was elected a F. R. G. S. of London in 1880, and F. G. S. of London in 1873, and has also been elected a corresponding member of the Geographical Society of Berlin and of the American geographical and statistical society. He is the author of a field-book, exclusively used in Canadian and other surveys.

DE VINNE, Daniel, clergyman, b. in Londonerry, Ireland, 1 Feb., 1793; d. in Morristown, N. J., in 1863. He went to the United States before he was a year old, settling in Charleston, Montgomery Co., N. Y., where he lived till eleven years of age. In 1819 he became a minister of the Methodist Episcopal church, and filled appointments in Louisiana and Mississippi for five years. In 1824 he published, in both Louisiana and Mississippi, a newspaper, which he conducted for six years. In 1836 he went to New York, in 1844, entered the employ of Francis Hart, and in 1859 became his partner. Mr. Hart died in 1877, and in 1883 the firm name became Theodore L. De Vinne and Company. In his own office, and as a member of the "Typothetes," the Grolier club, Mr. De Vinne had been active in efforts to improve typography. His style of book composition and his press-work of wood-cuts have given him a wide reputation in this country and abroad. He has printed St. Nicholas since its beginning in 1878, and the "Century" since 1874. In 1886 he removed to a new building in Lafayette place specially designed by him. He has contributed to current literature on books and printing, and has published the "Printers' Price List," an office manual (New York, 1871); "Invention of Printing" (1876); and "History of Types" (1896).

DE VRIES, David Pieterse, colonist, lived in 17th century. Several of the directors of the New Amsterdam chamber of the West India company took measures to secure for themselves a share of the trade of the Dutch East India Company, and in 1656 capitalizing capitalists in the charter of 1629. A few days before the passing of the charter the agents of Samuel Godym and Samuel Blommemaert bought from the Indians the tract of country on the southwest side of South River bay, which purchase was ratified by the director-general and council at Fort Amsterdam on 15 July, 1630. The possession of these desert tracts of land would be of no profit unless means were adopted to cultivate them, and, in order to accomplish this, a number of associations were formed, consisting of wealthy men. Each guild was under the charge of a member of the council. In October, 1630, an association was formed for planting a colony on the South river. Its members were Godym, Blommemaert, Van Rensselaer, De Vries, and others. On 12 Dec., 1630, two vessels, with a number of emigrants and a large stock of cattle, were sent out. De Vries was the captain of one of Peter Heyes, to occupy the new possessions on the Delaware. The smaller of these vessels was captured by the Dunkirk privateers before it had left the Dutch waters; the other, "The Walrus," carrying eighteen guns, arrived safely in the Delaware, and a settlement was made on Lewis creek, a short distance from the mouth of the river. The little fort, flanked by palisades, was named Fort Oplandt, and the lands were called by the poetic name of "Swanendal." The chief purpose in acquiring these lands was to cultivate grain and tobacco and to engage in the whale fishery. Heyes, however, did nothing to establish the whale fishery, and it was therefore decided that De Vries should command a second expedition, and become patron of the colony. With a large vessel and a yacht he set sail 24 May, 1632. At the moment of starting he received news that the settlers of Swanendal had been massacred by the Indians and all their possessions destroyed. On 5 Dec. he reached the Delaware, and the cry of "Whale near the ship!" stimulated their hopes, soon to be dispelled, for the right of passage through the bar was presented a melancholy spectacle. The ground was decorated with the skulls and bones of the colonists, and the heads of horses and cattle were scattered over the plain. They succeeded in communicating with the Indians on the following day, and invited them to a "culturage." The savages came with their chief, and by the free use of presents and pacific policy De Vries gained their confidence and concluded a treaty of peace. Encouraged by their friendly disposition, De Vries moved up the river to Fort Nassau in quest of provisions. Here he met with savage Indians who had massacred the settlers from the Virginia colony. Desirous of seeing the country, De Vries sailed for Virginia, where he was heartily welcomed by the governor, who was much surprised to know that the Dutch had a colony on the Delaware. De Vries returned to Swanendal, and found that his party had only taken seven whales, which yielded but little oil. Concluding that this enterprise was not profitable, he gathered up his effects, and, taking his party, set sail for Holland on 14 April, 1634, leaving no European in the valley of the Delaware. He published "Voyages from Holland to America, from 1622 till 1644," which was translated from the Dutch by Henry C. Murphy (New York, 1853).

DEW, Thomas Roderick, educator, b. in King and Queen county, Va., 5 Dec., 1802; d. in Paris, France, 6 Aug., 1866; wrote in entire works of William and Mary in 1820, and afterward travelled two years in Europe. In 1827 he was appointed professor of history, metaphysics, and political economy in William and Mary, of which college he was made professor in 1836. He held this office until his death, which occurred at his residence in London in Europe with his bride. His published works are: "The Policy of the Government" (1829); "An Essay in Favor of Slavery" (1833), which produced an extraordinary effect upon the public mind, and for a while at least the subject of emancipation in Virginia; "A Digest of the Laws, Customs, Manners, and Institutions of Ancient and Modern Nations" (New York, 1833). This is a treatise on the history of the world from its earliest period to the first French revolution. He also published "In the Army, in the Navy," and some of the "Characteristics of Man and Woman," etc., and contributed to the "Southern Literary Messenger." DEWEY, professor of chemistry and natural philosophy in the University of Rochester, which was established that year. He held this position 1860, at which time he offered his resignation, feeling unable to perform active service, but consented to retain a nominal connection with the university, and to give instruction when it suited his convenience. After the age of eighty he lived in retirement, and devoted his life to the study of plants, and the objects of natural history. His whole life was given to the study of grasses a specialty, and discovered and described several new species. The degree of M. D. was conferred upon him by Yale in 1837, and of LL. D. by Williams in 1850. He was a careful and accurate observer of the weather, and his notes were published in regular monthly reports. His papers on some of the "Families and Natural Orders of Plants," published in the "American Journal of Science," attracted his attention of some of the leading European botanists, and led to a correspondence with them. In the class of "carices" he was a recognized authority, and his writings on that subject make an elaborate monograph, upon which he labored for more than forty years. His "History of the Herbaceous Plants of Massachusetts" was published by that state. His latest writings were review articles on "The True Place of Man in Zoology" and "An Examination of some Reasonings against the Unity of Mankind."

DEWEY, Henry French, librarian, b. in Hartford, Conn., 4 Oct., 1855. He was graduated at the Sheffield scientific school in 1876, and in the autumn of that year became assistant in analytical chemistry in Lafayette college. This office he held until July, 1877, when he took charge of the chemical work in the iron company, and continued as such until the spring of 1878, after which he worked in the laboratory of the Sheffield scientific school as a post-graduate. In April, 1879, he became chemist of the Roane iron and steel company, and in 1881 was associated with Dr. George C. Hawes, in the manufacture of magnesium. Mr. Dewey was the inventor of the "Chemical Examinations of Building-Stones," for the Tenth Census report, a "Biographical Sketch of Dr. Hawes," for the Smithsonian report. He prepared a "Plan to Illustrate the Mineral Resources of the United States and their Utilization" at the World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exhibition of 1884-5 in New Orleans.

DEWEY, Melvil, librarian, b. in Adams Centre, Jefferson co., N. Y., 10 Dec., 1851. He was graduated at Amherst in 1874, and was acting librarian there from 1873 till 1876, when he removed to Boston and devoted himself to popular education through the simplifying and systematizing of libraries and library work, the introduction of the international or metric system of weights and measures, and the simplification of English spelling. He has published various catalogues, and edited the "Library Journal" from 1876 till 1881, "Library Notes," the "Metric Bulletin," "Metric Advocate," and "Spelling-Form Bulletin." He became manager of the Library of Columbia college in 1888, and professor of library economy and director of the Columbia college library school in 1887. He is the author of a "Classification and Subject-Index for Cataloguing and Arranging the Books and Periodicals of a Library" (Amherst, 1876); and "Decimal Classification and Relativ Index" (Boston, 1885).

DEWEY, Orville, theologian, b. in Sheffield, Mass., 28 March, 1794; d. there, 21 March, 1882. His ancestors were among the first settlers of Sheffield, and the Rev. Mr. Williams, on whose farm he was born, taught his father to read. He was educated by his own efforts, and from 1809 to 1814 attended the school of Mr. Williams, where he was taught by Rev. Mr. Williams. He returned to Sheffield, where he engaged in teaching, and afterward went to New York, becoming a clerk in a dry-goods house. He was graduated at Andover theological seminary in 1819, and for eight months was a tutor in a Latin school. His health was broken down by the strain of his studies, and he was not able to pursue the theological studies. He returned to Sheffield, where he became a tutor in the Latin school. It is literary and material interests. He became a regent of the state university in 1798, vice-chancellor in 1817, and chancellor in 1820. He published a map of New York (1804), and a treatise on the "Elements of Perspective" (Albany, 1813). Dr. T. Romeyn Beck published a "Eulogium" on his life and services (Albany, 1836).

DE WITT, Benjamin, scientist, b. in 1774; d. in New Brunswick, N. J., Nov. 1, 1844. He was a practicing physician in New York, and published a treatise on "Oxygen" (New York, 1797); "An Oration" (1806); and "Minerals in New York," in transactions of the American association of science.

DE WITT, Charles, member of the Continental congress, b. in 1728; d. in Kingston, N. Y., in September, 1778. He was a delegate from New York to the old congress during its sessions in Philadelphia, Princeton, and Annapolis in 1778, at Trenton, N. J., in 1781, and the first session in New York city in 1785.

DE WITT, John, clergyman, b. in Catskill, N. Y., in August, 1789; d. in New Brunswick, N. J., 11 Oct., 1831. He studied for a time at Union, but was graduated at Princeton in 1808, studied theology with Dr. Porter in Catskill, was licensed to preach in 1811, and held pastorates in the Reformed Dutch church at Lansingburgh, Mass., and Albany, N. Y., till 1822, when he became professor of ecclesiastical history in the theological seminary at New Brunswick, N. J. In 1825 Dr. De Witt assumed also the professorship of belles-lettres, commerce, and logic in Rutgers college. The three chairs he filled until his death. His publications were confined to occasional discourses.—His son, John, b. in Albany, N. Y., 19 Oct., 1821, was graduated at Rutgers in 1838, and at the New Brunswick seminary in 1842. He was ordained in the Reformed church and was pastor at Ridgeway, N. Y., in 1842–43, at Ghent in 1845–50, at Canajoharie in 1845–49, and at Millstone, N. J., from 1850 till 1863, when he became professor of sacred literature in the theological seminary at New Brunswick. He was a member of the Bible revision committee, and is the author of "The Sure Foundation and How to Build on it" (New York, 1860), and a new translation of the Psalms (1885).

DE WITT, Simeon, surveyor, b. in Ulster county, N. Y., Dec. 25, 1756; d. in Ithaca, N. Y., 3 Dec., 1844. He was graduated at Queen's (afterward Rutgers) college in 1775, being the only graduate in that year. He joined the army of Gen. Gates, was present at the surrender of Burgoyne, and from 1778 till 1790 was assistant topographer to the Continental army, and then chief of the topographical staff of Gen. Washington until the close of the war in 1783. In 1784 he became surveyor-general of the state of New York, in which post he remained until he died. He performed valuable services in locating lands and laying out roads, and was one of the chief promoters of the New York land office. Mr. De Witt was the depot secretary of state of that period. In 1796 De Witt was nominated surveyor-general of the United States, but declined. He was for many years a resident of Albany, and was active in advancing its literary and material interests. He became a regent of the state university in 1798, vice-chancellor in 1817, and chancellor in 1820. He published a map of New York (1804), and a treatise on the "Elements of Perspective" (Albany, 1813). Dr. T. Romeyn Beck published a "Eulogium" on his life and services (Albany, 1836).

DE WITT, Thomas, clergyman, b. in Kingston, N. Y., 13 Sept., 1701; d. in New York city, 15 May, 1874. He was graduated at Union in 1808, studied theology with the Rev. Drs. Froelich, of Schraelenburg, N. J., and Brodhead, of Rhinebeck, N. Y., and in the alphabetical seminary at New Brunswick, where he was graduated in 1819. The same year he was ordained pastor of the combined congregations of New Hackensack and Hopewell, Dutchess co., N. Y., where he remained until 1827, when he accepted a call to the Collegiate Dutch church of New York city, of which he was the senior clergyman from 1828 till his death. He was vice-president for many years of the New York historical society, and its president in 1872–4; also an active director of the Bible, Colonization, Tract, and Sunday-school societies, as well as the boards of his church. He published very little, even his sermons being generally unwritten. He was one of the last of the ministers of the Reformed Dutch church who could preach in the Dutch language.

DE WITT, William Badelife, clergyman, b. in Clinton, Dutchess co., N. Y., 25 Feb., 1782; d. in Harrisburg, Pa., 28 Dec., 1867. He was trained to mercantile life, but studied theology with Dr. Alexander Proudfit. Leaving his studies to volunteer in the war of 1812–5, he fought under Com. McDonough on Lake Champlain. After the war he completed his theological course with the Rev. Dr. John M. Mason, of New York city, and became, in 1818, pastor of the church in Harrisburg, over which he presided until his death. From 1834 till 1867 he filled the office of state librarian, and interested himself in the public-school system of the state.—His son, John, clergyman, b. in Harrisburg, Pa., 10 Oct., 1813, was graduated at Prince- ton in 1831, studied law, then theology, in Princeton seminary and the Union theological seminary in New York city, and was ordained, 9 June, 1865. From 1865 till 1889 he was pastor at Irvington, N. Y., then till 1876 of the Central Presbyterian church in New York city. He is long believed to have been indebted for the extraordinary classical names of Carriage, Pompey, Sempronius, etc., to various townships of the state. His supposed pedantry and folly afforded a fine theme for one of Drake and Halleck's "Crackers." But it is now known that the real author of the "Crackers" was the deputy-secretary of state of that period. In 1796 De Witt was nominated surveyor-general of the United States, but declined. He was for many years a resident of Albany, and was active in advancing Dexter, Henry, sculptor, b. in Nelson, Madison co., N. Y., 11 Oct., 1806; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 23 June, 1876. His father died when Henry was a child, and in 1817 he removed with his family to Pomfret, Conn., where he was brought up on a farm, and was afterward indentured to a blacksmith. After serving his apprenticeship he married, and began business for himself, continuing in it seven years. He excelled as a worker in metals, and often attributed his subsequent power of using the chisel to this training. In 1826 he moved to New York City, where he lived for some time, and endeavoring to become an artist, he went to Providence, R. I., where, though self-taught, he had some success as a portrait-painter. He removed in 1836 to Boston, and in the following year to Cambridge, where he passed the remainder of his life. His attention was turned to sculpture about 1840, and he afterward confined himself to that art. He may be named with Crawford, Powers, and Hart as a pioneer of American sculpture; but, unlike them, he never left this country, holding with Palmer that it was not necessary for American artists to go to Italy either for inspiration or for instruction, and that our artists who live abroad lose their claim to be called distinctively American. Mr. Dexter never saw a sculptor model in clay, nor chisel the marble, until he was 35 years of age. He has achieved special success in his portrait busts, of which he made nearly 200. His first marble bust was that of Mayor Samuel Eliot, of Boston. His "Annie Child," in Mount Auburn cemetery, is said to be the first marble statue executed in this country. He has modeled bas-reliefs of all the governors of the United States then in office, with the exception of the governors of California and Oregon, giving about a week to each, and traveling 17,000 miles. The collection, numbering thirty-one busts, was intended for the capital at Washington, but the civil war prevented the consummation of his plan. Other portrait busts by his hand are those of Charles Dickens, Longfellow, Agassiz, Henry Wilson, and Anson Burlingame. His statues include "The Backwoodsman," now at Wellesley college (1847); "The Cushing Children," for the site of the War of 1812 at Bunker Hill (1857); and "Nymph of the Ocean" (1870).

Dexter, Henry Martyn, clergyman, b. in Plympton, Mass., 13 Aug., 1821. He was graduated at Yale in 1840, at Andover theological seminary in 1844, and was called to be pastor of the Congregational church at Manchester, N. H., in the same year. In 1849 he removed to Boston, and remained in charge of what is now the Berkeley street Congregational church until 1867. From 1851 till 1866 he was editor of the "Congregationalist," and from 1859 till 1866 of the "Congregational Quarterly," the publication of which he began in connection with Drs. Clark and Vinton. In 1867 he resigned his pastorate to become editor-in-chief of the consolidated "Recorder" and "Congregationalist," which he still edits (1887). He has been a frequent contributor of historical essays to periodical literature. In 1886 he received the degree of D. D. from Iowa college, and in 1890 from Yale. From 1877 till 1880 he was lecturer on Congregationalism at Andover theological seminary. Among his published works are "The Voice of Reason," "The Verdict of Reason" (1858); "Street Thoughts" (1859); "Congregationalism: What it is, Whence it is, How it Works, Why it is better than any other Form of Church Government, and its Consequent Duties" (1865; 5th ed., 1879); "The Verdict of Reason upon the Future Punishment of those who Die Impenitent" (1865); "The Church Polity of the Pilgrims the Polity of the New Testament" (1870); "As to Roger Williams, and his 'Banishment' from the Massachusetts Colony" (1876; 2d ed., 1877); "The Congregationalism of the Three Hundred Years, as seen in its Literature, with Special Reference to Certain Recondite, Neglected, or Disputed Passages," with a Bibliographical Appendix (New York, 1880); "A Hand-book of Congregationalism" (Boston, 1880); "Roger Williams's Christenings make hot Christians; or a mixture of the old and the new" (Providence, exactly reprinted, and edited) (1881); "The True Story of John Smyth, the Se-Baptist, etc." (1881); and "Common Sense as to Woman Suffrage" (1885). The "Congregationalism of the Last 500 Years" is enriched with a bibliography containing 7,290 titles. He has also edited, for private reprint, Church's "Eastern Expeditions" and his "Entertaining Passages Relating to Philip's War," together with Morton's "Relation," from the first editions. He has prepared in manuscript "A Bibliography of the Church Struggle in England during the Sixteenth Century" with 210 pages. For many years he has been preparing a history of "Old Plymouth Colony," the first volume of which, devoted to the "Pre-history of the Colony, with the English and Dutch Life of the Plymouth Men," will appear next year. He retired from the office of revising the "American Ephemeris," 1755-1780, and devoted much time to historical studies. In the discussion between the mother country and her colonies that preceded the Revolution, Mr. Dexter took very strong ground, basing his views on the legislative precedents in which he was well versed. While not displaying the ardor of his father or his brother, he labored, nor, on some questions, perhaps, the firmness of Adams, he labored not less zealously than they, in company with such men as Bowdoin and Winthrop, to inform the people on the important questions then in debate, and to confute and expose the fallacies of the Opposition. But he remained a member of the constitutional party, and his friends pointed out the danger of the policy pursued by the British ministry, and sought to convince their fellow-citizens that all that was dear to them was at stake. He was a member of the governor's council before the Revolution, and for several years between 1765 and 1775 served on the more important committees of both the house and the council. In 1776-7, and subsequently, he was chosen one of the supreme executive council of the state. In his later years he retired from public service and devoted much time to religious investigations. These led him to reject the doctrines of Calvin, and to incline strongly toward the Arminian. At his death he left a legacy of $5,000 to Harvard for the encouragement of biblical criticism. He also bequeathed $40 to a clergyman, on condition that he deliver a funeral sermon in his memory without making any mention of his name, the discourse to be based on the text, "The things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal."—His son, Samuel, jurist, b. in Boston, 14 May, 1761; d. in Athol, Mass., 11 May, 1816, was graduated at Harvard in 1781, and, having studied law at Worcester, Mass., with Levi Lincoln, was admitted to the bar in 1784. After practising for some years in Worcester and Middlesex counties, he removed to Boston, which he made his home for the remainder of his life. He was a member of the Massachusetts house of representatives in 1788-90, served in the lower house at Washington in 1798-5, and was elected to the U.S. senate, in which body he sat from 2 Dec., 1799, until June, 1800, when he resigned, on being appointed secretary of war by President Adams. This office he held until 31 Dec., 1800, when he was named secretary of the treasury, which place he filled until the inauguration of President Jefferson. He then returned to the practice of the law, appearing every wintry day in important cases before the U.S. supreme court. He was a close reasoner and an able pleading chose to rely more on the strength of his arguments than on ad captandum appeal by the jury; yet he could be pathetic and impressive in addressing himself to the feelings and the moral sense. He began life a decided federalist, but gradually separated from the party, supporting President Jefferson's war policy, and in 1812 going with the republicans in advocating a contest with England. But he never considered himself a member of the latter organization, and, on being nominated as the republican candidate for governor of Massachusetts, at Washington in 1813, a few weeks before his death, he published an address to the electors, declaring that he differed radically with that party. His name was not withdrawn, however, and he was defeated by a majority for his opponent of 2,000 out of 47,000 votes. In 1815 he was offered a special embassy to Spain by President Madison, but declined it. In 1813 he received the degree of LL.D. from Harvard. He was the first president of the first society formed in Massachusetts for the promotion of temperance, in which question he took great interest. He died of a fever, in the prime of life, while visiting Athens, N.Y., to attend the wedding of his son. He was the author of the reply of the senate to the address of President Adams on the death of Washington, and published a Letter on Freemasonry: "Progress of Science," a poem (1790); and "Speeches and Political Papers," besides political pamphlets. His son, Franklin, lawyer, b. in Charlestown, Mass., 5 Nov., 1793; d. in Beverly, Mass., 14 Aug., 1857, was graduated at Harvard in 1812, and in 1837 received from that college the degree of LL.D. He studied for the bar, and soon attained a good position in his profession. He filled many public offices, and was elected to both branches of the state legislature. In 1836 he was a member of a select committee on the revised statutes. He served as U.S. district attorney for the eastern district, 1842-45, and was reappointed by President Taylor in 1849. His reputation for professional learning and logical acuteness was greatly increased by his able defence of the Knapps, who were tried for the murder of Capt. White, of Salem, in 1830, Daniel Webster being employed for the prosecution. The case was long and serious, and the result was a great public benefit. DEXTER, Simon Newton, manufacturer, b. in Providence, R. I., 11 May, 1785; d. in Whiteboro, N. Y., 18 Nov., 1852. He was a son of Andrew Dexter, the first manufacturer of cotton goods in the United States, and a nephew of Samuel Dexter, of Boston. He was elected to the U.S. house of representatives in 1788, and to the U.S. senate in 1797, and was appointed secretary of war by President John Adams. He matriculated at Brown university, but soon left that institution to engage in business in Boston. In 1815 he removed to Whiteboro, N.Y., and in 1817 built a section of the Erie canal. He died of a fever, in his 64th year. He was also largely interested in manufactures elsewhere in the state of New York and in Elgin, Ill. He served as a trustee of Hamilton college, and for several years supported a professorship, giving the college in all about $32,000. He was president of the Whitestown bank (1833-53), canal commissioner in 1840, and manager of the State lunatic asylum, from 1849 till 1859.
DE ZENG, Frederick Augustus, Baron, soldier. Born in Germany, he was in 1758 in Clyde, N. Y., 26 April, 1888. He received a military education, and at the age of eighteen became lieutenant of the guard in the service of the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel. He saw service in Moravia and Bohemia, and became the equal in the esteem of gentlemen of the character. He came to this country about the close of 1780 as captain of one of the Hessian regiments in the British service. He was honorably discharged from the German service in 1783, and in 1784 married an American lady and purchased an estate at Red Hook, N. Y. He was naturalized in 1789, and in 1792 commissioned major of a battalion of militia in Ulster county, N. Y., in which county he had become joint owner with Chancellor Livingston of a large tract of land. He was intimate with Gov. Clinton, interested like him in the opening of the interior water communications of the state, and personally surveyed in 1790-2 the entire country from Albany to the Genesee river. He was connected with Gen. Schuyler in the Western Land Navigation company, and in 1796 was one of three who experimented in the cutting of glass, the first in the state, which proved a financial success until 1815, when it closed, owing to failure of fuel in the neighborhood. In 1813 he suggested measures that resulted in the improvement of the navigation of Genesee river and its associated waters. In 1814-5 immediately became the Chemung canal. He resided at Kingston, Ulster co., and later at Bainbridge, Chenango co., N. Y., where he built and owned the bridge over the Susquehanna river.

DIELS, Joseph David, Canadian R. C. prelate, b. in Maskinongé, province of Quebec, 21 May, 1806; d. in Levis, 28 June, 1882. He was educated in the theological schools of Quebec, and ordained a priest in 1830, and was appointed vicar at Rivière du Loup the same year. He became pastor of St. Joseph de Levis in 1843, and first cure of Notre Dame de Levis in 1852. He was the founder of the town of Levis, and also founded in that place the church of Notre Dame, the Commercial and classical college, the convent of the Sisters of Charity, and St. Joseph's hospital. He was a prelate of the church, and was also connected with the Leo XIII. He was not less distinguished for his love of science than for his piety and benevolence.

DIAS, Bartholomew (de-ás), Portuguese navigator, b. about the middle of the 15th century; lost at sea, 29 May, 1500, while on his way from Brazil to India. In 1488 he was on an expedition to explore the western coast of Africa, and, without knowing it, was carried around the southern point of the continent and landed at the mouth of Great Fish river, where he discovered that he was on the eastern coast. While he doubled on his return in 1487 he called Cabo Tormentoso, a name which the king of Portugal changed into Cabo de Boa Esperança, or Cape of Good Hope. He subsequently sailed on another African expedition under Vasco de Gama, and was commanded on the 17th of September to receive the crown from Cabral discovered Brazil.

DIAS, Gonçalves Antônio, Brazilian poet, b. in Caxias, Brazil, 10 Aug., 1823; d. at sea in 1864. At an early age he studied law and philosophy at the University of Coimbra, Portugal. Returning to his native land and for his livelihood to teach. Among his writings are "Primeiros Cantos" (Rio de Janeiro, 1846); "Leonor de Mendonça," a drama (1847); "Segundos Cantos" (1848); "Últimos Cantos" and "Os Tymbivas," an epic (Leipsic, 1857); and "Dicionario da lingua Tupi," an Indian dialect (1858). Dias wrote many papers on historical subjects, especially on the migration of the Indian tribes, and also a good report entitled "Brazil e Oceania."

DIAS, Henrique, Brazilian soldier, b. in Pernambuco at the end of the 18th or beginning of the 17th century; d. in Recife, 31 Aug., 1661. He was of pure African blood, and received but scanty education. In 1638 the Portuguese army was suffering continuous defeats from the invading Dutch forces, who advanced to the conquest of the country, when a party of negroes, headed by Dias, appeared before Gen. Matias de Albuquerque, commanding the Portuguese, and offered to fight against the invaders. Albuquerque confirmed Dias as captain of his men, and on 18 Sept. of the same year Dias rendered great service, guiding an expedition of 200 Portuguese to cut the lines of 1,000 Dutch troops that were coming to the relief of Iguarassí. The battle was bloody, and the negro captain fought bravely and was wounded. Till 1635 Dias took part in all the engagements, but on 9 July of that year he was taken prisoner at the fort of Arruén, no Bonete, after a three months' siege and a heroic defence. The Dutch, mistaking the negro for a man of no importance, left him at liberty, and, after hiding for some time in the woods, Dias rejoined the Portuguese army and, he was again appointed during the trial of the new chief of the brother of Jesus. On 9 July he distinguished himself again in a battle under the orders of Felippe Camarão. On 17 and 18 Feb., 1657, the negro captain, at the head of a company of eighty of his race, took again a prominent part in the battle of Porto Calvo. He was wounded in the left hand during the fight, and had it immediately amputated so as to return to the fight without loss of time. On recommendation of the commander-in-chief, he was rewarded by the king of Spain and Portugal with knighthood and the cross of the order of Christ, and was also appointed chief commander of all the colored troops. From 1657 till 1665 Dias distinguished himself as a guerilla chief in the defence of San Salvador da Bahia, and in the repulse of the forces of Prince Maurice of Nassau. In 1645 he deserted with his Sarammóco, and from Bahia to join the forces that had risen against Spanish rule. He passed through the districts of Sergipe and São Francisco, and in Alagoas roused the inhabitants to revolt, joining afterward the forces of Cardoso and Fernández Vieira, who were at the head of the insurrection in the province of São Paulo. Dias took part in numerous engagements, and, while the other generals were absent for the conquest of Itamaracá, he commanded for some time the forces besieging Recife, and was again victorious in the two battles of Guararapes; in fact, excepting the capitulation of Aracaju to the Maranhão, he was never defeated in twenty-one years of warfare. Yet, while the Portuguese government, after the expulsion of the Dutch invaders and the independents from Spain, rewarded liberally all the chieftains of the Sarammóco, Dias was forgotten, and died in poverty. But his name was given to a regiment, which has always been commanded by a man of the negro race.

Dias Vieira, João Pedro, Brazilian statesman, b. in Guimarães, 30 March, 1898; d. 30 Oct., 1873. He studied law at Salvador, and in 1899 was admitted to the bar at São Paulo. In 1842 he was appointed district attorney for the capital of his province; but, as he soon afterward entered politics in the liberal party, at that time in the opposition, he had to resign this office. In 1846, under a change of ministers, he was appointed attorney for the city of Itapicuru-Mirim, and elected soon afterward a member of the provincial assembly of Maranhão, where he distinguished himself by his moderation and as an orator, and exercised great influence in the government of the province. In 1855 he was appointed attorney-general of the provincial treasury, and, two years later, general director of public lands of the province, and occupied, at the same time, the chairs of philosophy, rhetoric, and geography in the seminary of the bishopric. He was appointed governor of the province of Amazonas in 1856, and died this year 4 Jan. 1873, when he was elected deputy to the Chamber of representatives, and became in 1890 deputy-general for his province. From 1855 he interested himself in steam navigation on the rivers, and in the construction of the protection of the national government for the year 1855; he was appointed minister of the navy, and on 15 March minister for foreign affairs. A new ministry was formed on 21 Aug., but only a few days passed before Dias Vieira was again called to take charge of the foreign affairs. The country was involved in a foreign war. The French and Spanish attack was so great, that within nine months, the nation, which at the beginning of the war had not a single ship, found itself in the possession of a powerful fleet and a well-disciplined army. Dias Vieira was rewarded with the Order of the Bailarín de Jesus.

D. A. D pinea, Spanish soldier, b. in Seville, Spain, early in the 16th century; d. in Cuzco about 1586. He sought his fortune in the New World, became secretary of the Order of the Knights of St. James of the Indian expedition, and was one of the conquerors of Cuzco, where he settled. He was distinguished for his gigantic strength, and is said to have killed the Indian prisoners by suffocating them with the order of the conqueror. Charles V. issued a decree forbidding such acts. D. also suffocated one of the most famous Indian wrestlers in a trial of strength, and on one occasion is said to have carried his war-horse on his shoulders. In 1583 he was one of the principal accomplices of Francisco Giron against Pizarro's successor. After the battle of Pucara, D. surrendered in the royal camp, and was pardoned by the judges of the Audiencia, as they were unaware that Giron had already sought safety in flight, fearing that he would be delivered to the royal forces. He was afterwards again in Cuzco, but, as he continued his rebellious attempts, he was made a prisoner by the mayor, Bautista Muñoz, and, together with several other conspirators, was executed by the garrote, by order of the viceroy, Marquis de Cañete, and his estate was confiscated. Several books and poems have been written about the adventures of Alonso D. A. D.

D. A. D. Antonio, explorer, b. at the close of the 17th century. He was the first to explore the province of Minas in Brazil. He was commander of a party of explorers called Azevér, composed of the mestizos of São Paulo, and examined that part of the country known as Villa Rica, and discovered a great quantity of gold. Thus was founded the city of Villa Rica, or, as it is sometimes called, Ourro Preto (dark-colored gold).

D. A. D. Lewis. Juan Bernardo (de-ath-da-ru-gó), Spanish R. c. bishop, b. in Seville at the close of the 15th century; d. in 1566. He was professor in Salamanca of belles-lettres and the dead languages. He was present at the council of Trent and became a canon at the church of Itapicuera-Mirim, and elected soon afterward a member of the provincial assembly of Maranhão, where he distinguished himself by his moderation and as an orator, and exercised great influence in the government of the province. In 1852 he was appointed attorney-general of the provincial treasury, and, two years later, general director of public lands of the province, and occupied, at the same time, the chairs of philosophy, rhetoric, and geography in the seminary of the bishopric. He was appointed governor of the province of Amazonas in 1854, and died this year 4 Jan. 1873, when he was elected deputy to the Chamber of representatives, and became in 1890 deputy-general for his province. From 1855 he interested himself in steam navigation on the rivers, and in the construction of the protection of the national government for the year 1855; he was appointed minister of the navy, and on 15 March minister for foreign affairs. A new ministry was formed on 21 Aug., but only a few days passed before Dias Vieira was again called to take charge of the foreign affairs. The country was involved in a foreign war. The French and Spanish attack was so great, that within nine months, the nation, which at the beginning of the war had not a single beginning of 1540 he marched with Gonzalo Pizarro in his famous expedition for the conquest of the country of the Canelos, visited formerly by Díaz, and for the exploration of the country east of the Andes. Díaz rendered many services to Pizarro in this unfortunate expedition by his practical knowledge of the Indian countries, as well as by his endurance of fatigue and hardships. Díaz, with only a handful of followers, went in search of the expedition of Francisco Orellana, who, after the provisions had been sent down the river Napo in search of supplies in the beginning of 1541, but finding only a wild herd, had descended the Amazon, which he discovered to its mouth. Seeing the fruitlessness of his errand, Díaz returned in search of Pizarro, being continually harassed by the Indians, and was the principal means of extricating the half-starved expedition from the wilderness and bringing it, although with heavy losses, to Peru. In 1544, when Gonzalo Pizarro rose in rebellion against Nuñez de Vela, Díaz de Pineda, at that time in Lima, offered his services to the viceroy of Peru and Colón to send him an expedition to the interior. The viceroy sent him to Jauja at the head of a company of infantry and a force of cavalry, with his nephew, Vela Nuñez, the object being to prevent the junction of a force from Huamancaya under command of Pedro Puelles, with the Andes. Díaz, however, scarcely had Pineda's forces entered the Andes mountains when he (being Puelles's son-in-law) pretended that he was forced by his officers to pronounce for Pizarro, and joined Puelles, young Vela Nuñez barely aware of what was happening. Díaz de Pineda in 1545, with Geronimo de Villegas, to Trujillo and Piura to recruit soldiers. Meanwhile the viceroy had been set at liberty by one of the judges, and, landing at Tumbes, gathered forces to march against Díaz Pineda, at that time in Piura, who had surrendered and killed in Bracamora Capt. Heredia, of the government forces. Díaz retreated from Piura, but surprised a part of the advancing forces at Chachayoyas and defeated them. On receipt of this news, the viceroy advanced with the remainder of his forces upon Díaz, and joined Puelles, young Vela Nuñez barely aware of what was happening. Seeing his troops dispersed, Diaz sought refuge with Hernando de Alvarado, where he perished, being forced by hunger to eat poisonous plants. Garci Lasso de la Vega, in his history of the conquest, relates that the two officers, together with Geronimo Villegas, were killed by Indians.

DÍAZ DE SOLIS, Juan, Spanish navigator, b. in Lebrija, Spain, in 1471; d. in South America in 1516 (or, according to Barcia and Sala, in 1515). In 1506 he sailed from Cadiz in command of a caravel, together with Vicente Yañez Pinzon, and, following the course taken by Columbus from the island of Guanajuato to discover new countries on the American continent, they entered the Gulf of California, discovered the coast of Yuatan and the bay of Campeche, which they called Gulf of the Natives, and saw the mark on the range of Yucatan. In 1507 they returned to Spain, and Diaz was appointed by the king, together with Amerigo Vespucci and Colasso, member of a council of pilots, presided over by the king himself, at which it was resolved to continue the exploration of the Atlantic coast of South America and Diaz was appointed commander, with the title of royal pilot. He left Seville in 1508 with two caravels, one commanded by Yañez Pinzon, and from the Cape Verde islands they made land at Cape St. Augustin and sailed southward as far as 40° S., recognizing the coast and landing at several points, taking possession in the name of the king of Spain, and erecting crosses (1509). Having quarreled with Pinzon, he returned the same year to Spain. The king considered Diaz guilty, and sent him to prison. But afterward, when his services were recognized, he was awarded 34,000 maravedis indemnity, and several distinctions, and at the death of Vespucci received the title of chief pilot of the kingdom. He was considered the most expert mariner of that time. In 1515 he was again sent on an expedition to search for the mouth of the Kbury, who by order of the vice-regal authority in South America, and on 8 Oct. of that year sailed from Lepe, Spain, with two ships. In this voyage he discovered many new points of the coast, entered Rio de Janeiro, and, sailing southward, discovered an island which he called La Plata; then taking a southwest course, he discovered land, and in 27° S., a bay, which he called Bahia de los Perdidos, passed Cape Corrientes, and visited the island of San Sebastian, which he called Lobos. He entered the port of Nuestra Señora de la Candelaria, 30° S., and again took possession of the country in the name of the king. Martinez de Alvarado was anchored in a broad river, which, believing it to be an arm of the ocean, he called "Sweet Sea," but, finding out that it was a river, called it Solis, which to-day is the river Plate. With one of his ships he ascended the river, and, seeing Indians on the shore, landed and captured some of the inhabitants and carried them to Spain as a present to the king. But he fell into an ambush, and, together with the whole boat crew, was killed in sight of his ship, roasted, and eaten. Diaz Solis was the last to die on the way to the king designed a marine chart of the coast of America (1506), and afterward examined all the charts designed by other mariners.
rived in 1555 at Asuncion, where they were welcomed by Irala, who sent them to conquer and settle the territory of Guayra, with the few remaining partisans of Aure. Diaz resisted heroically, and the city of Guayra was captured by the natives in 1560, and, after several years of continuous struggles, was appointed governor of that city. In 1570 Alonso Riguemel, a nephew of Cabeza de Vaca, was appointed to replace Diaz in his command; but his credentials were disregarded, his fate unknown, and Riguemel himself was put in chains. Soon after this, Diaz was commissioned to take Riguemel and Felpe de Caeceres to Spain. They sailed from Asuncion in 1573. Unfavorable weather forced their ship to enter the Brazilian port of San Vicente, and when Diaz was ready to proceed on his voyage he had to go to the assistance of the new governor, Ortiz de Zarate, against the Charrua Indians. During the term of office of this governor and of his successor Garay, Diaz made new and successful expeditions, which gave him the name of "Invisible Captain." He founded in 1576, Villa del Espiritu Santo, and in 1580 of Santiago de Jerez, or Nueva Vizcaya.

DIAZ, Miguel, Spanish adventurer, b. in Aragon after the middle of the 15th century. He was in the service of Bartholomew Columbus, brother of his order. His most noted work is "Lettres de Missionibus per Indian Occidentalem ab Jesuitis." He was rector of the Jesuit colleges of Mexico and Guadalajara, went to Rome twice, in 1577 and 1595, and founded new colleges at Puebla, Oaxaca, Michoacan, Guadalajara, and Antequera. He also began the missionary work among the Indians of northern New Spain, now a part of the United States.

DIAZ, Porfirio, president of Mexico, b. in Oaxaca, 15 Sept., 1830. He received his education in the institute of his native city, and studied law. In 1847, during the American invasion, he joined the military guards, and, being second lieutenant, and after the Guadalupite Hidalgo treaty, he became lieutenant, and studied military science under Commandant Urrea until 1852, when he was made captain of artillery. After the triumph of the party that called Santa Anna to the dictatorship, Diaz, in a fit of discouragement, left the army, and gave his attention to law. At the outbreak of the revolution, provoked by the plan of Ayutla in 1854, he commanded a battalion, and after the flight of Santa Anna, on 9 Aug., 1855, was appointed political and military chief of the district of Yxilan, in Oaxaca. After Comonfort had been re-elected president in 1857, but had gone over to the reactionary party, and was forced, 21 Jan., 1858, to surrender the executive power to Benito Juarez, Diaz cast his lot with the liberal party, against the reactionary church party, which, under Mira-over more than double his forces. In the battle of La Carbonera he took 500 Austrian prisoners. After the French army had abandoned Mexico, in February, 1867, Díaz rapidly augmented his forces, and, together with the forces of Gens. Altórrre and Alvarez, who joined him, besieged Puebla, commanded, and after the capture of the city, the city was captured, 2 April, 1867. Díaz immediately marched against the army of Marquez, who had attempted to relieve Puebla, defeating him at San Lorenzo, and, after his retreat to the city of Mexico, laid siege to that city, which surrendered on 21 June, 1867. Some acts of cruelty were attributed to Diaz during this campaign. In the French chambers, and especially in the senate, grave charges were brought against him for his unmerciful conduct toward those who fell into his power, and crimes were mentioned by Marshal Forey and several senators in the session of March, 1866. Count Keratry, in his "Elevación y Caida de Maximiliano," speaks of some facts that he witnessed himself relating to the cruelty of Gen. Díaz during the war, and especially during the sieges of Puebla and Mexico. After the final reconquest of the republic, Díaz retired to his ranch, "La Noria," in Oaxaca. In the elections of October, 1867, he was an unsuccessful candidate against Juárez for the presidency of the republic, and from that time he continually conspired against the government. In 1870-1, Diaz having failed the revolution, he had plotted against Juárez, fled, in company with Gen. Galván, one disguised as a valet and the other as a clergyman, to Sierra de Alica, where Diaz intended to win over to his cause the celebrated bandit, Losada, called the "Tiger of Alica," but, as Losada received him coldly, Diaz was quickly put to rest by Losada in the way of Mazatlán. After the bloody pronunciamento at La Ciudadela in favor of Diaz, having asked an amnesty of Juárez, he was allowed to return to Mexico on condition that he should present himself in that capital as a political prisoner. Instead of keeping his word, Diaz went to Matamoros to conspire against the government. Juárez ordered his arrest, but, on learning of this order, he hurriedly presented himself to the local authority to assure the government of his fidelity and to decline the candidacy for president. Juárez, as a reward of Diaz's conduct, bestowed his influence to have him appointed deputy, but he only remained in congress a short time. Protected by the privileges of a deputy, he joined the revolution, proclaiming the plan called "La Noria." In this revolt he raised army, Garcia de la Cadena, Huerta, Toledo, Paz, and several others. The agitators having been defeated at Ovejá, Diaz crossed the river Bravo, and fled for shelter to Brownsville, Texas, where he remained hidden until the sudden death of Juárez in 1872. When under Lerdo, Juárez's successor, amnesty was decreed, Diaz returned to his country, and remained at the estate of La Candelaria for some time. At the general elections in the same year Diaz was elected a deputy to the congress of the union, but joined the new revolution. In 1876 he adopted and proclaimed the plan of free suffrage as a revolt against Gen. Diaz, and advocating free suffrage, the abolition of internal revenue and excise laws, the independence of the federal district, and theeligibility of the president to succeed himself. He won over the military commander of Matamoros, Toledo, and with the garrison he made the attempt to deliver himself by way of Tampico, when he was pursued. Diaz was defeated at Ixmole, and escaped to New Orleans, where he remained until called by his partisans to Oaxaca, the centre of the revolution against Lerdo's government.

On the voyage to Vera Cruz, while the steamer was at anchor off one of the towns on the coast, thinking that his presence had been discovered, and that he would be arrested by government officials, he threw himself into the sea with the intention of swimming ashore, but was picked up by a coast boat and taken to the shore. In the meantime he had reached the harbor of Vera Cruz he disguised himself as a coal-heaver, and, with the assistance of the purser, was put on shore. On his arrival at Oaxaca he was acknowledged by the chiefs who favored his cause, and advanced upon Puebla at the head of 7,000 men. After the bloody battles of Epapalán, El Jazmín, and Tecoco, he occupied the capital of the republic five days after Lerdo's flight to the United States. When Lerdo and some of his ministers, among whom were Gen. Escobedo and Romero Rubio, abandoned the country, Jose M. Iglesias, then president of the court of justice, declared himself, in accordance with the constitution of 1857, president of the republic pro tem., which act was supported by the friends of law and order; but immediately afterward Gen. Diaz marched from Puebla to Mexico City, to the desert of the interior, with the purpose of attacking the troops supporting Iglesias. A conference was held between Gen. Diaz and Iglesias at the estate of La Capilla, but they could not agree. Gen. Diaz said he had no alternative but revolution; whereas upon Iglesias assumed the leadership that, if he had obtained dominion over the republic by military force, he would be a "fortunate soldier, but never a constitutional president." Such was the situation at the beginning of 1877; but the troops who were still faithful to the cause of Iglesias were driven back to Puebla. The military prestige of Diaz, the superior force at his command, and the desire to seek an early solution to the existing difficulties, were powerful motives for the recognition of the "plan of Tuxtepec" by many as the only practicable remedy. For a short period Mexico had four presidents at once: Lerdo, Iglesias, Mendez, and Diaz. Gen. Mendez was temporarily intrusted with the management of the government's affairs during Gen. Diaz's absence on his military expedition, and on the following day the elections took place for deputies to the congress of the union, thus president of the republic, and for magistrates of the supreme court of justice. Gen. Diaz was elected president. Congress assembled on 1 April, and on 5 May, 1877, Diaz took the oath of office, and was duly inaugurated as chief magistrate of the nation on 30 Nov., 1880. In June occurred the difficulties with the United States respecting American troops on the frontier, but in an interview at Piedras Negras, in July, between Gen. Ord and Treviño, these difficulties were amicably settled. The government of Gen. Diaz by the month of August had been officially recognized by those of Germany, Guatemala, San Salvador, and Italy; but not until March, 1878, was it finally recognized by the United States. In 1876-9 there were revolts in different parts of the country, which Diaz, with his experiment of 1875, had been able to head. It was his project to keep the promises made in his programme of Tuxtepec, his partisans in the press, and some of the most prominent men of the revolution, urged him to its fulfilment, saying that the only thing gained by eleven years of bloody struggle was the obtaining the presidency. Diaz, feeling that he was being pressed by his party, declared through "El Diario Oficial" that "the programme of Tuxtepec was nothing else but a heap of moral absurdities.
and material impossibilities, and that in consequence he was not able to fulfill the promises there made to the nation." The press that before supported Díaz now began to oppose him, and he found himself in the best position he could without the support of his own party, despised by the parties of Iglesias and Lerdo, and surrounded by an atmosphere of revolution and hatred. He thereupon organized a party composed of the imperialist and reactionary elements, and, in fact, of everybody, for he could not put it to himself. By war against his own party, subdued the revolution, exiled the editor of "La Colonia Española" and many journalists, imprisoned others, while at the same time he tried by all means to win over the army. In the night of 24 June, 1879, Teran, governor of Vera Cruz, executed nine citizens without any trial whatever. This execution is known by the name of "The Hecatomb of Vera Cruz," and it is charged that it took place by order of Díaz, but no such order has ever been produced. Similar acts were committed in other states, such as the execution, with all the form of a public trial, of V. C. and of Colon, and the imprisonment of Gen. Cortina. Gen. Negrete, Martinez, and others concealed themselves in order to avoid persecution. An editor of "El Comite" published an accusation in which 14 charges, including all sorts of cruel and robber, were attributed to Díaz; the accuser was imprisoned, denied intercourse with anybody, and was put out of the country in haste in July, 1879. As at the expiration of his presidential term, 30 Nov., 1880, Díaz could not be re-elected, he abandoned his powers to his successors, Gen. Gonzalez, while he himself took charge of one of the departments of the government, and was also elected chief justice of the Federal supreme court, but never took his seat. About the same time he was elected governor of Oaxaca, and retired from his other offices. Before the expiration of his term as governor he obtained leave of absence from the legislature, and, leaving the state in the hands of the lieutenant-governor, returned to the city of Mexico to attend to his coming contest for a second presidential term. During this period he had sent to Washington, where he had been well received. On 30 Nov., 1884, at the expiration of Gonzalez's term, Díaz was a second time inaugurated as president of the Mexican republic. During his first term concessions for building various railroad had been granted him to American corporations, but no work on them had been begun till the beginning of Gonzalez's administration. The subsidies that had been granted had been paid regularly, but on Díaz's second inauguration he found the treasury absolutely empty. Besides this, about three quarters of the customs revenues had been pledged by his predecessor. The first official act of Díaz was to repudiate these pledges, without interfering with the railroad subsidies, which, however, he was obliged to stop in June, 1885. The question of settling the public debt now arose anew. In the "Plan of Tuxtepec" a general repudiation of the sums due to England had been advised by Diaz, but this was afterward rejected as impolitic, and during the administration of Gonzalez a proposition was made to appropriate a vast sum of money for the payment of the English debt alone. The apprehension that Gonzalez would appropriate a large part of this sum caused public demonstrations of opposition by students and journalists. After the beginning of Díaz's second term a plan for the settlement of the whole debt was made by congress, and is now (1887) in process of execution. In 1886 several important revolts broke out in different parts of the country, but they were immediately suppressed. According to a law enacted by instigation of Díaz, 17 May, all rebels falling into the hands of the government were immediately executed as highwaymen. This law caused the death of many revolutionary chiefs, among them Gen. Garcia de la Cadena and Col. Lizalde. Gen. Negrete was imprisoned in Santiago Tlatelolco. The question raised by the arrest of Mr. Cutting Havens, that it was a Frenchman in the United States and Mexico. Secretary of State Bayard made an official demand for the immediate and unconditional release of Cutting, who had been arrested for publishing a libel in a newspaper that was issued in El Paso, Tex., but circulated also in Mexico. The trial continued, and Cutting was duly convicted and sentenced. Afterward the superior court reduced his sentence, and gave him credit for the time during which he had already been imprisoned, so that he was released. Gov. Ireland, of Texas, also complained that Arreuzes, a citizen of the United States, and he was ordered to be expelled from the United States, and the government of Mexico, including the munitions of war, together with the emperor himself and Gen. Miramón and Mejía. This letter caused a great sensation; but Gen. Leonardo Marquez declared, in "El Autonomista," that the affair was a trick of the Mexican republic. The proposal to deliver up Oaxaca, under condition that he be allowed to depart for the United States. In the latter part of 1886 a movement was set on foot to abolish the article of the constitution that forbids a president to be his own successor, with the intention of electing Gen. Diaz for a third term. Under the administration of Diaz manufactures have increased, the resources of the country have been developed, commerce has multiplied, education has been advanced, the revenues have been increased, and the public debt has been paid. The railroads and telegraphs are extending. While it has been far from perfect, there has been no public scandal in it, and it has been as clean as the circumstances of his surroundings have allowed.
DIÁZ, Sebastian, clergyman, b. in Santiago, Chili, in 1740; d. there in 1812. He was a Dominican, versed in theology and church history, and master of the principal ancient and modern languages. He assisted in founding the convent of Our Lady of Bethlehem, Santiago, and became its prior in 1781. He was again elected in 1784, and finished the buildings that his predecessor had not been able to complete. He died in 1812. He wrote:
"Noticia general de las cosas del Mundo"; "Tra-tado contra la falsa Piedad"; "Manual Dogmático"; "Vida del Padre Manuel Acuña"; and "Vida de Sor María de la Purificación Valdes."

DIBBLE, Sheldon, missionary, b. in Skaneatees, N. Y., 26 Jan., 1800; d. in the Hawaiian lawaiian islands, 22 Jan., 1845. He was graduated at Hamilton college in 1827, and at Auburn theologiical seminary in 1829; was ordained at Utica, N. Y., 6 Oct., 1830, and sailed from New Bedford for Honolulu, 28 Dec., 1830, arriving on 9 June, 1831, with the fourth company of missionaries to the Hawaiian islands. He was stationed at Hilo until 1836; but, his health not being good, he was assigned to the seminary at Lahainaluna, on the island of Maui. Here his wife, Maria M. Tomlinson, dau. of Troy N. Y., b. 12 May, 1812, was married. On 20 Nov. of that year Mr. Dibble sailed for the United States, where he made an extended tour, delivering lectures upon the islands and the missionary work. An abstract of these was published under the title "Hawaiian History" (New York, 1839). He married Antoinette Tomlinson, dau. of Mal-lus, N. Y., and returned with her to his station, sailing from New York, 9 Oct., 1839. Mr. Dibble was among the foremost of the mission educators.
He translated a part of the Old Testament, prepared eight text-books on grammar, natural history, and scriptural history, in the Hawaiian language, and wrote a "History of the Sandwich Islands Mission" (New York, 1839), and a "History of the Sandwich Islands" (Lahainaluna, 1848), which have pervious value as authentic history.

DIBRELL, George Gibbs, soldier, b. in White county, Tenn., 12 Apr., 1832. His commonschool education was supplemented by one term at East Tennessee university. He was a farmer and merchant, and was elected a member of the State constitutional convention of Tennessee, on the union ticket, in February, 1861, and in July of the same year was elected to the legislature of Tennessee in August. Entering the Confederate army as a private, he was elected lieutenant-colonel, and was promoted colonel and brigadier-general of cavalry in 1864. He was detailed to escort the executive officers and treasure of the Confederate government after the evacuation of Richmond, and took charge of the archives at Greensboro, N.
C., after the surrender of Lee's army. He was member of the constitutional convention of Tennessee in 1870, and was twice elected a representative from that state in congress, serving from 5 March, 1873, till 3 March, 1874.

DICK, James T., artist, b. in New York city in 1834; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 10 Jan., 1868. He was the son of A. L. Dick, whose engraving of "The Last Supper" was regarded as a superior work of art. At the age of fourteen his son gained prizes awarded by the Art Almanach against Pizarro's attack, and was present at the triumph of Abancay, 12 July, 1837, the advance with the army, and the retreat to Cuzco in November, in the unfortunate battle of Salinas, 28 April, 1838. Diaz was in command of the escort with the royal standard, and, after the defeat of Almagro's forces, Ruy Diaz was overtaken in his flight by Pizarro's soldiers, and killed. travelling through Canada, the father and mother died, leaving eleven children. The eldest, a sister, determined to care for the other siblings and sister together. They finished their journey, and settled in Lanark county, Canada West. Mr. Dick's studies were pursued under grave disadvantages, but he succeeded and was graduated at Hamilton college, Clinton, N.Y., in 1841. He devoted himself to teaching the public school and missionary work for several years, and in 1854 established the "Gospel Tribune," in Toronto, C. W. In 1856 he invented a newspaper mailing-machine, the capacity of which, under successive improvements, was increased to 20,000 labor in a day of ten hours, pasted and attached by one operator to wrappers or papers. This invention is now in universal use.

DICK, Samuel, b. in New Jersey; d. there in November, 1812. He received a classical education, studied medicine, and practised his profession. He was a delegate from New Jersey in the Continental congress in 1783-4.

DICKENS, Augustus N., English journalist, b. in Landport, near Portsmouth, England, in 1828; d. in Chicago, Ill., 4 Oct., 1890. He was a brother of Charles Dickens, the novelist, and the original "Boz" pen name was given to him by his family. He was for some time a correspondent of the London "News." Emigrating to the United States, he purchased land at Amboy, on the Illinois Central railway, and engaged in mercantile pursuits, but failed. Subsequently he removed to Chicago with his family and became a corresponding clerk in the land-office of the Illinois Central railway, a place which he held till his death.

DICKERSON, James Stokes, clergyman, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 6 July, 1825; d. in Chicago, Ill., 5 Dec., 1888. He was graduated at Madison University in 1848, and in 1850 became associated with Dr. Martin B. Anderson in the publication of the New York "Recorder." After several years spent in this relation and in the service of the American Baptist publication society, he became proprietor and editor of the Philadelphia "Christian Chronicle." While thus engaged he began preaching, and in March, 1861, accepted the pastorate of the 2d Baptist church in Wilmington, Del. He subsequently served as pastor in Pittsburg, Pa., and in Boston, Mass., till failing health obliged him to return to the church which had patronized him in 1863 to 1866. In Chicago, he became joint proprietor and editor of the "Standard," a Baptist weekly paper. He received the honorary degree of D. D.

DICKERSON, Mahlon, statesman, b. in Hanover, N. J., 17 April, 1770; d. in Suckasunn, Morris co., N. J., 5 Oct., 1833. He was graduated at Princeton in 1790, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1793, and practised with success in Philadelphia. In 1805-8 he was quarter-master-general of Pennsylvania, and in 1808-10 recorder of the city court of Philadelphia. He returned to New Jersey, became judge of the supreme court and chancellor, and was elected a member of the legislature in 1814. In 1815 he was elected governor of New Jersey, and at the close of his term was sent to the U. S. senate. He was repeatedly re-elected on the bench of the U. S. district court for the district of New Jersey, and was a delegate to the State constitutional convention in 1844. In 1846-8 he was president of the American institute. He was largely interested in the mining and manufacture of iron in Morris county, and, although a state rights democrat, he voted for the protective tariff in Congress. He published "Speeches in Congress, 1826-46."—His brother, Philoemon, b. in Morris county, N. J., in 1788; d. in Paterson, N. J., 10 Dec., 1863. received a liberal education, studied law, and practised in Paterson. He served a term in congress in 1833-5, and was re-elected, but re-signed in 1836 to accept the governorship of New Jersey. In 1838 he was again elected to congress; but his election, as well as that of the other representatives from New Jersey except one, was contested, and he did not take his seat till 10 March, 1840, serving till the following March. He was afterward judge of the United States district court in New Jersey.

DICKERSON, William Fisher, A. M. E. bishop, b. in Woodbury, N. J., 18 Jan., 1844; d. in Columbia, S. C., in December, 1884. He was graduated at Lincoln university in 1870, and in 1876 appointed to represent his church at the general conference of the African Methodist Episcopal denomination. In 1880 he was elected thirteenth bishop, and given charge of the work in South Carolina and Georgia. He founded Allen university, Columbia, S. C., in 1880, of which he was president for four years. In 1881 he was a delegate to the ocumenical council in London, and travelled through France and Switzerland. He received the degree of D. D. from Wilberforce university in 1878.

DIECEY, Ebenezer, clergyman, b. near Oxford, Pa., 12 March, 1772; d. in Oxford, Pa., 31 May, 1831. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1792, was settled over the churches of Oxford in 1792, and became pastor of the Oxford church till his death. In 1822, with Dr. George Junkin and most of the associate Reformed clergy and their churches, he entered the Presbyterian connection. Princeton gave him the degree of D. D. in 1823. He published a "Tract to Parents," a pamphlet entitled "Plea for Christian Communion," and wrote for the "Christian Advocate" a series of letters on "Travels in Europe for Health in 1890" that were widely read.—His son, John Miller, b. in Oxford, Pa., 15 Dec., 1806; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 21 March, 1878, was graduated at Dickinson college in 1824, and at Princeton theological seminary in 1827. In 1828 he was employed in missionary labor in northeastern Pennsylvania, and the following year in Florida and southern Georgia. In 1830 he was a first pastor at Newcastle, Del., and after his father's death assumed charge of the church at Oxford, Pa., and that of Upper West Nottingham. He conducted the Oxford female seminary for fifteen years in addition to his pastoral duties. In 1836 he resigned his pastorate. He took the principal part in establishing the Ashmun institute (afterward Lincoln university) at Oxford, and was president of the board of trustees from 1854 till his death. He was also a DICKEY, John McElroy, clergyman, b. in York district, S. C., 16 Dec., 1789; d. near New Washington, Pa., 24 Oct., 1876. He removed with his parents to Livingston county, Ky., in 1803, and, with a view to becoming a minister, studied the classics with his cousin, a clergyman, in the neighborhood, and afterward at Hardin Creek, where he was taken into the family of a person whose name is McElroy. He went to college, came out as a graduate, and taught school. He was licensed to preach in August, 1814, and removed to the territory of Indiana, being the third Presbyterian minister that had settled there. His church was at the forks of White river, near what is now Washington, Daviess co. In the following spring he went for his wife and house- hold goods, and in 1819 removed to the vicinity of Lexington, Scott co., to take charge of Pisgah and Lexington churches, the latter of which he was pastor till 1829, and of the former till within two years of his death. He went on missionary tours, organized many new churches in Indiana, and his connection with the beginnings of the Presbyterian church in that territory caused him to be widely known in his denomination. He published a history of the former Presbyterian church in Indiana (1888), and was preparing a continuation of it at the time of his death.

DICKEY, Robert Barry, Canadian jurist, b. in Amherst, Nova Scotia, 10 Nov., 1811. He studied law with Judge Stewart, of the vice-admiralty court, and was admitted to the bar in 1834. He was a judge and registrar of the probate court for many years, was a director of the Nova Scotia Electric Telegraph company, and was consul agent for the United States at Amherst, N. S., from 1836-64. He was a member of the Nova Scotia government to Great Britain on the subject of the Intercolonial railway in 1858, and to the Quebec union conference in 1884, and a member of the legislative council of Nova Scotia in 1858-67, when he was called to the Dominion senate.

DICKEY, Stephen Milton, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., near Paris, Ky., 12 Nov., 1812; d. in Atlantic City, N. J., 22 July, 1885. He was educated at Richmond college and the University of Virginia, and became pastor of the Baptist church in Charlottesville. He subsequently spent several years in promoting Sunday-school and colportage work, and then became pastor of the Leigh street Baptist church in Richmond, Va. He was associated with the Rev. Dr. Jeter as joint owner and editor of the "Religious Herald," and since the death of Dr. Jeter has been editor-in-chief of that journal, whose circulation and influence he has greatly extended. He has received the degree of D. D., from Union college, N. Y.

DICKEY, Anna Elizabeth, orator, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 28 Oct., 1842. Her father died when she was two years old, leaving her in poverty, and she was educated in the free schools of the society of Friends, of which her parents were members. Her early days were a continuous struggle against adverse circumstances, but she read eagerly, devoting all her earnings to the purchase of books. She wrote an article on slavery for the "Liberator" when only fourteen years old, and made her first appearance as a speaker in 1862. She spoke at five hundred meetings for discussion held by a body calling themselves "Progressive Friends," chiefly interested in the anti-slavery movement. A sneering and insolent tirade against women, by a person prominent at these meetings, caused the spirited girl a withering reply, her "Cavil at the Governess." In 1870 she spoke frequently on temperance and slavery. She taught school in Berks county, Pa., in 1859-60, and was employed in the U. S. mint in Philadelphia from April to December, 1861, but was dismissed for saving, in a speech in West Chester, that the battle of Bull Run was lost, not through ignorance and incompetence, but through the treason of the commanding general" (McClellan). She then made lecturing her profession, speaking chiefly on political subjects. William Lloyd Garrison heard one of her anti-slavery speeches in an annual meeting of the Progressive Friends, held at Kennett, Chester co., Pa., with great delight, and on his return to Boston spoke of the "girl orator" in such terms that she was invited to speak in the fraternity course at Music Hall, Boston, in 1862, and chose for her subject the "National Crisis." From Boston she went to New Hamp-shire, at the request of the Repub-lican state committee, to speak in the gue- bernatorialcaucus, and thence was called to Connecticut. On election night a reception was tendered her at Hartford, and immediately thereafter she was invited to speak in Cooper institute by the Union League of New York, and shortly afterward in the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, by the Union League of that city. From this time to the end of the civil war she spoke on war issues. In the autumn of 1863 she was asked by the Republican state committee of Pennsylvania to speak throughout the coal regions in the canvass for Curtin, the male orators at the committee’s command being afraid to trust themselves in a district that had recently been the scene of draft riots. Ohio offered her a large sum for her services, but she decided in favor of Pennsylvania. On 16 Jan., 1864, at the request of prominent senators and representatives, she spoke in the capitol at Washing- ton, giving the proceeds, over $1,900, to the Freed- men’s relief society. She also spoke in camps and hospitals, and did much in aid of the national cause. After her address was made she retired from the lyceum platform. On the termination of the war she spoke on "Reconstruction" and on "Woman’s Work and Wages." In 1869–70, after a visit to Utah, she lectured on "Whited Sepulchres." Later lectures, delivered in the northern and western states, were "Demagogues and Workingmen," "Joan of Arc," and "Between us be Truth," the last-named being delivered in 1873 in Pennsylvania and Missouri, where obnoxious bills on the social evil were before the legislatures. In 1876 Miss Dickinson, contrary to the advice of many of her friends, left the lecturing platform for the stage, making her first appearance in a play of her own, entitled "A Crown of Thorns." It was not favorably received by the critics, and Miss Dickinson afterward acted in Shakespeare’s tragedies, still meeting with little success. "Aurelian" was written in 1878 for John McCulloch, but was withdrawn by the author when the failing powers of the great tragedian made it apparent that he would be unable to appear in it. It has never been put upon the stage, but Miss Dickinson has given readings from it. She lectured on "Platform and Stage" in 1879, and in 1880 wrote "An American Girl" for Fanny Davenport, which was successful. Miss Dickinson's published works are "What Answer?" a novel (Boston, 1868); "A Paying Inied the doctrine afterward known as "popular sovereignty." (See BUTTS, ISAAC.) Among the measures that have since been adopted, Mr. Dickinson earnestly advocated the free passage of weekly newspapers through the mails in the county where published. His conservative course in the senate not only secured him the vote of Virginia for the presidential nomination in the Democratic convention of 1800, but a strong personal letter from Daniel Webster, 27 Sept., 1850, in which the writer asserted that Mr. Dickinson's "noble, able, manly, and patriotic conduct in support of the great measures" of that session had "entirely won his heart" and received his "highest regard." In 1832 President Pierce nominated Mr. Dickinson for collector of the port of New York, and the nomination was confirmed by the senate; but the office was declined. At the beginning of the civil war in 1861, Mr. Dickinson threw all his influence on the side of the government regardless of party considerations, as for the first three years devoted himself to addressing public assemblages in New York, Pennsylvania, and the New England states. In 1861 he was nominated for attorney-general of his state, and was elected by 100,000 majority. He was nominated by President Lincoln to the southern boundary question, but declined, as he also did a nomination by Gov. Fenton to fill a vacancy in the court of appeals of the state of New York. He subsequently accepted the office of district-attorney for the southern district of New York, and performed its duties almost to the day of his death. In the Republican national convention of 1864, when President Lincoln was renominated, Mr. Dickinson received 150 votes for the vice-presidential nomination. As a debater he was clear, profound, and logical, and not infrequently unhinged his opponents with a sarcastic utterance. His speeches were ornamented with classical allusions and delivered without apparent effort. Among his happiest efforts are said to have been his speech in the National democratic convention at Baltimore in 1832, in which, having recognized at the outset his party in favor of Gen. Cass, and his eulogy of Gen. Jackson in 1845, Mr. Dickinson's brother has published his "Life and Works" (2 vols., New York, 1867).

DICKINSON, Edward, lawyer, b. in Amherst, Mass., 1 Jan., 1800; d. in Boston, 16 June, 1874.
He was the son of the founder of Amherst college.
At the age of 18 he opened a law-office in Amherst in 1818, where he continued the practice of his profession until his death. A few months previous to that event he resigned in favor of his son the treasurership of Amherst, an office he had held uninterrupted from 1835. In 1838-9 and 1873 he was chosen a member of the Massachusetts assembly, and was elected state senator in 1842-3.
In 1845-7 he served as a member of the governor's council, and from 1853 till 1855 sat in the lower house of congress, having been elected by the whig party. Having been elected to the legislature in 1857 that he might secure to his native town the advantages of the Massachusetts Central railroad, he delivered an address in the interests of the residents with a force and ability which occasioned the applause of the house, and died of apoplectic in the same day.

DICKINSON, John, publicist, b. in Maryland, 13 Nov., 1732; d. in Wilmington, Del., 14 Feb., 1808. He was the son of Samuel D. Dickinson, who removed to Delaware, became chief justice of the court of common pleas, and died in 1799, seventy-one. John studied law in Philadelphia, and subsequently passed three years in reading in the Temple in London. On his return he practised successfully in Philadelphia. His first appearances in public life were as a member of the Pennsylvania assembly in 1784, and of the Continental congress convened in New York to oppose the stamp-act in 1765. In the latter year he began to write against the policy of the British government, and, being a member of the 1st Continental congress (1774), was the author of a series of state papers put forth by that body, which won for him a glowing tribute from Lord Chatham. Among them were the " Address to the Inhabitants of Quebec," the first "Petition to the King," the "Address to the Armies.", the second "Petition to the King," and the "Address" to the several states. Of the first "Petition," which has been credited to Lee, it has been said that "it will remain an imperishable monument to the glory of its author and of the assembly of which he was a member, so long as fervid-and manly eloquence and chaste and elegant composition shall be appreciated." In June, 1776, he opposed the adoption of the Declaration of Independence because he doubted the wisdom of the measure "without some preludary trials of our strength," and before the terms of the confederacy were settled and foreign assistance made certain. When the question came to be voted upon, he abstained himself intentionally, but proved that his patriotism was not inferior to that of those who differed with him, by enlisting as a private in the army and remaining in the field until the end of his term of service.
He served again as a private in the summer of 1777 in Delaware, and in October of the same year was commissioned as a brigadier-gen-
DICKEY, Jonathan, clergyman, b. in Hadley, Mass., 28 April, 1868; d. in Elizabethtown, N. J., 7 Oct., 1874. He was graduated at Yale in 1896, and in 1908 was installed pastor of the church at Elizabethtown, N. J., and in 1917, he was elected president of the academy. Dr. Dickinson was elected president, 22 Oct., 1746. In assuming this office he did not change his habits, as he had been accustomed during a portion of his ministry to receive young men for instruction in different branches preparatory to their entering upon the study of some profession. He died the year following, but lived long enough to leave upon the institution the permanent impress of his character. His works are largely controversial, being written in defense of what he considered fundamental truths. Among them are "Reasonableness of Christianity: Four Sermons" (1752); "The True Scripture History of the Holy Bible," etc. (1751); and "Familiar Letters to a Gentleman" (1745; 3d ed., Edinburgh, 1757). A collection of many of his writings was published in 1798.

DICKEY, Mary Clare, superior of Carmelites, b. in London, England, in 1755; d. in Baltimore, Md., in 1830. She was educated in France, where she joined the order of the Carmelites, and was afterward a member of that order in Antwerp, and was one of the four Carmelites that left Europe to establish a convent in the United States in 1790. They landed at Port Tobacco, Md., and took possession of their house, which was the first conventual establishment in the United States. In 1800 Sister Mary Clare Dickinson was elected superior, and was in constant charge of the convent until her death in 1830.

DICKEY, Michael, journalist, b. in Denmark, Lewis co., N. Y., 1 June, 1822. He is the son of the late Barnabas Dickinson, who removed from the United States to Canada about 1812, and was the founder of Dickinson's Landing on the St. Lawrence, and the first contractor for the conveyance of the mails, then carried on men's backs, from Montreal westward. His son was educated at the schools of Cornwall and Prescott, and at the academies of Lowville and Denmark, N. Y. He began the business of forwarding in 1844 between Montreal and Toronto, where he extended his line to Quebec and Lake Champlain, with branch offices at Kingston, Ottawa, Montreal, Quebec, Burlington, and Whitehall. His fleet now consists of sixteen steamers and sixty barges. From 1850 till 1857 he was associated with J. M. Currier in the business in Chicago, and in 1858 he retied from the forwarding business. In 1864 he was elected mayor of Ottawa, and was re-elected by acclamation the two succeeding years. At the general election of 1882 he was elected to the Dominion parliament.

DICKEY, Clerk, William, b. in New York city, 21 Nov., 1804; d. in Fordham, N. Y., 16 Aug., 1874. He was graduated at Yale in 1823, and, after studying for two years at Princeton seminary, was ordained as a Presbyterian minister on 24 Oct., 1828. He held pastorates in New York city, and Brooklyn till 1843, when he retired on account of failing health, and devoted himself to literary work. From 1850 till 1872 he was pastor of a church at Inwood, New York city. The University of New York gave him the degree of D. D. in 1870. In 1849 he published "Scenes from Sacred History" (New York, 1849); "Responses from the Sacred Oracles" (1850); "Religion Teaching by Example"; "Life and Times of Howard"; and "Resurrection of Jesus Christ, Historically and Logically Viewed" (Philadelphia, 1855).

DICKEY, Rodolphus, clergyman, b. in Deerfield, Mass., in 1787; d. there in 1868. He graduated at Yale in 1805, studied law in Northampton, was admitted to the bar in 1808, and practised his profession in Springfield, Mass., till 1811, acting as clerk of the courts in his native county for eight years. On leaving this office he was ordained deacon by Bishop Griswold, of the Protestant Episcopal church, and removed to South Carolina, where he founded the parishes of Charleston and Pendleton. During the first eighteen months he traveled more than 3,000 miles on horseback. He was advanced to the priesthood in 1822, and returned the following year to Deerfield, which residence he retained till the close of his life. For six years he preached at Montague, Mass., after which, in 1839, he was an unsuccessful candidate for the presidency of Harvard College. He published his own translation of the New Testament, with notes (Boston, 1833), and several law, geographical, and other text-books, including a "Geographical and Statistical View of Massachusetts Proper." DICKSON, Andrew Flinn, clergyman, b. in Charleston, S. C., 9 Nov., 1823; d. in Tuscaloosa, Ala., in 1879. He was graduated at Yale in 1843, studied theology at Lane and Yale seminaries, and was ordained as a Presbyterian in 1852. His first church was at John's Island, S. C., where nine-tenths of his congregation were negroes. He then held pastorates at Orangeburg, S. C., New Orleans, La., and Charleston, S. C., was district secretary of the American Sunday-school union in 1855-7, chaplain in the Confederate army in 1861-3, and had charge of the Southern general assembly's colored theological institute at Tuscaloosa, Ala., from 1876 till his death. He published "Plains of Desolation" (1856-90); "The Temptation in the Desert" (1872); and "The Light, is it Waning?" which gained a prize offered by Richard Fletcher (1878).

DICKSON, Cyrus, clergyman, b. in Erie county, Pa., 20 Dec., 1813; d. in Baltimore, 11 Sept., 1881. He was graduated at Jefferson college in 1837, licensed to preach by Erie presbytery in 1838, and held pastorates in Franklin, Pa., Wheeling, Va., and Baltimore, Md. Washington college gave him the degree of D. D. in 1868. After the union church relations were established between the Presbyterian church, in 1870, Dr. Dickson was chosen permanent clerk of the general assembly, and soon afterward secretary of the board of home missions, also representing the board at the Pan-Presbyterian council in Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1877. His death was the result of overwork. A memoir of him was published by Rev. Samuel J. M. Eaton, D. D. (New York, 1885).

DICKSON, James A., actor, b. in London, England, in 1774; d. in Boston, Mass., 1 April, 1856. He made his first appearance on the stage in Boston, Mass., in 1794, as Neville in "The Belles Stratagem," and first appeared on the New York stage, at the John street theatre, 18 Aug., 1797, as John in "The Spoiled Child." Afterward he became eminent as an actor of comic old men. He was a member of the American theatrical company in 1817. He came to Canada in 1837, was educated at the Congregational college, Toronto, and at McGill college, Montreal, being graduated in 1866. Immediately afterward he was called to the Congregational church in London, Ontario, where he remained for six years, during three of which he edited the "Gospel Message." In 1871 he was called to the Northern Congregational church, Toronto, where he remained until 1879, when he became a Presbyterian. While in Toronto he was given the highest of the gift of the Congregational church, being elected chairman of the Congregational union of Ontario and Quebec in 1877. In 1879 he was called to the pastorate of a Presbyterian church in Galt. He has been a prolific writer for religious journals, and many of his sermons and essays have been published.

DICKSON, John, statesman, b. in Kean, N. H., in 1778; d. in West Bloomfield, N. Y., 22 Feb., 1852. He was graduated at Middlebury in 1808, and while reading law at Milton, N. Y., in 1808-12, taught languages and mathematics. He was admitted to the bar and practised law in West Bloomfield, N. Y., from 1813 till 1825, in Rochester, N. Y., from 1825 till 1828, and subsequently in West Bloomfield. He was a member of the New York assembly in 1829-30, and of Congress from 1831 till 1835. In Feb. 1845, he had made "the first important anti-slavery speech ever made in congress." He was known as "Honest John Dickson," and was the author of a work entitled "Remarks on the Presentation of Several Petitions for the Abolition of Slavery and the Slave-trade in the state of New York." In 1805 he was a member of the medical faculty and professor of surgery, and during his visit to Great Britain, in 1860, he obtained a recognition of the medical degree of Queen's university. In 1882 he was appointed Surgeon to the provincial penitentiary in Kingston, and in 1860 he was President of the Medical Society of Rockwood lunatic asylum. While holding these offices he prepared regularly "Prison Reports" and "Asylum Reports," and, in accordance with his suggestions, the conditions of those confined there was materially improved. In 1866 he was among the refusals to Canada in the reduction of the system of voluntary labor among the insane, and the abolition of the use of alcohol and beer. In 1866 the medical department of Queen's college became the Royal college of physicians and surgeons in connection with Queen's university, for which he obtained the necessary charter, and to which he was appointed president and professor of surgery, offices which he held through his lifetime. Dr. Dickson was a member of numerous societies, and held the degrees of M. R. C. P., London, M. R. C. S., London, and F. R. C. S., England; also D. M. and F. R. C. S. In 1853 he was knighted by the King of S. Edinburgh. He published numerous scientific papers and public addresses in English and Canadian medical journals.

DICKSON, Samuel Henry, physician, b. in Charleston, S. C., 20 Sept., 1798; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 31 March, 1872. His father, who was of Scottish descent, emigrated from Ireland before the Revolution, and fought in that contest under Gen. Lincoln. Samuel was graduated at Yale in 1814, and, after studying medicine in Charleston and at the University of Pennsylvania, received his diploma from the latter in 1819. He had had a large practice in Charleston, and in 1823 delivered a course of lectures on physiology and pathology in that city before about thirty medical students. He was active in securing the establishment of a medical college in Charleston, and on its organization, in 1824, became professor of the theory and practice of medicine. He resigned his chair in 1832, but in the following year, on the reorganization of the institution as the medical college of South Carolina, was re-elected. He was professor of the practice of medicine in the University from 1847-50, but in the latter year resumed his chair in Charleston. From 1858 until his death he held the same chair in Jefferson medical college, Phila-
The University of New York gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1853. Dr. Dickson wrote not only on professional but on literary and current topics, and added a graceful style to thoroughness of learning. He published "Dengue; its History, Pathology, and Treatment" (Philadelphia, 1836); "Manual of Pathology"; "Practice of Medicine" (2 vols., New York, 1847); "Essays on Life, Sleep, Pain, etc." (1832); "Elements of Medicine" (1853); and "Studies in Pathology and Therapeutics" (1867). He also contributed largely to medical and other current literature, and published many occasional essays and addresses, including an address before the Yale Phi Beta Kappa society in 1842, on "Pursuit of Happiness," and a pamphlet on slavery, asserting the essential inferiority of the negro race (1845).—His daughter, Jeanle A., has contributed largely, in prose and verse, to the literature.

DICKSON, Thomas, capitalist, b. in Lander, Scotland, 20 March, 1822; d. in Morristown, N. J., 31 July, 1884. He was the son of a Scottish machinist, and emigrated with his parents to Canada in 1835. Afterward they settled in Carbondale, Pa., where Dickson received an incomplete education, and at the age of thirteen had charge of the horses and mules of the canal company. In 1888 he entered the employ of Charles T. Pierson in Carbondale. This business passed through the hands of several persons, including Joseph Benjamin, whose partner he became in 1845. In 1852 he turned his attention to iron manufacture, and purchased an interest in a foundry and machine-shop. Four years later he established the Dickson Manufacturing company for the building of steam-engines and locomotives for the coal department of the Delaware and Hudson canal company. Four years later he was made general superintendent of the company, then vice-president, and president in 1896, which office he held continuously until his death. During his connection with the company its annual output of iron received from 500,000 to over 4,000,000 tons. Its mining operations were gradually extended over an area of forty-four miles, and it acquired control of an extensive railway system. In 1878 Mr. Dickson organized a company for the purchase of a large tract of iron land on the shores of Lake Champlain. Furnaces were erected, and the best quality of pig-iron and Bessemer metal was produced. Besides controlling the affairs of these corporations, he was a director in twenty other companies. His home was in Scranton, where he gathered a large collection of books and fine paintings, and was known as a liberal donor to various charities.

DIDIER, Franklin James (dy-deer), author, b. in Baltimore, Md., in 1794; d. there in 1840. He became a physician in Baltimore, and was a frequent contributor to the medical journals of his time. In 1831 he published a paper foretelling a civil war between the northern and southern states, caused by the slavery question. Dr. Didier was the author of "Didier's Letters from Paris" (New York, 1821); and "Franklin's Letters to his Kinsfolk" (Philadelphia, 1829). His son, Eugene Lemoune, author, b. in Baltimore, Md., 22 Dec., 1838, spent seven years at Loyola college, but was not graduated. After five more years of private study he began a mercantile career, but gave it up in 1865 to devote himself to literary work. He founded in Baltimore a weekly journal entitled "Southern Society," and in 1869-70 was deputy marshal of the U. S. supreme court, being specially detailed to act as secretary to Chief-Justice Chase. He has written much over the signatures "Le Moune," "Paul Bird," "Eugene Lemoune," and "A. N. D. B."—was aggressive and fearless. He has published "Life of Edgar A. Poe" (New York, 1876); "Life and Letters of Madame Bonaparte" (1879; republished in London, and translated into French and Italian); and a "Primer of Criticism" (1889).
DIENTE, Juan (dee-ayn'-tay), Spanish soldier, b. in Petraranda, Spain, about 1497; d. in Guanamga, Peru, 30 Nov., 1543. He sailed in the Armada of the court of Italy and Flanders, and distinguished himself by his daring exploits in the enemy's camp. Owing to his extraordinary swiftness as a runner, in which he outstripped a horse, he was called " the shadow." While still an ensign, Diente went to Darien, Colombia, with the inventory and a company, took part in the conquest of Nueva Granada. Soon afterward he joined Diego de Almagro, and arrived in Peru in February, 1533, commanding a company. In October of that year, near Bicunas, he had engagements with the Indians, killing a chief in one of them. The latter story that he is said to have, and his peculiar way of fighting the Indians, gave rise among them to the belief that Diente was a supernatural being. Diente won his greatest distinction at the memorable siege of Cuzco, in February, 1534. During the terrible night of the 20th of that month, in one of the streets of the city, the Indians surprised and set fire to the city. Diente was seen jumping from roof to roof, in pursuit of the incendiaries, across the streets. In this same night, assaulting one of the Indian forts, he was the first to enter it. In this engagement, with the Indians and also in the civil war of 1537 between Almagro and Pizarro, Diente joined Diego de Almagro in the conquest of Chili, and served during the whole campaign, commanding the infantry. In 1538 he distinguished himself in the battle of Yucay, and from that date he served under Almagro, taking part in several engagements with the Indians, and also in the civil war of 1537 between Almagro and Pizarro. On 26 April, 1538, he participated in the battle of Salinas. Some time afterward he went to Lima, and, finding himself in reduced circumstances, took part in the conspiracy against Pizarro, receiving from one of his followers a proclamation of Almagro's as the legitimate governor, exacted from the city corporation the acknowledgment of the new government, and compelled the dependent towns to accept it. He served during the whole campaign against the rebellious Indian, and commanded the reserve in the battle of Vaucorpe, and filled important commissions from Almagro's son. On 16 Nov., 1542, at the battle of Chupas, lost by Almagro's party, Diente was at the head of a column, and, falling a prisoner, was summarily tried by Judge Gema, and hanged at Guanamga as an accomplice in the murder of Pizarro.

DIEREVILLE, M., French traveller, b. in Pont-Levèque, Normandy, about 1670. He had become somewhat noted as a poet through his contributions to the "Mercure galant," when he embarked as supercargo on a vessel bound for Canada in 1699. He reached Acadia after a voyage of fifty-four days, and exchanged the greater part of the merchandise he had brought for the products of the colony. Although he gained great popularity among the fishermen, who supplied him with most of his goods, and although the company was able to obtain in twenty years, he was badly treated by the association for which he acted, and returned to France in 1700. He published "Relation du voyage du Port Royal de l'Acadie, ou Nouvelle-France, dans laquelle on voit un détail des diverses usances et coutumes des Français qui y sont établis, les manière des différentes nations sauvages, leurs superstitions et leurs chasses avec une dissertation exacte sur le castor et les autres animaux, Amsterdam, 1708." Dierreville intended to write his narrative in verse; but, when some of his friends told him that if he did so it would be looked on as a fable, he compromised by writing his account partly in verse and partly in prose. His fondness for poor rhymes did not prevent him from giving all his ideas of Acadia. He does justice to the inhabitants and to their attachment to their mother country, and attributes the poverty of the country to the obstacles placed in the way of commerce. While he describes very fully the animals of Acadia and the manners of the people, he was of little value to his predecessors. He has assigned it to the genus Lonicera; Jussieu restored the genus Diererville. Tournefort says that Dierreville was a surgeon, Haller that he was a merchant. The probability is that he was both.

DIESKAU, Jean Erdman, Danish-Swedish soldier, b. in Saxon, 1701; in Surma, near Paris, 8 Sept., 1707. He was an attendant to Marshal Saxé, and visited St. Petersburg in that officer's interest in 1741. He also served under Saxé in the Netherlands, and in 1748 became brigadier-general of infantry and commander-in-chief of the forces sent to Canada on 20 Feb., 1755, with the rank of major-general, at the head of French troops, to conduct the campaign against the English. With 600 savages, as many Canadians, and 200 regulars, he ascended Lake Champlain to its head, designing to attack Fort Edward; but the Indians fired on the French, and gave the English a good opportunity of attacking the Canadians, who retired in good order. The French returned to Lake George by mistake. On 8 Sept. he was informed by scouts that a detachment of 1,000 men under Col. Ephraim Williams, of Massachusetts, had been sent against him, and, disposing his men in ambush in the form of a horseshoe, he surprised the enemy and put them to flight. After pursuing their opponents to the British camp, the Indians halted, the Canadians became alarmed, and Dieskau, with his 200 regulars, was forced to sustain the fight. For five hours the New England militia kept up the most violent fire that has been known in America. Almost all the French soldiers perished, and Dieskau himself was thrice wounded; but he refused to retire, and seated himself on a stump, exposed to the bullets. Finally, seeing a soldier approaching as if to capture him, Dieskau put his hand into his pocket for his watch, which he intended to give to his captor; but the man, supposing that he was drawing a pistol, shot him, inflicting a wound that ultimately caused his death. Dieskau was kept a prisoner till 1783, when he was exchanged and returned to France, where he was given a pension.

DIGGES, Sir Dudley, English politician, b. in 1583; d. in 1639. He was the son of Sir Thomas Digges, the celebrated geometer, was ambassador to Russia in 1618, and in 1621 was elected to parliament, where he was active in the impeachment of the Duke of Buckingham. He was twice imprisoned in the Fleet by Charles L., whom he had offended, but was released on apologizing to the king, and in 1630 was appointed master of the rolls. He was a friend of Henry Hudson, and in 1610 was one of those who fitted out that explorer for his last voyage. He was also a member of the commission appointed by the privy council "to consider how the plantation of Virginia now standeth, and to consider what commodity may be raised in those parts." He published several political works.—His son, Edward, governor of Virginia, b. in England in 1620; d. in Virginia, 15 March, 1675, introduced the culture of the silk-worm into Virginia, giving attention to it at Denbigh, on James river, and at Botetford, eight miles from Williamsburg, and employed two native Armenians skilled in the business. He was given a seat in the council in November, 1644, "having given a signal testimony of his fidelity to this colony and commonwealth of England." He was elected governor by the General Assembly in May, 1653, and received a salary of 25,000 pounds of tobacco, with the duties levied on vessels, and marriage-license fees. In the latter part of the year he gave up his office, and was sent as one of the colony's agents to England to treat with prominent merchants about the price of tobacco, and also to secure the rights of the colony. He bore a letter to Cromwell from the assembly, and, by his social position, did much to settle the long-pending controversy between the colony and Lord Baltimore.—Another son, Dudley, b. about 1612; d. in 1648, published a treatise on "Ten Fables of Subject taking up Arms against their Sovereigns" (1649).

DILLER, Joseph Silas, geologist, b. in Plainfield, Pa., 27 Aug., 1850. He was graduated at Lawrence scientific school of Harvard in 1876, and spent two years in post-graduate studies at Harvard and at the university in Gottingen. From 1873 till 1877 he taught in the State normal school in Westfield, Mass., and from 1881 till 1886 was geologist of the Assoc expedition. In 1886 he became assistant geologist on the U. S. geological survey, with an assignment to study that capacity has travelled extensively throughout the United States. He is a member of several scientific societies, and author of numerous papers that have been published in scientific journals in the United States and in Europe, the principal of which are "Notes on the Geology of the Tread" (1889); "Diamonds in the United States" (1886); and "Notes on the Geology of Northern California" (1886).

DILLON, Arthur, Count, French soldier, b. in France in 1750; d. in Paris in 1794. He was colonel of the Dillon regiment of the Irish brigade. When the court of Versailles complained of the lack of amity and commerce with the United States in 1776, his regiment was one of those demanding and obtaining the privilege of being the first to fight the English. Count Dillon embarked at Brest, in the squadron of M. de la Motte Picquet, with the first battalion of his regiment, for the West Indies, on 5 April, 1779. The junction of Picquet and D'Estaing enabled the latter to carry out his design of conquering the island of Grenada from the English. An attack was made on the British, after landing, in which Count Dillon distinguished himself at the head of his column, and was wounded, but did not withdraw until after the action. The French were successful. Count Dillon also took a prominent part in the capture of St. Eustache, Tobago, and St. Christopher, and was present at the downfall of the colony. He drew up a code of laws for the government of the island so excellent that the English, on recovering possession, did not interfere with them. When he appeared at a levee of George III., the lord chancellor said to him: "Count Dillon, we know you to be a brave and able soldier, but we were not aware that you were so good a lawyer. We have investigated and confirmed all your judgments and all your decrees delivered during your government." The count was elected deputy from Martinique to the states-general in 1789. He defended the interests of the colonists, although he opposed the freedom of the slaves as inopportune. He was chosen commander of a division in 1792, and fought successfully on the plains of Champagne and in the forests of Argonne, but was accused of wishing to divide the army against Paris, and was suspended. He was, however, soon released and restored to his command, when he gained an important advantage over the Prussians. He was again arrested and condemned in 1794. At the foot of the scaffold he cried with a firm voice, "Vive le Roi!" and received the sentence of death. After this he left the stage for a time and wrote several melodramas and magazine articles. He returned to the stage and made a tour of the provinces, going to London and appearing at the City of London theatre as Hamlet. His next engagement was with Mr. Douglas at the Marylebone theatre, where he was stage-manager, leading man, and dramatist. At this period of his life he made a resolution that he would lose London and not return to it until he had "starred" in every town and city of importance in Britain, which resolve seems to have been kept. During his absence from London he was for a season manager of the Shefield theatre. He returned to London in 1856 and made his first appearance at Sadler's Wells theatre, and afterward took the Lyceum theatre, where he resided. He then appeared in London at the St. James, Sadler's Wells, Marylebone, and Standard theatres. In 1861 he came to the United States and opened at the Winter Garden, New York; 24 Jan., as Belphégor, and then "starred" through the country until 1863, when he went to Australia. He returned here in 1866 and opened at Niblo's Garden, and again went on a tour of the country. He reappeared in London, England, at Sadler's Wells theatre, 17 Feb., 1868, as King Lear. He then acted on Drury Lane theatre, when Byron's "Manfred" was revived. He reappeared at Drury Lane theatre on 28 Sept., 1878, acting Leonides in "A Winter's Tale." After this engagement he acted only in the provinces. Mr. Dillon was an excellent actor, but was considered much better in melodrama than in tragedy.

DILLON, Arthur, b. in Mayo, Ireland, in 1814; d. in Killiney, Ireland, in 1866. He studied for the priesthood in the Royal college of Maynooth, and for the law at Trinity college, Dublin, where he made the acquaintance of the young men that afterward formed the Young Ireland party. He was a member of the Young Ireland Society. In 1843 he was called to the bar, and shortly afterward took part in establishing the "Nation" newspaper. He was opposed to an insurrection, but felt bound in honor to follow Smith O'Brien in 1848. After the failure of this attempt he escaped to the Arran islands, where he was protected by the peasants, although a large reward was offered for his capture. He returned to Ireland, and then to the United States, and was admitted to the bar in New York. In 1852 he returned to Ireland, and in 1865 he was elected a member of the British parliament, where he defended the interests of the country up to his death.

DILLON, John Forrest, jurist, b. in Montgomery county, N. Y., 25 Dec., 1831. He went to Iowa when about eight years old, and was graduated at the medical department of Iowa university, but, after practising about six months, began the study of law, and was admitted to the bar in 1852. He was in the same year elected state prosecuting attorney, and in 1858 became judge of the 7th judicial district of Iowa. He was elected in 1862 for a second term, but before its expiration was chosen to the supreme bench of the state for six years, during the last two of which he served as chief justice. He was re-elected to the supreme bench in 1869, but in December of that year was commissioned by President Grant U. S. circuit judge for the 8th judicial circuit. He held that office till 1879, when he accepted the professorship of law at the University of the State of Iowa, and took charge of the diploma law-school. He held this professorship for three years, when he resigned it, and gave his attention wholly to the practice of his profession in New York city. Judge Dillon is a member of the Institut de droit international, and of the Association for the reform and diffusion of the law of nations. He is the author of "U. S. Circuit Court Reports" (5 vols., 1871–90); "Municipal Corporations" (Chicago, 1872); "Removal of Causes from State to Federal Courts" (1875); and "Maritime Law" (1876).—Dillwyn's "Reflections." A memoir of his life has been published. See "Friends' Library," vol. viii.

DILLWYN, George, member of the Society of Friends, b. in Philadelphia, 26 Feb., 1798; d. 23 June, 1831. He entered into business in Philadelphia in 1798, but did not succeed. Afterward he became a Quaker preacher, and in this capacity visited the southern states. In 1818 he went to England, where he resided for the next eighteen years, his religious services being limited to London and its vicinity. In 1828 he returned to the United States and settled at Burlington, N. J. He claimed to have a foreknowledge of events, and this impression tended to increase his influence in his denomination. He was the author of "Dillwyn's Reflections." A memoir of his life has been published. See "Friends' Library," vol. viii.

DIMAN, Byron, governor of Rhode Island, b. in Bristol, R. I., in 1795; d. there, 1 Aug., 1865. He was educated under the private tuition of Alexander V. Griswold, afterward bishop of Massachusetts, and at an early age entered the counting-house of James De Wolf. He afterward engaged extensively in the whale-fishery, and, as that declined, turned his attention to manufacturing. He was for many years either a state senator or a member of the lower house, and was lieutenant-governor of the state for three years. In 1846 he was elected governor, in the exciting canvass attending the disruption of the "Law-and-Order" party, and served one term. Gov. Diman had a reputation as a banked and was fond of antiquarian research.—His son, Jeremiah Lewis, clergyman, b. in Bristol, R. I., 1 May, 1831; d. in Providence, R. I., 3 Feb., 1881, was graduated at Brown in 1851, and afterward studied in the universities of Halle, Heidelberg, and Berlin. He was graduated in 1856 at the theological seminary in Andover, Mass, and was pastor of the 1st Congregational church in Fall River in 1856–90, and of the Harvard church at Brookline in 1860–94. In 1894 he was appointed professor of history and political economy in Brown university. In 1870 he received the degree of D. D. Many of his sermons and addresses have been published, and he contributed many articles to periodicals. He published in book-form "The Theistic Argument" (Boston, 1881), and "Orations and Essays" (1882). His "Memoirs" have been written by Caroline Hazard (Boston, 1887).

DIMICK, Justin, soldier, b. in Hartford county, Conn., 5 Aug., 1800; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 13 Oct., 1871. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1826, and assigned to the 1st artillery. After serving at various posts, and as assistant instructor of infantry tactics at West Point for a few months in 1822, he was promoted to 1st lieutenant in the 1st artillery, 1 May, 1824, and brevetted captain, 1 May, 1824, for ten years' faithful service in one grade. He was given his full commission in 1828, and brevetted major, 8 May, 1836, for gallant conduct in the Florida war, having on that date killed two Seminole Indians in personal encounter while skirmishing near Hernandez plantation. He was engaged insuppressing the Seminole Indians in the Seminole war of 1835–6, and was commissioned a lieutenant-colonel of an artillery battalion of the army of occupation in Texas in 1845–6, and during the Mexican war received two brevets, that of lieutenant-colonel, 20 Aug., 1847, for gallantry at Contreras and Churubusco, and that of colonel on 13 Sept., for his services at the storming of Chapultepec, where he was wounded. Besides these battles, he was at Resaca de la Palma, La Hoya, and the capture of the city of Mexico. He served again against Florida Indians in 1849–50 and 1850–1, was made major in the 1st artillery, 1 April, 1850, lieutenant-colonel, 5 May, 1857, and commanded the Fort Monroe artillery school in 1859–61. He was promoted to colonel on 28 Oct., 1861, and commanded the depot of prisoners of war at Fort Warren, Mass., until 1 Jan., 1864. He was retired from active service on 1 Aug., 1866, and in 1864–5 was member of the 45th in the U. S. army near Washington, D. C. On 13 March, 1865, he was brevetted brigadier-general, U. S. army, "for long, gallant, and faithful services to his country."

—His son, Justin E., d. near Chancellorville, Va., 5 May, 1863, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1861, served as 1st lieutenant of the 1st artillery, and received mortal wounds in the battle of Chancellorville.

DIMITRY, Alexander, educator, b. in New Orleans, La., 7 Feb., 1865; d. there, 30 Jan., 1883. His father, Andreas Dimitriu, a native of the island of Hydra, on the coast of Greece, went to New Orleans in 1794, and was for many years a merchant there. Alexander was graduated at George-town college, D. C., and soon afterward became editor of the New Orleans Bee. He was a fine pistol shot and an accomplished fencing master, but his early manhood took part in several duels, either as principal or second. He was subsequently a professor at Baton Rouge college, and in 1824 was employed in the general post-office department. On his return to Louisiana in 1842 he created and organized the first secular system of public education in the state, and was state superintendent of schools in 1842–51. In 1866 he became translator to the state depart-DIMOCK, George, naturalist, b. in Springfield, Mass., 17 May, 1852. He was graduated at Harvard College in 1872, and received a master of arts degree in zoological studies there the following year, and a doctor of philosophy degree in 1874 in Cambridge. He is a naturalist and writer. His works include several volumes on entomology, and he has contributed numerous articles to scientific journals. His works include "The Anatomy of the Mouthparts of some Insects of the Order of Diptera" (Boston, 1881), and is now (1887) preparing for publication the genealogy of the Dimmock family.

DIMOCK, Susan, physician, b. in North Carolina in 1847; lost on the "Schiller," which was wrecked on the Iceland in 1872. She was educated at the New York University, and at Leipzig University, where she graduated with honors, and afterward studied at Vienna. Returning to Boston, she became physician of the Hospital for women and children.

DINGLEY, Nelson, Jr., journalist, b. in Durham, Me., 15 Feb., 1862. He was graduated at Dartmouth College; was a reporter on the "New York Tribune," and is now a writer on the "New York World," where he has been for several years with the "Mail and Express." Mr. Dingley has contributed to current literature, and has published a "History and Geography of Louisiana" (New York, 1877), which has since been used in the public schools of that state.

DINNIES, Anna Feyer, poet, b. in Georgetown, S. C., in 1816. Her father, W. F. Shackelford, an eminent lawyer, removed to Charleston, where she was educated by the Misses Ramsay. At the age of fourteen she married John C. Dinnies, of St. Louis, Mo., where she resided until 1846, when the family removed to New Orleans, La. Before her marriage she had written many of the poems that she published later under the pen-name "Moina," among them the "Channel Ship." In 1854 she contributed to the "Catholic Standard," a weekly edited by her husband, a series of didactic articles entitled "Rachel's What-Not." She contributed also to the literary periodicals of the South. In 1847 she directed two hundred poems, arranged in twelve groups, typifying bouquets of flowers, under the title of "The Floral Year." (Boston.) The domestic affections form the subject of most of her verses.
DINSMORE, Samuel P., journalist, b. in Bristol, Me., about 1822; d. in New York City, 22 March, 1888. He graduated at Yale in 1844, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in Bangor. Shortly afterward he became editor of the Bangor "Mercury." He took an active part in the presidential canvass for John C. Frémont in 1856. He went to New York to practise law in 1857, was appointed to a place in the war department by President Lincoln, and subsequently became financial editor of the New York "Evening Post." He contributed to the "North American Review" and other periodicals.

DINWIDDIE, Robert, colonial governor of Virginia, b. in Scotland about 1690; d. in Clifton, England, 1 Aug., 1770. While a clerk in the customs department, he detected his principal, a collector of customs in the West Indies, in gross frauds on the government, and as a reward for this service he was made surveyor of customs for the colonies, and soon made his way to Virginia. He arrived in the colony in 1732, and in December of that year transmitted to the board of trade an elaborate report in favor of annexing the Ohio valley for the extension of British settlements, and of constructing a line of forts, and making an alliance with the Miami Indians, to secure the settlements against French aggressions. He discerned the military capacity of Washington, whom in 1758 he appointed adjutant-general of one of the four military districts of Virginia, with the rank of major, and sent as a committee-broker to expostulate with St. Pierre, the French commander on the Ohio, for his aggressions upon British territory, and to demand the withdrawal of the French troops. Maj. Washington delivered to the French commander Dinwiddie's letter, asserting that the lands on the Ohio belonged to the British. He wrote in a way sometimes to amuse his neighbors, often to soothe their sorrow under domestic calamity, or to give expression to his own. With little of that delicacy of taste which results from the attrition of fastidious and refined society, and altogether too truthful and matter-of-fact to call in the aid of imagination, he describes in the simplest and most direct terms the circumstances in which he found himself, and the impressions which these circumstances had made on his own mind. . . . Never having seen a nightingale, he was unable to describe the song; but he has seen the night-hawk, at sunset, cutting the air above him, and he tells of it. Side by side with his waving corn-fields and orchard-blooms, we have the barn-yard and pig-sty."—His brother, Samuel, governor of New Hampshire, b. in London, 24 July, 1735; d. at Keene, N. H., 15 March, 1835, was graduated at Dartmouth in 1758, studied law, and practised at Keene. He entered the militia, and rose to be major-general. In 1810 he was elected to Congress as a war democrat, but was defeated at the next election. In 1821 he was a state councilor and a presidential elector on the Monroe ticket. He was defeated as a candidate for governor by Levi Woodbury. He was judge of probate for Cheshire county from 1823 till 1831, when he was elected governor, and served two years. In 1833 he served on the commission to fix the boundary-line between New Hampshire and Massachusetts. —Samuel's son, Samuel, b. in Keene, N. H., 8 May, 1799; d. there, 24 Feb., 1869, was graduated at Dartmouth in 1814, and admitted to the bar in 1818. He passed some time in Arkansas, going there in 1819. From 1823 till 1831 he was clerk of the senate of New Hampshire, and he was elected governor of the state in 1849, and re-elected in 1851.

DION, Cyrille, billiard player, b. in Montreal, Canada, 22 March, 1843; d. there, 1 Oct., 1878. His first public appearance was in Montreal on 12 July, 1865, when he won the championship of Canada by defeating every competitor in the tournament. The year following he gained the championship cue in New York, then first offered, which he lost by a 15 to 14 defeat in the next succeeding tournaments, but regained in 1871 from Frank Foster, and held until, after three essays, Maurice Daly defeated him. He contested the championship in fifteen-ball pool with Walsworth and others, but was worsted.

DIRK, Cornelius Lansing, clergyman, b. in Lansingburg, N. Y., 3 March, 1788; d. 19 March, 1857. He studied theology, was ordained at Onondaga, N. Y., in December, 1807, and held various pastorates in the northern states, in addition to which he was connected with Asbury as a missionary and in 1820 he was made a permanent missionary, with his residence in Philadelphia. He published "Sermons on Important Subjects" (1823).

DISBROWE, Samuel, magistrate, b. in Eltisley, Cambridgeshire, England, 30 Nov., 1619; d. in Elizworth, Cambridgeshire, England, 10 Dec., 1660. He was the brother of John Disbrowe, who gained distinction by his marriage with the sister of Oliver Cromwell, and as a result of his activities in the Commonwealth, becoming major-general in 1648 and governor of the west in 1650. During the civil war, Samuel Disbrowe and a number of colonists sailed from England in a ship of 350 tons for Connecticut. After a long voyage they arrived in New Haven in 1660, and on the 30th of March, 1660, they purchased from the Indians the tract of land comprising the present town of Guilford, the contract being formally made on 26 Aug., and the deed dated 30 Sept., 1660. These papers and a map made by the Indians of the territory sold made the adjoining coast are still preserved in the Massachusetts historical society in Boston. The first settlers of Guilford came to New England when the hold of the Dissenters was broken from the mother country, so that they settled as an independent republic. Their birth, wit, is on when he was the handwriting of Samuel Disbrowe. This document is complete in all its parts, providing for executive, legislative, and judiciary departments, the order of its courts, manner of holding its meetings, etc. In 1660 he returned to England, and through the influence of his brother-in-law, he was appointed to the employment of the state. Soon after his arrival he was appointed to represent the town of Edinburgh in parliament, and on 4 May, 1655, was chosen by Cromwell to be one of the nine councillors of Scotland. In the following year he was a member of the British parliament. Cromwell was so pleased with his services that, on 16 Feb., 1657, he gave a patent for the office of keeper of the great seal of Scotland to him or to his deputy during his lifetime, "subject to such regulations with regard to fees or otherwise as should be made by his highness or his successors." With the advice of the privy council of England," Disbrowe was continued in all his offices by the protector, Richard Cromwell, and prudently embraced the royal proclamation sent from Breda. On 21 May, 1660, he signed the submission, and on 12 Dec. obtained his pardon. After that he retired to his home in Elizworth, Cambridgeshire.

DISNEY, Richard Randolph, Canadian clergyman, b. in North-East, Cecil co., Md., in 1835. His parents had formerly been slaves, but at the time of his birth were free from the influence of slavery. Afterward he was a barber in Baltimore, and while there united with the African Methodist Episcopal church. He was graduated with honors at Osgood seminary, Springfiled, in 1857, and at once began his ministerial work. He became a fighting preacher in Chatham, Ontario, where a large colored population was settled, and subsequently was stationed as a preacher at Peel, Buxton, Windsor, Hamilton, St. Catharines, Toronto, and Chatham. On the death of Bishop Nazeley he was appointed to the vacant bishopric in the African Methodist Episcopal church.

DISNEYWAY, Gabriel PolIon, antiquary, b. in New York city, 6 Dec., 1799; d. on Staten Island, 9 July, 1868. He was graduated at Columbia in 1818, went to Petersburg, Va., where he resided for several years, returned to New York, and became a merchant. He was one of the founders of Randolph-Macon college, established at Ashland, Va., in 1833. He contributed frequently to the newspaper and periodical press, and published "The Earliest Churches of New York and its Vicinity" (New York, 1865).

DISTON, Henry, manufacturer, b. in Tewkesbury, England, 21 May, 1810; d. in Philadelphia, 16 March, 1878. He came to the United States at the age of fourteen with his father, who died soon after landing in Philadelphia. The boy turned to business and his father's business was carried on by him in Philadelphia. It is said he wheeled the coal that he required from the wharf to his place of business. He was the first manufacturer that competed successfully with the English in hand and back saws, and to him belongs the credit of effectually checking the importation of foreign saws. He invented more than twenty improvements in saw manufacture, among them the movable or insertable teeth. His business increased until his buildings covered more than 250,000 square feet of ground and contained over 400 workmen. He was the inventor and manufacturer of the Diston saw.

DISTURRELL, John, compiler, b. in Lansingburg, N. Y., 6 Oct., 1801; d. in New York city, 1 Oct., 1877. He began life as a printer in Albany, N. Y., but soon removed to New York city, where he engaged in railroad, business, and as a map publisher, and was a vice-president of the Association for the advancement of science and art. In 1840 he compiled and printed "The Traveller's Railroad Guide," the first railroad guide published in the United States. He was also the author of "New York as it was and is," a work on the city, and published the "United States Register or Blue Book." He also published "Influence of Climate in North and South America" (New York, 1859); "The Great Lakes or Inland Seas of America" (1859); and "Traveller's Guide to the Hudson River" (1864).

DITSON, George Leighton, traveller, b. in Westford, Mass., 5 Aug., 1812. He was educated at Westford academy, and began the study of medicine in Boston, but gave it up on account of impaired health. After many years' absence from the United States he received the medical degree at Vermont university in 1864, but never practised. Dr. Ditson has travelled widely in Europe, Asia, and Africa. While in Russia he crossed the Caucasus range, a feat that had been accomplished by no other foreigner not connected with the Russian army. While in the island of Cuba he was several times acting U.S. consul at Nuevitas under Presidents Tyler and Polk, and he opened and developed the copper mines at Bayamón. While a resident of Puerto Rico, in 1842 he was successor of English in the Dupuis college there. Dr. Ditson is a member of the Geological society of France, the Theosophical society, the American oriental society, and learned societies, and has published "Circassia, or a Tour to the Caucasus" (New York, 1850); "Timbuctoo, and the Para Peninsula on France, Egypt, and Ethiopia" (Paris, 1858); "The Crescent and French Crusaders" (New York, 1859; reissued as "Adventures and Observations on the Northern Coast of Africa"); and "The Federati of Italy" (Boston, 1871). He has in preparation (1887) a "History of Parker and Ditson.

DITSON, Oliver, publisher, b. in Boston, Mass., 20 Oct., 1811. He was educated in the Boston public schools, and at the age of thirteen entered the service of Samuel H. Parker in the book and music business. After ten years he became a partner of his former employer, under the firm-name of Parker & Ditson. They continued together in a small way until 1844, when the senior withdrew from the concern, leaving Mr. Ditson to follow his own fortune. In 1886 one of his employees, J. C. Haynes, became interested in the business, and the firm-name was permanently changed to Oliver Ditson & Co. In 1867 a branch house was established by his eldest son in New York city, under the style of C. H. Ditson & Co.; and in 1876 another in Philadelphia, J. E. Ditson & Co. The published catalogue of the Ditson music numbers over 80,000 different pieces of sheet-music and more than 2,300 music-books. Of all that the methods they have published the enormous number of 111, and of books for the organ, about 100. In 1887 the Boston house employed about 100 clerks and book-keepers. They have twenty printing-presses constantly at work. Application, method, economy, and acute business judgment have secured Mr. Ditson's success, and he has absorbed the patronage and the publications of many rival publishers. Mr. Ditson is officially connected with several monetary institutions, and during the past twenty-two years has been president of the Continental bank in his native city.

DIVEN, Alexander S., lawyer, b. in Catherine, Tioga co., N. Y., 15 Feb., 1808. He received an academical education, and studied law. After his admission to the bar he settled in Elmira, and acquired a large practice. He was elected a state senator in 1856, and then was sent to congress as a Republican, serving from 4 July, 1861, till 3 March, 1863. Soon afterward he entered the volunteer army, becoming captain in May, 1863, and rose till he was made brevet brigadier-general in August, 1864. In January, 1866, he resigned his commission and returned to Elmira. Subsequently he became vice-president of the Erie railway company.

DIVOL, IRA, instructor, b. in Lehigh co., Pa., in October, 1820; d. in Baraboo, Wis., 22 June, 1871. He lost both parents while still a child, and was fitted for college by an elder brother. He was graduated at the University of Vermont in 1847, and in 1853 began teaching in the grammar-school. In 1852 he turned his attention to law, but removed to St. Louis in 1853, and was elected superintendant of the public schools, holding this office for eleven years, when failing health compelled his withdrawal. He was afterward elected state superintendent of public schools. His firm policy carried the schools safely through the dangers of the civil war, and prevented their disintegration. He also laid the foundation of the public-school library, which afterward became the public library in St. Louis.

DIX, Dorotha Lyde, philanthropist, b. in Worcester, Mass., about 1794. After the death, in 1821, of her father, a merchant in Boston, she established a select school for young girls in that city. Hearing of the neglected condition of the convicts in the Charlestown state prison, she visited them, and became interested in the welfare of the unfortunate and suffering classes, for whose elevation she labored until 1834, when, her health becoming impaired, she gave up her school and visited Europe, having inherited from a relative sufficient property to render her independent. She returned to Boston in 1837 and devoted herself to investigating the condition of paupers, lunatics, and prisoners, encouraged by her friend and pastor, Rev. Dr. Channing, of whose children she had been governess. In this work she has visited every state of the Union except the Rocky mountains, endeavoring to persuade legislators to take measures for the relief of the poor and wretched. She was especially influential in procuring legislative action for the establishment of state lunatic asylums in New York, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, Illinois, Indiana, and other states, in consequence of her unswearied exertions and petitions that she presented to congress in 1848 and 1850, a bill passed both houses appropriating 10,000,000 acres to the several states for the relief of the indigent insane; but the bill was vetoed by President Pierce, on the ground that the general government had no constitutional power to make such appropriations. During the civil war she was superintendent of hospital nurses, having the entire control of their appointment and assignment to duty. After its close she resumed her labors for the insane; and, in 1868, she published anonymously "The Garland of Flora" (Boston, 1829), and "Conversations about Common Things," "Alice and Ruth," "Evening Hours," and other books for children; also, "Prisons and Prison Discipline" (Boston, 1845); and a variety of pastoral poetry. She is the author of many memorials to legislative bodies on the subject of lunatic asylums and reports on philanthropic subjects.

DIX, John Adams, b. in Boscowen, N. H., 24 July, 1798; d. in New York city, 21 April, 1870. His early education was received at Salisbury, Phillips Exeter academy, and the College of Montreal. In December, 1812, he was appointed cadet, and going to Baltimore aided his father, Maj. Timothy Dix of the 14th U. S. infantry, and also studied at St. Mary's college. He was made ensign in 1813, and, with a variety of military duties, he accompanied the expeditions on the Canadian frontier. Subsequently he served in the 21st infantry at Fort Constitution, N. H., where he became 2d lieutenant in March, 1814, was adjutant to Col. John De B. Walback, and in August was transferred to the 3d artillery. In 1819 he was appointed aide-de-camp to Gen. Jacob Brown, then in command of the Northern military department, and stationed at Brownsville, where he studied law, and later, under the guidance of William West, was admitted to the bar in Washington, D.C. He was special messenger to the court of Denmark. On his return he was stationed at Fort Monroe, but continused ill-health led him to resign his commission in the army, 29 July, 1828, after having attained the rank from a financial deadlock. In December, N. Y., and began the practice of law. In 1830 he removed to Albany, having been appointed adjutant-general of the state by Gov. Enos B. Throop, and in 1833 was appointed secretary of state and superintendent of common schools, publishing during the term prior to the election of the president, which was a very important report in relation to a geological survey of the state (1836). He was a prominent member of the "Albany Regency," who practically ruled the Democratic party of that day. Going out of office in 1846, on the defeat of the Free-soil movement, against his judgment and will, the President pro bono publico it was impossible for him to resist. He always regarded the Free-soil movement as a great political blunder, and labored to heal the consequent breach in the Democratic party, as a strenuous supporter of the successive Democratic administrations up to the beginning of the civil war. In 1848 he was appointed to the civil service, he was elected governor of the Free-soil Democratic party as governor, but was overwhelmingly defeated by Hamilton Fish. President Pierce appointed him assistant treasurer of New York, and obtained his consent to be minister to France, but the nomination was rejected by the Senate. In 1856 he supported Buchanan and Breckenridge, and in 1860 earnestly opposed the election of Mr. Lincoln, voting for Breckenridge and Lane. In May, 1861, he was appointed postmaster of New York, after the death of his predecessor. On 10 Jan. 1861, at the urgent request of the leading bankers and financiers of New York, he was appointed secretary of the treasury by President Buchanan, and he held that office until the close of the administration. His appointment immediately relieved the government from financial difficulties, and it was gratifying to find that it needed but had failed to obtain, and produced a general confidence in its stability. When he took the office there were two revenue cutters at New Orleans, and he ordered them to New York. The captain of one of them, after consulting with the collector at New Orleans, refused to obey. Secretary Dix thereupon telegraphed: "Tell Lieut. Caldwell to arrest Capt. Bresham, assume command of the cutter, and obey the order I gave through you. If Capt. Bresham, after arrest, undertakes to interfere with the command of the cutter, tell Lieut. Caldwell to consider him as a mutineer, and treat him accordingly. If any one attempts to haul down the American flag, shoot him on the spot." At the beginning of the civil war he took an active part in the formation of the Union defense committee, and was its first president; he also presided at the great meeting in Union square, 24 April, 1861. On the president's first call for troops, he organized and sent to the field seventeen regiments, and was appointed one of the four major-generals to command the New York state forces. In June following he was commissioned major-general of volunteers, and ordered to Washington by Gen. Scott to take command of the Arlington and Alexandria department. By a successful political intrigue, this disposition was changed, and he was sent in July to Baltimore to take command of the Department of Washington, which was considered a post of small comparative importance; but, on the defeat of the Federal forces at Bull Run, things changed; Maryland became for the time the centre and key of the national position, and it was through Gen. Dix's energetic and judicious measures that the people of that state were prevented from going over to the Confederate cause. In May, 1862, Gen. Dix was sent from Baltimore to Fort Monroe, and in the summer of 1863, after the trouble connected with the draft riots, he was transferred to New York, as commandant of the Department of the East, which place he held until the close of the war. In 1866 he was appointed naval officer of the port of New York, the prelude to another appointment during the same year, that of minister to France. In 1872 he was elected governor of the state of New York as a Republican by a majority of 53,000, and, while holding that office, rendered the country great service in thwarting the proceedings of the inflationists in congress, and, with the aid of the legislature, strengthening the national administration in its attitude toward the finances that it was impossible for him to resist. He always regarded the Free-soil movement as a great political blunder, and labored to heal the consequent breach in the Democratic party, as a strenuous supporter of the successive Democratic administrations up to the beginning of the civil war. He has published a "Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans" (1864); "An Exposition of the Epistles to the Galatians and Colossians" (1865); "Lecture on the Pantheistic Idea of an Impersonal-Substance Deity" (1865); "Essay on Christian Art" (1853); "Lecture on the Two Estates" (1882) of the Wedded in the Lord, and that of the Single for the Kingdom of Heaven's Seke" (1782); "Memories of John Adams Dix" (New York, 1888); quarto edition of same (printed privately, 1883); "The Gospel and Philosophy, Six Lectures" (1886); and two volumes of "Sermons" (1878, 1886). He has also issued several manuals of interdenominational sermons—Another son, Charles Temple, artist, b. in Albany, 25 Feb., 1838; d. in Rome, Italy, 11 March, 1878, studied at Union, and early turned his attention to art. He had made good progress in his studies when, at the beginning of the civil war, he was chosen aide-de-camp on the staff of his father, and won credit from his faithful performance of duty. On the return of peace he devoted himself anew to his profession, and soon established a name among the most promising of our marine painters. His "Sunset in Capri" is a spirited study of sea and shore.

DIX, John Homer, author, b. about 1810; d. in 1884. He was graduated at Harvard in 1833, and M. D. at Jefferson medical college, Philadelphia, in 1836, and settled in Boston, where he was highly successful as an auscult and oculist. He was a member of the American ophthalmological society, the American otological society, the Massachusetts medical benevolent society, and the Boston society of natural history. In 1856—7 he built the Hotel Pelham in Boston, the first family hotel erected on that corner. He was the author of "Changes of the Blood," translated from the French of M. Tibert for Dunglison's medical library (Philadelphia); "Treatise on Strabismus" (Boston, 1841); "Essay on Morbid Sensibility of the Retina," Boylston prize essay (Boston, 1849); and "The Ophthalmoscope and its Uses" (1856).

DIXON, Alexander, Canadian clergyman, b. in Longford, Ireland, 12 Oct., 1831; d. in Hamilton, 28 April, 1875. His grandfather, Col. Henry, received a wound at the battle of Eutaw which caused his death; and Wynn, his father, served gallantly through the Revolutionary war. In 1805 he removed with his father to Henderson county, Ky., where he received a common-school education, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1824, and attained high rank as a criminal lawyer. He was a member of the legislature in 1830 and 1841, of the state senate in 1838, and lieutenant-governor in 1849-7. In 1848 he was the choice of a majority of the Kentucky Whigs for governor; but on the nomination of John J. Crittenden by a section of them he withdrew from the candidacy, in order to heal dissensions in the party. When a candidate for governor he defended the American protective policy, and made that the principal subject of his discussions. In 1849, when the proposition for gradual emancipation of the slaves was before the people, he vehemently opposed the scheme, and, being chosen a member of the Constitutional convention, proposed a resolution, which was substantially incorporated in the constitution, declaring that whereas the right of the citizen to be secure in his person and property lies at the bottom of all governments, and slaves, and children hereafter born of slave mothers, are property, therefore the convention has not the power nor the right to deprive the citizen of his property except for the public good, and only then by making to him a just compensation. He was the Whig candidate for governor in 1851, but the Whigs who were emancipationists withdrew their support on account of his views on the slavery question, and he lost in nomination at the state convention in the election of a Democrat. He had endeavored to unite the party by declining the nomination; but his friends in the convention insisted upon his taking it. His canvass was contemporaneous with the agitation for the dissolution of the Union, and he eloquently supported the views of the states' rights party. The people the appeals for its preservation uttered in Washington by Clay and Webster. He and Mr. Crittenden were rival candidates before the legislature for the next seat that fell vacant in the U. S. senate; but both withdrew for the sake of harmony. When Henry Clay died, shortly afterward, Mr. Dixon's friends elected him for the unexpired term. He took his seat on 20 Dec., 1833, and served till 3 March, 1855. During the civil war he was an advocate of peace, and in 1863 was a delegate to the peace convention held at Frankfort, Ky. He was a member of the committee on the navy.

DIXON, George, British navigator, d. about 1800. He discovered several small islands near the northwest coast of America, and a strait that he named Dixon's Entrance. He was the author of "Voyage Round the World, but more particularly to the Northwest Coast of America, 1768-1804" (London, 1789); "Voyage of Mearns" (1790); and "The Navigator's Assistant" (1791).

DIXON, George Washington, comic singer, b. about 1804; d. in New Orleans, La., in March, 1861. He first appeared in 1827 as a comedian, in small parts, at the amphitheatre in Albany, N. Y. In 1830, for the first time in that city, he assumed the character of a negro minstrel, with the accompaniment of the banjo. Thence he went to New York, Philadelphia, and other large cities, singing his famous songs, "The Coal-Black Rose" and "Zip Coon," to admiring thongs. Dixon may justly be termed the pioneer of negro minstrelsy. But he lacked enterprise and industry; his songs were without character, had little melody, and became tasteless. For years he produced nothing new until he was supplanted by novelty. In 1839 he published in New York a weekly, called the "Polyanthus," and for a libel therein on Rev. Dr. Hawks he suffered six months' imprisonment. His life closed in a charity hospital.

DIXON, James, senator, b. in Enfield, Conn., 5 Aug., 1814; d. in Hartford, 29 March, 1875. He was graduated at Williams with distinction in 1834, studied law in his father's office, and began practice in Enfield, but soon rose to such eminence at the bar that he removed to Hartford, and formed a partnership with Judge William W. Ellsworth. Early combining his legal practice with active interest in public affairs, he was elected to the popular branch of the Connecticut legislature in 1837 and 1838, and again in 1844. In 1840 he married Elizabeth L., daughter of the Rev. Dr. JonathanCogswell, professor in the Connecticut theological institute. Mr. Dixon at an early date had become the recognized leader of the Whig party in the Hartford congressional district, and was chosen in 1843 a member of the U. S. house of representatives. He was re-elected in 1844, and was distinguished in that difficult arena alike for his power as a debater and for an amenity of bearing that extorted the respect of political opponents even in the turbulent times following the Mexican war, and the exacerbations of the sectional debate precipitated by the "Wilmot Proviso." Retiring from congress in 1849, he was in that year elected from Hartford to a seat in the Connecticut senate, and, having been re-elected in 1854, was chosen president of that body, but declined the honor, because the floor seemed to offer a better field for usefulness. During the same year he was made president of the Whig state convention, and, having now reached a position of commanding influence, he was in 1857 elected U. S. senator, and participated in all the parliamentary debates of the epoch that preceded the civil war. He was remarkable among his colleagues in the senate for the tenacity with which he adhered to his political principles, and for the clear pressage with which he grasped the drift of events. Six years afterward, in the midst of the civil war, he was re-elected senator with a unanimity that had not been equalled by any other senator of the time. During his service in the senate he was an active member of the committee on manufactures, and during his last term was at one time appointed chairman of three important committees. While making his residence in Washington the seat of an elegant hospitality, he was remarkable for the punctuality with which he followed the public business of the senate, and for the eloquence that he brought to the discussion of grave public questions as they successively arose before, during, and after the civil war. Among his more notable speeches was one delivered 25 June, 1862, on the constitutionality of the act of 1861 that abolished slavery in the District of Columbia. The principles expounded in that speech Mr. Dixon steadfastly adhered during the administration of President Lincoln and of his successor. In the impeachment trial of President Johnson he was numbered among the Republican senators who voted against the acquittal of that officer, and from that date he participated no longer in the councils of the Republican party. Withdrawing from public life in 1869, he was urged by the president of the United States and by his colleagues in the senate to accept the mission to Russia, but refused the honor, and, returning to the practice of his profession, found occupation for his scholarly mind in European travel, in literary studies, and in the society of congenial friends. From his early youth he had been a student and lover of the world's best literature. Remarkable for the purity of his literary taste and for the abundance of his intellectual resources, he might have gained distinction as a prose writer and as a poet if he had not been allured to the more exciting fields of law and politics. While yet a student at college he had been recognized poet, his class, and even his graduation oration was written in verse. His poems, struck off as the leisure labors of a busy life, occupy a conspicuous place in Everett's "Poets of Connecticut," while five of his sonnets, exquisite for refinement of thought and felicity of execution, are preserved side by side with those of Bryant, Perceval, and Lowell in Leigh Hunt's "Book of the Sonnet." He was also a frequent contributor to the "New England Magazine" and to the periodical press. Trinity college conferred upon him in 1862 the degree of LL. D. Deeply imbued with classical letters, versed in the classics, and well versed in the practice of law, widely read in history, and possessing withal a logical mind, Mr. Dixon always preferred to discuss public questions in the light of a permanent political philosophy, instead of treating them with paramount reference to the dominant emotions of the hour.

DIXON, Joseph, inventor, b. in Marblehead, Mass., 18 Jan., 1799; d. in Jersey City, N. J., 17 June, 1869. He was entirely self-educated, and early showed unusual mechanical ingenuity, inventing a machine for cutting flints before he was twenty-one. Subsequently he became a printer.

and then acquired a proficient knowledge of wood-engraving and lithography. He also studied medicine, and in that connection obtained an intimate acquaintance with chemistry, which he applied with great success. His acquaintance with photography was unusual, and he had no superior in familiarity with photography. In 1839 he took up the experiments of Daguerre, and was one of the first persons to take portraits by the camera. The application of a reflector, so that the picture should not appear reversed, is credited to him, and Samuel F. B. Morse, to whom he confided the method, endeavored to have it patented in Europe. He built the first locomotive with the double crank, using wooden wheels. That a steam-engine could be run on wheels and perform the services of a carriage was considered absurd. Mr. Dixon originated the process of transferring on stone, now everywhere used by lithographers, and invented the process of photo-lithography, publishing it years before it was believed to be of any value. By his process of transferring, the old bas-reliefs were easily counterfeited, and it was to prevent the abuse of his process that he devised the method of printing the bills in colors. He patented this process, but never received any benefit from it, as all the banks used it without pay. The present method employed by the U. S. government for printing the postage stamps is essentially the same as the one which is patented by the patentees, is the old process invented by Mr. Dixon, of which the patent had long since expired. He perfected the method of making collodion as used in photography, and his suggestions led to the adoption of a true system for grinding the lenses of the camera. It is claimed that the anti-friable metal, known generally under the name of "Babbitt metal," was originally discovered by him. He is the originator of the steel-melting business in the United States. Mr. Dixon became most widely known in connection with the crucible works that bear his name, having invented the plumago, or graphite, crucible as now made. He established his factory in Salem, Mass., in 1827, removing it to Jersey City in 1847, and, with improvements and additions, it has grown into the largest factory of its kind in the world. The company is largely owned by men near Fort Ticonderoga, N. Y., and is also very extensively by the Joseph Dixon crucible works in the manufacture of lead pencils, an industry that has been developed simultaneously with the production of crucibles. Mr. Dixon invented a great number of machines and processes, never failing in his mechanical undertakings, and became very wealthy.

DIXON, Nathaniel, senator, b. in Plainfield, Conn., in 1774; d. in Washington, D. C., 29 Jan., 1842. He was graduated at Brown in 1790, studied law, and in 1802 settled in Rhode Island. He was elected a member of the general assembly of that state in 1818, and served in that capacity until 1830. From 1830 till 1842 he was a U. S. senator. His son, Nathaniel, lawyer, b. in Westerly, R. I., 1797, April 12, 1861, was graduated at Brown in 1853, attended the law-schools at New Haven and Cambridge, and practised his profession in Connecticut and Rhode Island from 1840 till 1849. He was elected to congress from Rhode Island in 1849, and was one of the original members of the special committee during the Dorr troubles of 1842. In 1844 he was a presidential elector, and in 1851 was elected as a Whig to the general assembly of his state, where, with the exception of two years, he held office until 1859. In 1863 he went to congress as a Republican, and served as a member of the committee on commerce. He was a member of the 39th, 40th, and 41st congresses, and declined re-election in 1870. He, however, resumed his service in the general assembly, being elected successively from 1871 till 1877.

DIXON, William Hepworth, British author, b. in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 30 June, 1821; d. 27 Dec., 1879. Though he had few educational advantages, he early displayed his literary predilections by printing a five-act tragedy. He was an early contributor to "Dorothy," the "Illustrated Magazine," and about 1844 became literary editor of a paper at Cheltenham. In 1846 he settled in London as a law student at the Inner Temple, and began contributing to the "Daily News." In 1856 he became chief editor of the "Atheneum," which post he held until 1859. His treatment of American subjects and American authors in this journal, as well as in his books on America, was considered in the United States unjust and incorrect, although he made many friends in his visits to this country. In 1864 he made a tour of the East, and in 1866 spent a few months in travelling and lecturing in the United States, paying especial attention to Mormonism and spiritualism. He revisited America in 1874-5, and wrote "White Conquest" (2 vols., 1876), which contained some useful information about the condition of the negroes in the South, and his book on America. He published "John Howard, a Memoir" (London, 1849); "Life of William Penn" (1851); "The Lives of the Archbishops of York" (1855); "The Holy Land" (2 vols., 1865); "New America" (1867); "Soothsayers of Her Majesty's Tower" (4 vols., 1869-71); "Free Russia" (2 vols., 1870); "The Switzers" (1879); "The History of Two Queens—Catherine of Aragon and Anne Boleyn" (4 vols., 1872-3); "Diana, Lady Lisle" (3 vols., 1877); "Ruby Grey" (3 vols., 1879); "Roy's Windmill" (1879); and a work on Cyprus, which he visited in 1878.

DIXWELL, John, regicide, b. probably in Folkestone, Kent, England, in 1607; d. in New Haven, Conn., 18 March, 1689. It appears that he was a man of estate, and was descended from a family long prominent in Kent and Sussex. In the revolution of 1640 he espoused the popular cause, was a colonel in the parliamentary army, a member of four parliaments, thrice in the council, and also one of the court that tried and condemned Charles I. After the Restoration he and his associates were exiled to death, but he eventually escaped to America. He changed his name to John Davids, and lived undiscovered in New Haven, where he was married and left children. In 1664 he visited two of his fellow-regicides, Whalley and Goff, who had found a refuge at Hadley, Mass. Up to the time of his death he cherished a hope that the spirit of liberty in England would produce a new revolution. See Stiles's "History of Three of the Judges of Charles I.—Whalley, Goffe, Dixwell" (Hartford, 1794).
In 1785 it was incorporated by the legislature of North Carolina as Martin academy, and in 1785 became the Washington college. He presided over it from the time of its incorporation till 1818, when he removed to Bethel and opened a private school, which he named Tusculum academy. Mr. Doak was a member of the convention of 1784 that formed the constitution of the commonwealth of Franklin. The degree of A.M. was conferred upon him by Washington and Greensville colleges in 1818. His son, Samuel, was president of Tusculum college, Tennessee, in 1857.

DOANE, Augustus Sidney, physician, b. in Boston, 2 April, 1808; d. on Staten Island, N. Y., 27 Jan., 1882. He was graduated at Harvard in 1835, studied medicine for two years in Paris, and returned to Boston, but in 1880 settled in New York, where he became a successful practitioner. In 1838 he was appointed professor of physiology in the University of New York, which chair he soon resigned. He was subsequently appointed chief physician of the Marine hospital, practised again from 1848 till 1850, and was again appointed health officer. He edited "Good's Study of Medicine," translated Magriet's "Milwifery," Dupuytren's "Chirurgie," Bandl's "Descriptive Anatomy," Bandl's "Topographical Anatomy," Ricordi's "Sphytilis," Chausse on "The Arteries," and Scoultetten on "Cholera." He also contributed to "Surgery Illustrated," and to other medical publications. See "Discourse on the Death of Dr. Doane," by E. H. Chapin, D. D. (New York, 1852).

DOANE, George Washington, P. E., bishop, b. in Trenton, N. J., 27 May, 1799; d. 27 April, 1859. He was graduated at Union in 1818, studied theology in the General theological seminary, when, as he used to say, "the whole seminary was accommodated in a second-story room over a saddler's shop down town," and ordained, by Bishop Hobart, deacon in 1821 and priest in 1823. He was associated with the bishop as his deacon and assistant in Trinity church, which was also interested in Bishop Uphold in founding St. Luke's, New York. In 1824 he went to Hartford as professor in Washington (now Trinity) college, and during his residence there began his life-long interest and active energy in Christian education according to the system of the church. He gave a great deal of time then, as he did later, to work in connection with the school, and, in 1827, editing the "Episcopal Watchman," in connection with Dr. William Crosswell, who was his most congenial and beloved friend. In 1838 he was elected rector of Trinity church. He was intimately associated here with Dr. Crosswell, who was then the rector of Christ church, Boston. In 1829 he married the widow of James Perkins, who made his mark in that city as an eloquent and persuasive preacher, especially in all matters connected with the missionary work of the church. In 1832 he was elected bishop of New Jersey, to succeed Bishop Cross, to which high office he was consecrated in October of the same year. He was consecrated bishop of New York. His life from this time was largely associated with the diocese of New Jersey, which, during his episcopate, comprised the entire state; and there was no parish in it with which he was not familiar, and hardly a parish without whom he did not, at some time, meet. He was a man of great benevolence and personal interest which grows out of great-hearted sympathy, and belongs to that rare gift of remembering faces and names and individual histories. He was prominent in everything that concerned the general interest and resources of his diocese, and particularly those connected with its growth. He had a large part in framing the old constitution of the Missionary society, whose leading principles still survive through various changes of form. His conviction of the great importance of Christian education, and his influence as a Christian educator, led him to found St. Mary's hall, which was really the first effort on a large scale to educate the church's girls in the church's way. Subsequently he founded Burlington college, to do the same work for boys. The former was the more successful of the two. He had power, both in the lives of those whom it educated and the pattern it set, can hardly be overestimated. The establishment of these schools brought him into serious financial embarrassments, which became afterward the nominal ground not only for criticism, but for serious accusations, and led to his presentment and trial, the result of which was the unanimous dismissal of the presentment. Bishop Doane's reputation as an orator was second only to the estimation in which he was held as an educator and preacher. Many of his addresses, dealing with the great questions of the day, in which, as a staunch American and true patriot, he took the deepest interest. He was a spirited and clever conversationalist, ready always to "give a reason for the hope that was in him," especially when the authority of the church, its impugned. He published numerous addresses, and a volume of poems with the title "Songs by the Way" (New York, 1824). His son edited his "Life and Writings," with a memoir (4 vols., New York, 1860-1). Among the best-known of his fugitive poems, found in many collections, and during his life was "Softly Now the Light of Day," and "Thou art the Way."—His son, George Hobart, domestic, prelate, b. in Boston, Mass., 5 Sept., 1830. He was educated in medicine at Jefferson college, Philadelphia, in 1850, but did not practise. He then prepared himself for the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal church, was ordained deacon, and stationed at Grace church, Newark. He entered the Roman Catholic church in 1835, was educated for the priesthood in the college of St. Sulpice, Paris, and afterward in the College Pio, Rome. He was ordained priest in 1857, made secretary to Bishop Bayley, and then appointed chancellor of the diocese of Newark. In 1873 he became vicar-general. He was raised to the rank of domestic prelate of the papal household, with the title of monsignor, in 1880. He did much to place the American church on a solid basis, and during the American Civil War raised large sums in the United States for its support.—Another son, William Crosswell, b. 2 March, 1832, was ordained deacon, 6 March, 1833, and priest, 6 March, 1836, by his father, in St. Mary's church, Burlington, N. J., in which church he was for years the pastor, and then rector. He established St. barnabas free church in Burlington, where he ministered for three years, was rector of St. John's church, Hartford, from 1863 till 1867, and then rector of St. Peter's church, Albany, in which church he was elected first bishop of the diocese of Albany on 3 Dec., 1868, and consecrated on 2 Feb., 1869. He has organized the Cathedral of All Saints, in Albany, and begun the erection of the building; has established the Sisterhood of the Holy Child Jesus, for works of mercy and education in the church; and founded St. Agnes school for girls and the Child's hospital, in Albany, with affiliated houses for the care and training of children in Saratoga and East Line. His publications consist chiefly of addresses, sermons, and fugitive verses, besides the memoir of his father mentioned above, and a work called "Mothers for the Christian Year."

DOANE, Joseph, loyalist, of Bucks county, Pa. Previous to the Revolution he was regarded as a reputable man of good estate, but, having been harassed by the Whigs, he and his sons threw in their lot with the Tories. He was in Bedford county jail in September, 1778, but nothing further is known of his history. Five of the sons, Moses, Joseph, Israel, Abraham, and Mahlon, were men of fine physique and address, elegant horsemen, and great runners and leapers. Their property having been confiscated and sold, they determined to wage a Parliamentary war upon their persecutors, to live in the open air, and exist as best they could. In pursuance of this plan, they became the terror of the surrounding country, robbing and plundering continually, but sparing the poor, the weak, and the helpless. They also acted as spies for the British army, always went on horseback, sometimes all together, at other times separately, and with accomplices. So successful were they in escaping when arrested or assailed, that a reward of $300 was offered for each of their heads. Finally, Moses, after a desperate flight, was shot by his captors, and Abraham and Mahlon were hanged at Philadelphia. Joseph, before the Revolution, was a teacher. While on a marauding expedition during the war, he was badly wounded, and, falling from his horse, was captured. He was imprisoned, but succeeded in escaping to New Jersey, where he lived for a year under an assumed name. Finally he fled to Canada, and returned to Pennsylvania, a few years after peace had been declared, a poor, broken-down old man. The only mention of Israel is that in February, 1783, he was in jail, and that his appeal to the Parliaments for their ministers was then being dismissed. Aaron, who was under sentence of death at Philadelphia in October, 1784, was pardoned by the council in March, 1785, and a second Aaron was reprieved under the gallowes, at Newark, N. J., in July, 1788.

DOANE, William Howard, musical composer, b. in Preston, Conn., 3 Feb., 1831. He was educated at Woodstock academy, and settled in Cincinnati, Ohio. Though actively engaged in business, he devotes much time to musical study and work, especially in connection with Sunday-schools. Dr. Doane is very active and liberal in the promotion of Christian enterprises. In 1878 he presented Denison university with Doane hall, a library building costing $10,000. His works include "Sabbath-School Gems" (1862); "Little Sunbeams" (1864); "A Christian's Home and School" (1866); and several others in connection with the Rev. Robert Lowry. He is the chief editor of the "Baptist Hymnal" (New York, 1886). In 1875 Denison university, Ohio, conferred upon him the degree of Mus. Doc.

DOBBINS, James Cochran, statesman, b. in Fayetteville, N. C., in 1814; d. there, 4 Aug., 1857. He was graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1833, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1835, and practised in Fayetteville. He was elected to Congress from North Carolina as a Democrat, and served from 1 Dec., 1845, to 3 March, 1847. He was a member of the state legislature in 1848-'53, and chosen speaker in 1850. He was a member of the Democratic national convention at Baltimore in 1862, and appointed secretary of the navy by President Pierce, serving from 7 March, 1853, until 6 March, 1857.

DOBBINS, Daniel, naval officer, b. in Mifflin county, Pa., 5 July, 1776; d. at Presque Isle, 29 Feb., 1856. He visited Lake Erie with a party of surveyors as early as 1796, and was with Gen. Wayne at the time of his death. He became a resident there, and was noted as a navigator of the great lakes. When Mackinaw was captured by the British in 1812, he was present with his vessel, the "Salina," taken prisoner, and paroled. He was a second time made prisoner at Detroit, but was soon paroled unconditionally. He was of great use in fitting out Perry's fleet on Lake Erie, and was with the expedition under Com. Sinclair that attempted to recapture Mackinaw. After the war he was in command of the "Washington," and in her convoyed the troops to Green bay, she being the first vessel that had sailed from Green Bay since she was ordered to sea in 1826, he, in preference to going, resigned his commission as captain in the navy, but still remained in the employ of the government, and President Jackson appointed him commander of a revenue cutter in 1828. He retired finally from the service in 1849.

DOBBs, Arthur, colonial governor, b. in Ireland in 1784; d. in Town Creek, N. C., 28 March, 1765. He had been a member of the Irish parliament, and was known for his attempt to discover the northwest passage. He also acted as a spy for the British army, and was always ready to serve his country. He was hanged at Philadelphia in October, 1784, for his part in the rebellion. He was a member of the council in March, 1785, and a second Aaron was reprieved under the gallowes, at Newark, N. J., in July, 1788.

DOBLADO, Manuel (do-blah'-do), Mexican statesman, b. in Guanajuato, 15 June, 1818; d. 22 April, 1864. He studied in the college of San Ignacio in Guanajuato and that of San Ildefonso of the city of Mexico, where he was admitted to the bar in 1846, and joined the liberal party. With Zarco and Ignacio Ramirez he wrote the journal "El Siglo XIX" against the government of Santa Anna, for which he suffered bitter persecution. At the fall of the empire of Mexico in September, 1847, he was taken prisoner while firing from a roof upon the invaders. In 1850 he retired to Guanajuato, and devoted himself to his profession till 1853, when Gen. Juan Alvarez initiated the revolution consequent on the plan of Ayutla. He joined the provisional council and was elected the revolutionary chief, and remained with him as privy counsellor until the triumph of the revolution in 1855. The newly appointed president, Cevallos, appointed him minister of foreign affairs, in which office he displayed diplomatic ability, and through his mediation some difficulties with the government of the United States were arranged satisfactorily, and the existing government, proclaimed by the plan of Ayutla, was recognized by the United States. In 1856 he resigned his seat in the cabinet, as he had been elected deputy to the famous congress of 1857, and as such he signed the constitution of that year, which was based upon that of the United States of America. When Comonfort in 1857 gave himself entirely into the hands of the reactionary or church party, Doblando was one of the first to suffer persecution; but with Juárez and Lerdo de Peñeda, of the liberal group, he worked incessantly to re-establish the constitution of 1857, and was one of the deputies that proposed the famous reform laws, which comprised the confiscation of church property, suppression of religious orders, civil marriage, and other republican principles. After the victory of the liberal party in the battle of Calpulalpan, Doblando was elected governor of Guanajuato, and in this place united the difficulties between Mexico and Spain, England, and France arose, which led to the triumvirate intervention, when he hastened to offer his services to President Juárez. After the landing of the allied forces at Vera Cruz, 8 Dec., 1861, Juárez appointed Doblando governor of the state of Tamaulipas, and at his request the hero of Vitoria, the Marquis de la Torre, was appointed the governor of the department of Chihuahua which was captured by the federal forces. After the liberation of Chihuahua, Doblando returned to Mexico, where he was cordially received, and on the occasion of the birthday of the hero of Vitoria, Doblando was commissioned to the government of the state of Coahuila. In this capacity he was called to the capitation of the annexation of the state of Coahuila to the Mexican Republic, and in this capacity he was one of the first to extend the influence of the Federalists in the state of Coahuila. After the battle of Salamanca, Doblando was one of the first to extend the influence of the Federalists in the state of Coahuila, and in this capacity he was one of the first to extend the influence of the Federalists in the state of Coahuila.

DOBRIZHOFFER, Martin, missionary, b. in Grazt, Styria, in 1717; d. in Vienna in 1751. He went as a missionary to South America in 1749, and during the next eighteen years was engaged in converting the Indians that dwell on the west bank of Paraguay. After the expulsion of the Jesuits from the Spanish colonies he returned to Austria and became a favorite of Maria Theresa. He wrote a history of the Abipones in Latin (Vienna, 1784: German translation, Pesth, 1784: English translation, by Sara Coleridge, London, 1829).

DOCAMPO, Rodrigo (do-cam'po), Spanish soldier, b. at Zamora, Spain, near the close of the 15th century; d. in Tomebamba, Ecuador, in 1545. He went with Pizarro's expedition to Peru in 1531, took part in the conquest of that kingdom, and in 1531, being in command of a division of the army under Benalcázar, fought in the plains of Riobamba, Ecuador, several battles against the Indian chief Kuminabi, whom at last he defeated decisively, and thereby secured the conquest of Quito. In 1534 he was ordered by Benalcázar to leave Quito at the head of a large army for the conquest of Ecuador, and explored and conquered a vast territory, after terrible hardships and numerous battles with the Indians. For this service he was made lieutenant-governor of the town of San Juan de Pasto in 1538. After Pizarro's death in 1541, Docampo supported the new viceroy, Cristóbal Vaca de Castro, who appointed captain of Castro's body-guard, and, as royal standard-bearer, took part in the battle of Chupas, 1542, against Diego Almagro the younger. In recompense he was appointed viceroy-governor of Quito, and was also authorized to undertake the conquest of the Sumaco and Maccas provinces. When Docampo was informed that Castro's successor, the Viceroy Blasco Nuñez Vela, who had been imprisoned by order of the supreme court, had been liberated by his custodian, Judge Juan Alvarez Guardado, the enraged Docampo, with his followers hastened to the coast and gave him every assistance (1544). The viceroy rewarded him with the appointment of marshal, and gave him the rich commandery of Tomebamba. But these dignities and grants appeared to Docampo insufficient for his merits, and he put himself into secret correspondence with Gonzalo Pizarro, who gave him written orders to imprison and kill the viceroy and the judge, Alvarez. During the retreat after the battle of Popayan, Docampo committed himself to the transportation of the accused of the treachery of Vela, convinced of his treachery. Docampo ordained his execution in his own commandery of Tomebamba.

DOCKERY, Oliver H., congressman, b. in Richmond county, N. C., 12 Aug., 1830. He was graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1848, and studied law. He represented his native county in the state legislature in 1858-59, and was candidate for district elector on the Union ticket, Bell and Everett, in 1860. He was for a short time in the Confederate service, but soon withdrew, and ever afterward was an outstanding advocate of the establishment of the Union, and was active in the peace movement of 1864 in his state, under Gov. Holden. He was elected a representative from North Carolina in congress from 13 July, 1868, till 3 March, 1871, and was re-elected as a Republican.

DOOD, Thomas, b. near Newark, N. J., 7 March, 1740; d. in Cross Creek, Pa., 20 May, 1793. His early days were passed in Mendham, N. J. By alternate teaching and studying, he fitted himself for college, and was graduated at Princeton in 1773. He studied theology, was appointed to preach by the New York presbytery in 1775, and held pastoral charges in Virginia and Maryland. He crossed the mountains westward about 1773, when there had been for several years peace with the Indian tribes, but, in consequence of a fresh outbreak in 1774, his colony was driven back, and took refuge in an old fort near Monongahela river, where they found it necessary to build forts, and to live in them part of the time. He returned to New Jersey in 1777, and, with a view to preaching in the distant west, was ordained by the New York presbytery. After living at Patterson's Creek, in Virginia, for nearly two years, he removed across the mountains in September, 1779, organizing a church in 1781. Mr. Dod was the second minister that settled west of the Monongahela (Dr. McMillan only having preceded him), and he took a position farther westward on the frontier than any other, where, in 1783, the first administration of the Lord's supper in that region took place in a barn. The first house of worship was erected two years later, and the second not till 1792. Mr. Dod had an exquisite taste for music, was acquainted with it as a scientific man of letters, and took great interest in promoting it. In 1784, he published his own collection of psalms, with an English & German translation, in 1786. He was also a founder and builder, and it was the first school of its kind in the west and was in operation for about three years and a half. As the result of his enterprise, with the co-operation of McMillan, Power, and Smith, an academy was established at Washington, Pa., in 1787, which he conducted one year; opening it with twelve other schools, and continuing his preaching at the same time. He was not only the first president, and one of the founders of Washington college, Pa., but founder of the first presbytery west of the Alleghany mountains.

—His nephew, Daniel, mechanician, b. in Virginia, 1824; d. in New York city, 9 May, 1833, was educated at Rutgers, and became distinguished for his mathematical acquirements. He was especially devoted to the construction of steam machinery, beginning when steam navigation was in its infancy, and soon became one of the leading engineers whose buildings in the United States. In 1833, having altered the machinery of a steamboat, he went on board to witness the effect of his repair by a trial trip on the East river. The boiler exploded, and he severely injured Mr. D. that he died a few days afterwards. His second son, Albert, educator, b. in Mendham, N. J., 24 March, 1805; d. in Princeton, 20 Nov., 1845, was like his father, not only in mathematical taste, but in the versatility of his genius. He was graduated at Princeton in 1822, and was at once offered a place in the navy by the President of the University. Being rejected by the President, he declined it. He taught four years in Fredericksburg, Va., and in 1828 entered Theological Seminary of New York as a student; at the same time he was a tutor in the college till 1829, when he was licensed to preach by the New York presbytery. He was one of the preachers and scholars at Princeton in 1830, which chair he held until the time of his death, declining the chaplaincy and professorship of moral philosophy at West Point. He possessed a taste for general literature and the fine arts, and was noted for his declamations and logical deductions, and his lucid statement, to which his success due to his high degree of success he attained as a teacher. He frequently supplied pulpits in New York and Philadelphia, and was regarded as an eloquent preacher and a learned lecturer on political economy and architecture. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by the University of North Carolina in 1844, and by the University of New York in 1845. His articles, contributed mainly to the “Princeton Review,” have been published in book-form under the title of “Princeton Theological Essays” (New York, 1847). The one on “Capital Punishment” (1842) was adopted by a committee of the New York legislature as their report. His article on “Transcendentalism” was reprinted as a pamphlet.

DODD, Edward Mills, missionairy, b. in Bloomfield, N. J., 22 June, 1824; d. in Marsovan, Turkey, in the autumn of 1855. After receiving a common-school education, he became a clerk in his native place in 1886. He was converted, and resolved upon entering the Presbyterian ministry. With this in view he began a preparation course of study, and in 1844 was graduated at Princeton. After devoting one year to private teaching in Virginia, and spending three years in the theological seminary of New York as a student, he was licensed to preach by the Newark presbytery, and ordained in 1848. He sailed from Boston for Smyrna in 1849, representing the American board on a mission to the Jews at Salonica. Because of the failure of his health three years later, he returned to the United States, but on his recovery again sailed for Smyrna, and from September, 1855, continued to labor among the Armenians for eight years. With special reference to the mission-school for girls, he was transferred from Smyrna to Marsovan. Its organization was delayed till the summer of 1865, and meanwhile Mr. Dodd supervised its construction, and actively shared the trials and work of that labor, especially in the sudden death by cholera which occurred two months after the opening of the school. The Turkish and Hebrew tongues were familiar to him, and he had contributed largely to the Turkish hymn-book.

DODD, James B., mathematician, b. in Virginia in 1807; d. in Greensburg, Ky., 27 March, 1872. He was chosen professor of mathematics, natural philosophy, and astronomy in Centenary college, Mississippi, in 1841, and in Transylvania university in 1846, of which institution he was acting-president in 1848. He was author of arithmetic (New York, 1839), algebra (1859), and a geometry, and contributed to the “Southern Quarterly Review.”

DODD, Mary Ann Hamner, poet, b. in Hartford, Conn., 3 March, 1818. She attended school in Wethersfield, and in her native town, where she was graduated in 1830 at Mrs. Kinney's seminary. Her first published articles appeared in 1834 in the “Hermathena,” a magazine conducted by the students of Washington (now Trinity) college, Hartford. Her writings would have been known more generally, and her name more constantly, if she had not confined herself so much to denominational channels of publication. She wrote but little until 1835, after that becoming a frequent contributor to “The Ladies Repository” and “The Rose of Sharon,” an annual in which the greater part of her remaining poems appeared. Among her best poems were “The Lament,” “The Dreamer,” “The Mourner,” and “To a Cricket.” A volume of her poems was published in Boston in 1843.

DODD, Stephen, clergyman, b. in Bloomfield, N. J., in 1777; d. in Maysville, N. J., 1865. He was educated at Union college, and was consecrated pastor of Presbyterian churches at Carmel, N. Y., and Waterbury and East Haven, Conn., from 1817 till 1847. He published a “History of East Haven” (New Haven, 1874) and “Revolutionary Memories” (New York, 1873).

DODDRIDGE, Joseph, clergyman, b. in Pennsylvania in 1769; d. in Wellsburg, Brooke co., Va., in November, 1828. He was educated at Jefferson academy, Canonsburg, Pa., and ordained in the Protestant Episcopal church by Bishop White in 1792. He was one of the pioneers of western Virginia, and published “Logan,” a dramatic piece (1823), and “Notes on the Settlement and Indian Wars of the Western Country in 1768-’83” (1824).—His brother, Phillip, lawyer, b. in Wellsburg, Va., in 1772; d. in Washington, D. C., 19 Nov., 1883. After a cruise down the Potomac in a flat-boat, he studied law, and soon gained a brilliant local reputation. He was a delegate from Brooke county to the Virginia legislature in 1815, and for several years a member of that body. He also served in the state constitutional convention of 1829–30, and was chairman of the white basis of representation. He was elected to congress, and served from 7 Dec., 1822, till his death, while he was acting on a committee to codify the laws of the District of Columbia.

DO DESTERRO, Antonio Reimis (do-des-ter'-ro), Brazilian prelate, b. in Vianna da Lime, Portugal, 18 July, 1694; d. in Rio de Janeiro, 5 Dec., 1773. He entered the order of St. Benedict, distinguished himself as a teacher and model, and became bishop of Angola, from which he was transferred to Rio de Janeiro, nominated archbishop of that diocese by the king, and confirmed by the pope, 18 Jan., 1745. Do Desterro made his entrance into Rio de Janeiro, 1 Jan., 1747. He was the first that tried to ameliorate the conditions of the slaves, and prohibited their burial outside of the cemeteries. He founded schools, built churches, and contributed to the improvement of the country.

DODGE, David Low, merchant, b. in Brooklyn, Conn., 14 June, 1774; d. in New York city, 28 April, 1832. He received a common-school education, and was for several years a teacher, but in 1802 became a dry-goods dealer in Hartford, Conn., and in 1807 removed to New York city. At one time Mr. Dodge had charge of the first cotton factory built in his native state, near Norwich. In 1827 he retired from business. He aid in establishing the New York peace society in 1815. Being its first president, he was one of the founders of the New York Bible society, and of the New York tract society. His wife was a daughter of the Rev. Aaron Cleveland. He published "The Mediator's Kingdom not of this World." (New York, 1809), and "War inconsistent with the Religion of Jesus Christ." (1812). See "Memorial of David Low Dodge" (Boston, 1854).—His son, William Earl, merchant, b. in Hartford, Conn., 21 Oct., 1805; d. in New York city, 9 Feb., 1883, received a common-school education, and worked for time in his father's cotton mill. At the age of thirteen he removed to New York city with his family, and entered a wholesale dry-goods store, remaining there eight years. Afterward he engaged in the same business on his own account, continuing till 1838, when he married the daughter of Anson G. Phelps, and became a member of the firm of Phelps, Dodge & Co. He continued at the head of this house till 1879. Mr. Dodge was one of the first directors of the Erie railroad, and was interested in other railways and in several insurance corporations. He also owned large districts of woodland, and had numerous lumber and mill interests, besides being concerned in the development of coal and iron mines. He was elected president of the New York chamber of commerce three times in succession. He was a trustee of the Union theological seminary, one of the founders of the Union league club of New York city, vice-president of the American Bible society, president of several temperance associations, and took great interest in the welfare of the freedmen.

DODGE, Grenville Mellen, soldier, b. in Danvers, Mass., 12 April, 1831. He was graduated at Capt. Partridge's military academy, Norwich, Vt., in 1850, and in 1851 removed to Illinois, where he was engaged in railroad surveys until 1854. He was afterward similarly employed in Iowa and as far west as the Rocky mountains, and made one of the earliest surveys along the Platte for a Pacific railroad. Washington in 1861 he was summoned by the governor of Iowa to procure arms and equipment for the state troops, and on 17 June became colonel of the 4th Iowa regiment, which he had raised, having declined a captaincy in the regular army tendered him by the secretary of war. He served in Missouri under General Grant, and was a member of the 2nd Iowa infantry. In 1862 he was bandsman in the army of the southwest, and a portion of his command took Springfield 13 Feb., 1862, opening Gen. Curtis's Arkansas campaign of that year. He commanded a brigade in the army of the southwest, and a portion of his command took Springfield 13 Feb., 1862, opening Gen. Curtis's Arkansas campaign of that year. DODGE, Henry, soldier, b. in Vincennes, Ind., 19 Oct., 1782; d. in Burlington, Iowa, 19 June, 1882. He went to California in 1847, and commanded a battalion of Missouri mounted infantry, as lieutenant-colonel, from Aug. till October, 1814. He was colonel of Michigan volunteers from April till July, 1832, during the Black Hawk war, and in the affair with the Indians at Pickatolika, on Wisconsin river, 15 June, totally defeating them. He was commissioned major of U.S. rangers, 21 June, 1832, and became the first colonel of the 1st dragoons, 4 March, 1833. He was successful in making peace with the frontier Indians in 1834, and in 1835 commanded an important expedition to the Rocky mountains, with an Indian, and a sword, with the thanks of the nation, was voted him by congress. He resigned from the army, 4 July, 1866, having been appointed by President Jackson governor of Wisconsin territory, and superintendent of Indian affairs. He held this office in 1847 and 1848, and was re-elected delegate to congress as a democrat, and served two terms. In 1846 he was again made governor of Wisconsin, and after the admission of that state to the Union was one of its first U. S. senators. He was re-elected senator from 25 June, 1848, till 3 March, 1857. His son, Augustus Cedar, senator, b. in St. Genevieve, Mo., 12 Jan., 1812; d. in Burlington, Iowa, 20 Nov., 1888, received a public-school education, and served under his father in the Winnebago war of 1827 and the Black Hawk war of 1832. He went to Burlington, Iowa, was register of the land-office there in 1838–9, and was then elected a delegate to congress as a democrat from the territory of Iowa, serving from 1840 till 1847. Upon the admission of Iowa to the Union he became one of its U. S. senators, and served from 1848 till 1855. He was on 8 Feb., 1855, his father being in the senate from Wisconsin during the same period. He was a presidential elector in 1848, U. S. minister to Spain in 1855–9, his appointment to fill the mission vacated by the accomplished linguist, Pierre Soulé, eliciting from Horace Greeley the criticism that the administration had thought proper to appoint as successor to a gentleman who spoke six languages a person who could not correctly speak one! Gen. Dodge was a delegate to the Chicago national democratic convention of 1864, as he was in 1873–4, was mayor of Burlington, having been chosen on an independent ticket. On 4 Feb., 1854, Albert G. Brown, of Mississippi, alluded, in the course of a speech in the senate, to certain occupations as menial and degrading, whereupon Mr. Dodge replied to him, ending with the success of the popular and ef- fectual campaign against hostile Indians. In 1886 he resigned from the army to become chief engineer of the Union Pacific railroad, which was built under his supervision. He resigned in 1889 to accept a similar place in the Texas Pacific railroad, and since then has been superintendent employed in building railroads in the United States and Mexico. He has been for many years a director of the Union Pacific railroad. Gen. Dodge was elected to congress from Iowa as a republican during his absence from the state, and served one term in 1867–9, declining a re-nomination. He was also a delegate to the Chicago republican convention of 1868 and the Cincinnati convention of 1876.

DODGE, Mary Abigail, author, b. in Hamilton, Mass., about 1890. She was instructor in physical science in the Hartford, Conn., high school in 1851, and for several years thereafter, and was subsequently a governess in the family of Dr. Gama- niel Bailey, of Washington, D. C., to whose paper, the "National Era," she became a contributor. In 1865–7 she was one of the editors of "Our Young Folks," a magazine for children, published in Bos- ton. Since 1876 she has resided much of the time in Washington. She has been a frequent con- tributor to prominent magazines, under the pen- name of "Gail Hamilton, and her published works, written in collaboration, have been the result largely of selections from her contributions. They include "Country Living and Country Thinking" (Boston, 1902); "Gala Days" (1903); "A New Atmosphere" and "Stumbling Blocks" (1884); "Skirmishes and Sketches" (1865): Red-Letter Days in Applethorpe" and "Summer Rest." (1886):
"Wool-Gathering" (1867); "Woman's Wrongs, a Counter-Irritant" (1888); "Battle of the Books" (New York, 1870); "Woman's Worth and Worthlessness" (1871); "Little Folk Life" (1872); "Child World" (2 vols., Boston, 1872-3); "Twelve Miles from a Lemon" (New York, 1873); "Nursery Stories" (1874); "Aρe′ s Love is Best" (Boston, 1875); "What Think Ye of Christ?" (1876); "Our Common-School System" (1880); "Divine Guidance, Memorial of Allen W. Dodge" (New York, 1881); and "The Intransigent" (Boston, 1885). In 1877 she wrote for the New York "Trillium" he added, a series of vigorous letters on civil service reform.

DODGE, Mary Mapes, author, b. in New York city in 1838. She is a daughter of Prof. James J. Mapes, and was educated under private tutors in New York city. Early in life she married William Dodge, a New York lawyer of high standing, at whose death she was left a widow with two sons. Of these the elder, JAMES MAPES DODGE, became known as a successful inventor. In connection with Donald G. Mitchell and Harriett Beecher Stowe, he was one of the earliest editors on “Hearth and Home,” and for several years conducted the children’s department of that paper. In 1873, with the issue of its first number, she became conductor of “St. Nicholas,” an illustrated magazine for children, published in New York. She has contributed to English and American periodicals, and has published “Irvington Stories” (New York, 1864); “Hans Brinker, or the Silver Skates,” which has been translated into French, Dutch, and other European languages (1865, new illustrated ed., 1870); “A Few Friends, and We,” serving “Amused Amateurs” (Philadelphia, 1869); “Rhymes and Jingles” (New York, 1874); “Theopilus and Others” (1876); “Along the Way,” a volume of poems (1879); and “Donald and Dorothy” (Boston, 1888). Mrs. Dodge is the author of “Miss Malony on the Chinese Question,” published in “Scribner’s Monthly” in 1870.

DODGE, Nathaniel Shatswell, author, b. in Haverhill, Mass., 10 Jan., 1810; d. in Boston, Mass., 2 Feb., 1874. He studied at Dartmouth, but was not graduated, was in Andover theological seminary in 1832-3, was afterward principal of Maplewood institute, Pittsfield, Mass. He lived in London, England, in 1851-52, saw some service as an army quartermaster in 1862-63, and was afterward clerk in one of the departments at Washington. At the time of his death he was president of the Papyrus club, an organization of literary men in Boston. He was a voluminous contributor to periodicals, under the pen-name of “John Carver, Esq.,” and published “Stories of a Grandfather about American History” (Boston, 1873).

DODGE, Ossian Euclid, vocalist, b. in Cayuga, N. Y., 22 Oct., 1830; d. in London, England, 4 Nov., 1876. Having early given evidence of decided musical ability, he determined, much against the wishes of his friends, to become a professional singer of moral comic songs, which he composed and wrote himself. About 1845, in company with Beekman and Avram, of New York, he went to Paris, where he became a pupil of Bunker Hill,” he organized a concert troupe, and gave entertainments in many of the cities of the United States. He was the first to take a company overland from New York to San Francisco, and was the first manager that ever gave a concert upon the Salt Lake city. Mr. Dodge was a strict teetotaler, and being brought frequently in contact, during the political canvass of 1844, with Henry Clay, Millard Fillmore, William H. Seward, and others of the Whig leaders, was entertained at dinner by Mr. Clay at Ashland, Ky., in October of that year, where wine was on the table. On being challenged to drink his host’s health, Mr. Dodge excused himself on the ground of his total abstinence principles, and proposed substituting water for wine in a toast to the Clergy and to true friendship.” Mr. Clay, replacing his untasted glass on the table, and scanning the features of his guest, but finding there no expression but that of the greatest respect, grasped him by the hand, and replied: “I honor your courage, and respect your principles; but I cannot say that I admire your taste.” Mr. Dodge purchased the choice of a seat for the first concert given by Jenny Lind in Boston, Mass., paying a premium of $250, which outlay, he asserted, was many times repaid, as, during the nine months following, he netted $11,000 in a tour of the New England states, being frequently compelled to give two concerts in one evening. In 1851 he was sent as a delegate to the “World’s Peace Congress,” held in Exeter Hall, London. He also acted as foreign correspondent of the earliest editors on “Hearth and Home,” and for several years conducted the children’s department of that paper. In 1873, with the issue of its first number, she became conductor of “St. Nicholas,” an illustrated magazine for children, published in New York. Mrs. Dodge is the author of “Miss Malony on the Chinese Question,” published in “Scribner’s Monthly” in 1870.

DODGE, Richard Irving, soldier, b. in Huntsville, N. C., 19 May, 1827. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1849, assigned to the 8th infantry, and after serving at various posts was promoted to captain, 3 May, 1861. He commanded the camp of instruction at Elmira, N. Y., in August and September, 1861, and served as mustering and disbursing officer at various places during the civil war. He was assistant inspector-general of the 4th army corps in 1863, and was mustered to major, 21 June, 1864. He was member of a board to perfect a system of army regulations in New York city in 1871–2, was promoted to lieutenant-colonel on 29 Oct., 1873, and since that time has served against principal of Maplewood institute, Pittsfield, Mass. He lived in London, England, in 1851–52, saw some service as an army quartermaster in 1862–63, and was afterward clerk in one of the departments at Washington. At the time of his death he was president of the Papyrus club, an organization of literary men in Boston. Mr. Dodge was a strict teetotaler, and being brought frequently in contact, during the political canvass of 1844, with Henry Clay, Millard Fillmore, William H. Seward, and philosophy. He published "Thirty Sermons"; "Philosophy of Messmerism" (New York, 1847); "Philosophy of Electrical Psychology" (1849); "In Defense of the Church and the Spirit Manifestations Examined and Explained" (1854).

Doddworth, Thomas, musician, b. in Sheffield, England, in 1790; d. in Morrisania, N. Y., 30 April, 1876. He came to the United States in 1826, and organized in New York the "City band," which became famous as the "Rainham Band," and was the first independent military band of music in the city. He was the originator and business manager, his sons, Allan and Harvey B., assisting him. He was fond of athletic sports, was one of the original members of the St. George's cricket club, and spent much of his time in sporting amusements until he had passed his sixtieth year.

Doggett, Daniel Seth, M. E. bishop, b. in Virginia in 1810; d. in Richmond, Va., 27 Oct., 1880. His father was a lawyer, and the son began the study of that profession, but changed to the ministry. He was educated at the University of Virginia, and became a professor in 1849, traveling through the southern states. In 1866 he accepted a professorship in Randolph Macon college, and in 1873 was made a bishop. He was about to take charge of the California conference, when he was seized with the illness that resulted in his death. He was the author of "The War and its Close" (Richmond, 1864).

Doggett, Kate, reformer, b. in Charlotte, Vt., about 1835. Her maiden name was Newell. She was educated at Castleton, Vt., and at the Albion Female Institute, Mt. Morris, N. Y., under the instruction of E. Doggett, of Chicago, in 1855. She was elected a member of the academy of science in 1858, and invited to take charge of the herbarium belonging to the academy. She attended, as a delegate of the National Woman Suffrage association, the Frauen konference held in Berlin, Germany, in November, 1869, and on her return delivered lectures on art. Several French and German clubs have been established by her, also a literary society called the Fantightly, of which she is the president. Mrs. Doggett has translated the "Grammar of Painting and Architecture" (Norway, 1862) and "Hellenistic Grammar," b. in Middletown, Mass., 6 March, 1765; d. in Raynham, Mass., 19 March, 1852. He was graduated at Brown in 1788, was a tutor there in 1791–8, meanwhile pursued a course of theology, and was licensed in 1789. In 1791 he took orders, opened, with Mr. Doggett as its first principal. He remained for seventeen years, and then in April, 1813, resigned, and settled as a minister in Mendon, Worcester co., Mass. Unitarianism was a new thing in that region, and the society by which he had been called was large, and supposed to be orthodox, yet he made it one of the conditions of his acceptance that the church creed and covenant, which he "neither understood nor believed," should be altered. This was done, and he continued in charge of the church until his death from a stroke of paralysis at Raynham, Bristol co. The winter of 1834–5 was passed in a journey through the south. He resigned his active ministry in 1845. He published several orations and sermons.

Doherty, Patrick, Canadian clergyman, b. in Quebec, 2 June, 1778; d. there in 1872. He received his early education in the schools of the Christian brothers of Quebec, was graduated at the seminary, and appointed professor of English. In 1864 he joined the novitate of the Jesuits, but had to leave it owing to feeble health. He was ordained in 1865, and at once became noted as a pulpit orator. He was elected president of St. Patrick's institute, and delivered courses of lectures before this and other literary bodies. In 1869 he traveled through Europe and Palestine, and wrote a journal of his travels. He accompanied the Canadian papal zouaves as chaplain on their return to Canada in 1870. In 1871 he was appointed vicar of St. Roch and chaplain to the hospital of Quebec. But his health was broken by his labors, and a series of lectures before the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, on the principal accidents in his life, completed his prostration. A collection of his French writings was published in Quebec in 1872.

Doissin, Louis, clergyman, b. in America in 1721; d. in Paris, France, 21 Sept., 1753. He was a Jesuit, and became noted at an early age for his skill in Latin pianoforte. He is celebrated for his "In Natalibus Burgundiae Lucis Elegca" (1751) and "Galliae ob restitutam delphino valetudinem" (1753). Both works are found in the collection published by the professors of the college of Louis le Grand. "Sculptura, carmen" (Paris, 1752) was reprinted in 1763 with a French translation attributed to Father Boissin himself. "Sculptura, carmen" (Paris, 1753) was accompanied by a French translation by a brother Jesuit. The two latter poems were published in a volume of the "Poetarum Christinae" (Paris, 1761). The Art of Poetry of the poems on sculpture obtained for Father Boissin a high reputation among European scholars. He was peculiarly happy in rendering with dignity and precision mechanical details for which the Latin language offers only equivalent terms.
DOLE, George Pierce, soldier, b. in Milledgeville, Ga., 14 May, 1830; d. near Cold Harbor, Va., 2 June, 1864. He was educated in Milledgeville, and at the beginning of the civil war was captain of a militia company called the "Baldwin Blues." His services and those of his command were at once offered to the governor of Georgia and accepted. He was made a captain in the 4th Georgia infantry, and in May 1862 became colonel of his regiment. He followed the fortunes of the army of Northern Virginia, and at the battle of Gettysburg succeeded to the command of a brigade. His commission as brigadier-general bore date 3 Nov., 1862. During the overland campaigns he com- mand the division in Gen. Ewell's corps, and was killed in the battle of Cold Harbor.

DOLELL DE CASSON, Francis, clergyman, b. in France about 1630; d. in Canada. The Sulpitians, being anxious to compete with the Jesuits in missionary enterprise, sent Father Dolell de Casson de to winter with the Ojibways in 1668. In company with Lasalle and twenty-one other Frenchmen, he set out for the Seneca country, being guided by some Senecas, and at Tenaoutana met Jolliet, and received from him information as to the west, which enabled them to draw a map. But they were tired of the country, and his party refused to proceed farther. They returned to the St. Lawrence, and, as they had boasted that they were going to China, the name of Laschene was given to Lasalle's place in ridicule. Dolell de Casson, with the nine that remained faithful, set out from Tenaoutana in October, 1669, reached Lake Erie, and spent the winter near the mouth of Grand river on the north shore, and in March, 1670, drew up an act of possession. They then continued their voyage, but had to abandon their project, owing to a storm, and made for the Jesuit mission on one of Ewell's forts, which they reached in May. Father Dolell de Casson was the first to sail through Lake Erie and Lake St. Clair. He was the author of "History of Montreal."

DOLPH, John Henry, artist, b. in Fort Ann, Washington Co., N. Y., 18 April, 1845. He studied for two years with Louis Van Vuyck in Antwerp, and then spent three years in Paris, after which he settled in New York. In 1877 he was made an associate of the National academy, and he has been a member of the society of American artists, and at the annual exhibitions of the 1877 and 1878 works include "Knickerbocker Farm - Yard" (1869); "The Season of Plenty;" "The Country Blacksmith" (1870); "The Horse-Doctor" (1873); "The Pasture" (1874); "The Antiquarian;" "Gray Dusk on the Coast" (1875); "From the Horse-Market" (1876); "The Ante-Chamber" (1878), exhibited in the French salon in 1882; "Relief of the Battle-field;" "The Rehearsal" (1878); "Princess" (1885); and "A June Day" (1886).

DOLPH, Joseph Norton, senator, b. in Hecton, Tompkins (now in Schuyler) co., N. Y., 10 Oct., 1835. He received a common-school education, besides private instruction, and for a time attended the Genesee Wesleyan seminary at Lima, N. Y. He studied law. He was admitted to the bar in November, 1851, and practised in Schuyler county in 1846. He is still the same, and has been appointed orderly sergeant in Capt. M. Crawford's company, known as the "Oregon Escort," which was raised under an act of congress, for the purpose of protecting the emigration to the Pacific coast against hostile Indians. He settled in Portland, Oreg., the following November, and has resided ever since. He was elected city attorney in 1844, and President Lincoln appointed him district attorney for the district of Oregon. He was a member of the Oregon senate in 1866, 1872, and 1874. He is a member of the National guard, and was actively engaged in various business enterprises, and had an extensive law practice. He was chosen as a republican, and took his seat 4 March, 1883. Senator Dolph is at present (1887) chairman of the committee on coast defenses.

DOMBEY, Joseph, French botanist, b. in Mâcon, France, 20 Feb., 1742; d. in the island of Montserrat, West Indies, in May, 1794. He ran away from home and acquired a thorough knowledge of botany in Montpelier, where in 1768 he was graduated in medicine. In 1772 he went to Paris, where he became assistant to the botanist Bernard de Jussieu, and in 1776 was appointed by Turgot botanist of the Jardin des plantes. A year later he was sent on an expedition to visit South America and collect such useful plants as could be cultivated in France. He arrived in Callao in January, 1778, and soon gathered a large herbarium of the Peruvian flora, also accumulating much valuable information concerning the cichoreum tree. In 1779 he sent a portion of his collection home, but the vessel containing them was captured by the British, and the specimens sent to the British museum, where they were investigated by Reichenbach after the subsequent claims by the French government. Dombey sought at once to replace this loss, and soon had in readiness a second shipment, but the authorities of Callao confiscated over 300 original designs of plants on the pretext that works of native artists were not permitted to be exported to foreign countries. These designs were given to the Spanish botanists Pavon and Ruiz, who used them in their publication of "La Flora Peruana." In 1788 he visited Chili and collected the plants indigenous to that country. During this visit in Concepcion the cholera broke out, and at once Dombey offered his services and was appointed physician-in-chief of the city, which office he resigned in 1788 when the epidemic had passed. He was then invited to examine the quicksilver mines of Chili; the mines were in Coquimbo, and he set out from Callao on the 10th of February. He searched for the loss of half of his collections, which were seized by the Spanish government and himself imprisoned until he agreed not to publish his researches prior to Pavon and Ruiz. Dombey succeeded in escaping to France by way of Havre, and secured, on Buffon's recommendation, an indemnity of 10,000 francs and an annual pension of 1,200 francs. In 1785 he was sent on a mission to the United States, but was captured by privateers and imprisoned in Montserrat, where he died. Dombey's collections are among the treasures of the British museum, the Jardin Real Madrid, and the Jardin des plantes and the Museum d'histoire naturel of Paris. His grand herbarium contains over 1,500 South American plants, of which more than 60 are new species, accompanied by valuable notes on the plants of Oreg. and Cal., and he is one of the most complete that exists in Europe of the flora of South America. Botanists have honored his memory by giving his name, Dombeya, to a plant that belongs to the family of Buténicaceae, of which eleven different species are known. Other works: "De l'histoire des safrans, ou de l'or de Saffron." (1778); "Mémoires à l'Académie des sciences sur les mines de mercure du Chili (1780); Mémoire sur le cuivre murié (1785). Dombey's posthumous works, published by L'Héritier, are: "Flore Perouviennne" (Paris, 1799, 2 vols. in 4); "L'Her- bier de Dombey expliqué" (Paris, 1811, 5 vols., in 4); and "Dictionnaire de Dombey fait au Chili et au Pérou." (Paris, 1813, in 4).}

DOMENÉCH, Emmanuel Henry Dieudonné, French author, b. in Lyons, France, 4 Nov., 1825; d. in France in June, 1886. He became a priest in the Roman Catholic church, and was sent as a missionary to Central America. Being Maximilian's residence in America, Domenéch acted as private chaplain to the emperor, and he was also almoner to the French army during its occupation of Mexico. On his return to France he was made honorary canon of Montpellier. His "Manuscrit pitc- tographique Américain, précédé d'une notice sur l'idéographie des Peaux Rouges" (1860), was published by the French government, with a facsimile of a manuscript in the library of the Paris arsenal, relating, as he claimed, to the American Indians, but the German orientalist, Julius Pitzholdt, de- claimed that it was in reality a forgery and that the coherent illustrations of a local German dialect. Domenéch maintained the authenticity of the manuscript in a pamphlet entitled "La vérité sur le livre des sauvages" (1861), which drew forth a reply from Pitzholdt, translated into French under the title of "La vérité sur les sauvages au point de vue de la civilisation Française." (Brussels, 1861). He has also published "Journal d'un missionnaire au Texas et au Mexique" (1857); "Voyage dans les solitudes Américaines, le Minnesota" (1858); "Voyage pitto- sque dans le Nouveau Monde" (1861); "Les Gorges du Diable, voyage en Islande" (1864); "Les legendes islandaises" (1865); "Le Mexique tel qu'il est" (1867); and "Histoire du Mexique, Juarez et Maximilien, correspondances inédites" (1868). The historical accuracy of the last named work has been questioned by several writers, including Gen. Prim. Domenéch also published "Quand j'étais journaliste" (1889); "Histoire de la campagne de 1870-1 et de la deuxième ambu- lance de la presse Française" (1871); and "L'écriture syllabique (Maya) dans le Yucatan après les découvertes de l'abbé Bouchot," (1888); and during the latter part of his life he produced also several works pertaining to religion and ancient history.

DOMENÉCH, Miguel, R. C. bishop, b. in Rios, Spain, in 1816; d. in Tarragona, Spain, in 1879. He was educated in France by the priests of the congregation of the mission, and after becoming a member of that order came to the United States in 1837. He finished his studies in the theological seminary of The Barrens, Missouri, was admitted to the priesthood in 1839, and became a professor in St. Mary's college. In 1842 he founded St. Vincent's male academy at Cape Girardeau, and was subsequently a missionary in the state of Mis- souri. He was sent to Pennsylvania in 1845, and performed pastoral duties in Newcaster. His next mission was to the grand desert of the American West, and he was consecrated bishop of Pittsburgh in 1860, and during his administration erected several churches and schools. The diocese of Pittsburgh was considered too large for a single bishop, and in 1875 a portion of it was formed into the see of Allegheny, to which Bishop Domenéch was transferred in 1876. This division gave rise to dissensions and difficul- ties, and, in order to bring all questions to a decision, he went to Rome in 1877. He resigned his see the same year.

DOMÉVILLE, James, Canadian capitalist, b. in England, 29 Nov., 1842. He was educated in his native country, and in 1883 went to Barbados, where his father, Gen. James Domville, R. A., was in command of the garrison, and there became a merchant. In 1886 he arrived in St. John, New Brunswick, engaged in business as a merchant, and also became proprietor of the iron works, rolling mills, and nail factories at Moosepath, Coldbrooke, and Rockland, in Kings county, and entered largely into other commercial schemes. He is president of the Maritime Dominions Company, a member of the council of the Dominion artillary association, a fellow of the Royal colonial institute, London, England, has been president of the Kings county board of trade, and was chairman of the delegation from St. John, N. B., at the Dominion board of trade, Ottawa, in 1871. He was elected a representative to the Dominion parliament in 1872, and re-elected at the general elections in 1874 and 1878. He is a liberal conservative.

DONALDSON, Edward, naval officer, b. in Baltimore, Md., 17 Nov., 1816. He entered the U. S. Navy as cadet in 1836, and served on the "Palmouth," the "Warren," and the "Vandalian" in the West India squadron. In 1838 he went to the East Indies in the "Columbus," and in 1839 participated in the attack on the forts on the coast of Sumatra. He was promoted passed midshipman in June, 1841, and attached to the Mosquito fleet in Florida during 1841-2, after which he served on various vessels until 1846, when he was appointed on the coast survey. He received his commission as lieutenant in October, 1847, and was attached to the "Delphi" as "water witch," the "Errima," and the "San Jacinto," and was on special shore duty until 1861. During 1861 he commanded the gun-boat "Sciota," attached to the Western gulf squadron, and took part in the bombardment of Forts Jackson and St. Philip, and the subsequent capture of New Orleans. He participated in the passage of the Vicksburg batteries, and was made commander in July, 1862. After a year in command of the receiving-ship at Philadelphia, he was transferred to the "Keystone State" as executive officer during her trip to the West Indies in search of the Confederate cruiser "Sumter," and was her commander in 1863-4. During the battle of Mobile bay, 5 Aug., 1864, he commanded the "Seminole," and rendered efficient service by his coolness and judgment in piloting his vessel while passing Fort Morgan, the regular pilot being ill. In 1865 he was on ordance duty in Baltimore. He was made captain in July, 1866, and subsequently had command of the receiving- ship at Philadelphia until 1868, when he was assigned to the Brooklyn navy-yard. In September, 1871, he became commodore, and for a time had charge of the naval station in Mount City, Ill. He was promoted to rear-admiral on 21 Sept., 1876, and placed on the retired list a few days later.

—His brother, Frank, physician, b. in Baltimore, Md., 23 July, 1833, was educated in the University of Maryland, and practiced with his brother, Samuel Chew and Thomas H. Buckler, receiving his medical degree in 1846. For two years he was a resident student in the almshouse hospital, Balti- more, and subsequent to his graduation studied in the hospitals in Paris, settling in Baltimore in 1851. He has held the office of attending physi- cian to the Baltimore almshouse hospital, physician to the general dispensary, attending physician of university hospital, and resident physician to the marine hospital. From 1863 till 1866 he was profes- sor of materia medica in the Maryland college. of pharmacy, and in 1866 became professor of physiology and hygiene, and clinical professor of diseases of the throat and chest in the University of Maryland. He has served as president of the medical and surgical faculty of the state of Maryland and of the American medical col-enation. Dr. Donaldson has published papers in the medical journals, principally upon diseases of the heart, lungs, and throat, and is the author of "The Influence of City Life and Occupations in Development of Tuberculosis" (Cambridge, 1870).

DONALDSON, James Linn, b. 2d soldier, b. in Baltimore Md., 17 March, 1814; d. there, 4 Nov., 1885. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1836, and became 2d lieutenant in the 3d artillery, serving in that capacity during the Florida war in 1836-38. He was transferred to the 1st artillery in May, 1837, and became 1st lieutenant in July, 1838. Subsequently he was on garrison duty until 1846, when he was stationed at Fort Brown during the military occupation of Texas.
During the Mexican war he participated in the bat-les of Monterey and Buena Vista, receiving the brevets of captain and major. He was appointed assistant quartermaster, with the rank of captain, in March, 1847, and was on duty as such in Coa-hilla, Mexico. Subsequent to the war he continued as quartermaster at various points until he became colonel of the 4th infantry in 1856.

DONALDSON, John, b. in Baltimore, Md., and in the Department of the Cumberland.
He was chief quartermaster of the military division of the Tennessee in June, 1864, and of the military division of the Missour i until 1869, when he was retired. Meanwhile he had attained the rank of colonel on the staff, and had received the brevet of major-general of volunteers. He resigned on 1 Jan., 1874. During his administration of the quartermaster's department of the division of the Tennessee, he became a favorite with Gen. George H. Thomas, to whom he suggested the creation of cemeteries for the scattered remains of soldiers who had fallen in battle, from which has resulted the annual Decoration Day. Gen.
Donaldson was also associated with "Sergeant Wha," receiving the brevet of Lieut.-Col. in 1875.

DONALDSON, Washington H., aeronaut, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1840; drowned in Lake Michigan, 15 July, 1875. He was one of those apt, energetic, restless individuals known as natural genuses. He could do anything he undertook to do, and would undertake anything that came in his way. He had enough education for his wants, and an admirable physique, though a little short in stature. Gymnastics were as second nature to him, and there was little in this line in which he was not an expert. Amiability was a chief characteristic, which never failed to assert itself; his rare good humor and pleasant manners won him friends wherever he went, and there never was a aeronaut more popular than he. His early life was spent upon the stage as an actor and magician.
He was a graceful tight-rope performer. In 1862 he walked across the Schuylkill river on a rope 1,200 feet long, returning to the middle and finishing by jumping into the river from a height of 90 feet. He also walked across the Genesee river at Rochester on a rope 1,900 feet long, re-crossing it with a man in a wheelbarrow trundled in front of him. From 1857 till 1871 he travelled through the United States, appearing not fewer than 1,900 times in his various specialties.
It happened, in a western city, that his host posessed a balloon, left with him for a debt, which he was anxious to sell. Donaldson proposed a trade; he would teach the landlord the mysteries of the black art and transfer to him all the paraphernalia of his exhibitions, which was done, and Donaldson found himself in the aeronautical ascension.
He made arrangements for an ascension, taking his first lesson in a failure, which happened for want of lighter gas or a larger balloon, the latter being too small to carry him except with pure hydrogen. The balloon was again with coal-gas, as in the previous instance; and this time, 30 Aug., 1871, it succeeded in geting off after Donaldson had thrown away every available thing, even his coat, boots, and hat. This ascend was made from Reading, Pa., and the decent 18 miles distant. Another ascend was made from Reading, in September, upon a trapeze-bar.
On 18 Jan., 1872, he ascended from Norfolk, Va., and his balloon accidentally burst when a mile from the ground. He said of it: "The balloon did not collapse, but closed on my sides, and, swaying from side to side, descended with frightful velocity.
I clung with all my strength to the hoop. I could not tell how badly I was frightened, but felt as though all my hair had been torn out. I scarcely had time to realize that I was alive, when, with a terrible crash, I was precipitated from the balloon into a burr-chestnut tree. The netting and rigging, catching in the tree, checked my velocity, but I had my grasp jerked loose, and was precipitated through the limbs and landed flat upon my back, with my tights nearly torn off, and my legs, arms, and body lacerated and bleeding." Shortly after this he ascended again from Norfolk, but on this occasion, in his haste to avoid being carried out to sea, his balloon was wrecked among the trees, although he himself escaped injury. He then undertook the construction of a balloon which he called the "Magenta." It was made of fine jaconet, held about 10,000 cubic feet of gas, and weighed about 100 pounds. He made several ascensions with this balloon, two of which were from Chicago.
On the first occasion he was carried out on Lake Michigan, but coming on heavy winds, he was struck by lightning, burning the ropes to the water, bringing up against a stone pier finally with such violence as to render him insensible.
On 17 May, 1873, he ascended from Reading, Pa., in a balloon made of manilla-paper enclosed with a light network, the whole weighing but 48 pounds, although it contained 14,000 cubic feet of gas. He travelled ten miles before landing. Donaldson was a convert to Wise's theory of a constant current blowing from west to east at a height of three miles, and, as the veteran aeronaut had said a balloon could cross the ocean in this current, Donaldson was ready to take the venture, and so announced his intention of making the attempt. Wise offered to join him, and they set out together to raise the necessary funds. They went to New York and opened a subscription, but while this was in progress the proprietors of the "Daily Graphic" offered to furnish the funds required for the construction of a very large balloon and outfit, together with the gas required. The proposition was accepted, and the construction of an immense balloon of twilled cotton was carried to completion. But before the inflation some doubts arose between the aero-auts regarding the reliability of the balloon.
Donaldson's inexperience placed him in a secondary position throughout the entire transaction, but when the time for action came he found himself the principal, Mr. Wise having withdrawn. Such a balloon as Donaldson found himself possessed of

on this occasion was no toy; it was said to be capable of containing over 700,000 cubic feet of gas, and weighed over three tons. We do not vouch for these figures, but it is certain that the dimensions were considerable, and beyond the capabilities of Donaldson's management at that time. Three unsuccessful attempts were made at inflation, the balloon bursting each time, when finally the aeronaut Prof. S. A. King was sent for, the work was accomplished, and the ascension made from the Capitol grounds in Washington, D.C., on 7 Oct., 1873. Donaldson had two companions, named Ford and Lunt. A handsome life-boat, filled with provisions and loaded with great quantities of sand, was hung beneath the balloon, which served both as car and as a means of escape in case of falling into the ocean. But they never reached the sea. Fortunately, they kept inland sufficiently to clear the water till it became manifest that the aeronaut was as incapable of managing the mammoth globe in the air as he had been on the ground. Scarcely one hundred miles had been run when control was completely lost, and the voyagers found themselves dashing about among trees and fences, and coming close to the ground. Donaldson gave the word to jump, and Ford jumped with Donaldson, but Lunt was too late. A thousand-pound drag-ropes were trapped upon the lake, and when the car came from rising to any considerable height after the two men had left the car, and Lunt, panic-stricken at finding himself alone with the monster, threw himself bodily into the first tree the boat came in contact with at New Canaan, Conn., and fell through to the ground without being able to stop himself. He died six months later. P. T. Barnum offered Mr. Donaldson an engagement first at Gilmore's garden and then with his hippodrome, which he accepted.

On 24 July, 1874, he ascended from Gilmore's garden in a balloon containing 54,000 cubic feet of gas, with five passengers; these he continued to land one after another as the balloon became weakened; but by resorting to the use of the drag-ropes he was able to keep aloft for thirteen hours, landing finally at Greenport, near Hudson, 130 miles from New York. Four days afterward he again ascended from Gilmore's garden. Three hours after starting, two passengers were landed, and the voyage continued into the night. At 2 A.M. a landing was effected at Wallingford, Vt., the journey being resumed at 8 A.M., and at noon the voyage terminated at Batford. On 19 Oct., of the same year, Mr. Donaldson took up a wedding party from Cincinnati, the ceremony being performed in mid-air. On 23 June, 1875, he ascended from Toronto, taking three newspaper reporters with him. They were carried out over Lake Ontario, and finally descended into the water, through which they were dragged for several miles before they were rescued by a boat's crew sent out from a passing schooner. Donaldson, during his tour with the hippodrome, made numerous ascensions. From Pittsburg, Pa., he ascended with five ladies and one gentleman, making a pleasant and uneventful trip. While at Richmond, he ascended from Buffalo, accompanied by two reporters and his friend Prof. King. They expected to have an experience over Lake Erie, but after a sail of twenty miles or more over the water they reached the Canada shore, landing finally near Port Clinton, Ohio, 180 miles from Buffalo. On 7 Aug., the balloon was ascended from the Lake front in Chicago, carrying several persons with him. The air being very still, the balloon, although it drifted lakeward, did not get more than three miles from the shore, and was towed back to the starting-place with most of the gas remaining in it, and held for the ascension of the following day. One of the hippodrome managers, looking at the balloon, inquired of Donaldson: "What's the use of this? Why didn't you go somewhere?" "Wait till to-morrow," he replied, "and I'll show the United States a thing not usually done." On the following day the wind was blowing up the lake at the rate of ten to fifteen miles an hour. An additional amount of gas was supplied to make up for what had been lost; but, in consequence of the deterioration of what had been in the balloon since the previous day, they did not get as high as usual. Knowing that he would have a long voyage up the lake, he determined to take but one companion with him, Newton S. Grimwood, of the Chicago "Evening Journal," drawing the prize, as it was then considered. At 5 p.m. the voyage began. The balloon gradually rose to the height of a mile or more, floating off up the lake, and in about an hour and a half disappeared. At seven o'clock the crew of the "Little Guide," a small craft, saw the balloon about thirty miles from shore, trailing the car through the water, and tried to reach it; but before this could be done, the balloon, as if suddenly relieved of some weight, shot up into the air and off into the distance. Night came on, and, with the cooling gas and natural loss of buoyancy, the luckless aeronauts doubtless came down upon the lake far from their friends. But none with their lives had it not been for a violent storm which came up about eleven o'clock. The body of Grimwood was washed ashore on the farther side of the lake, and was found on 16 Aug. Donaldson never was found, nor any part of the balloon.

DONDE, Ignacio José, b. in Campeche, Mexico, 6 July, 1827; d. in Merida, 1 Nov., 1875. He received his early education in the city of Campeche, and in 1844 removed to Puebla, where he entered the college of pharmacy, being graduated in 1847. He continued his studies in the city of Mexico, and in 1850 established a chair of pharmacy in Campeche, and in 1853 another in Merida. He also held for a long time the chair of botany in the Catholic college of Merida, and the chair of industrial chemistry for artisans. Donde was one of the founders of the school of medicine and pharmacy of Yucatan. He was the inventor of some very useful chemical products, and the first to produce santonate of soda (1862). He published "Pharmaceutical Prescriptions," which appeared in Philadelphia under the name of "Pharmaceutical Notes," and were published in France, England, and Germany; "Preparación del Santonato de Sosa"; "Estudio sobre el Ni-in"; and "Elementos de Botánica." Donde was a great benefactor of the local industries of Merida.

DONELSON, Andrew Jackson, politician, b. near Nashville, Tenn., 23 Aug., 1800; d. in Memphis, 26 June, 1871. He studied in the University of Nashville, and was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1820, standing second in his class. From 1820 till 1823, while 2d lieutenant in the engineers, he served as aide-de-camp to his uncle, Gen. Andrew Jackson. In June, 1823, he was assigned to the recently-acquired territory of Florida, and then as assistant to the board of engineers. He resigned from the army in February, 1822, attended law-lectures in the Transylvania university at Lexington, Ky., and was admitted to the bar 1828, but turned to his profession of banking on his estates in Bolivar county, Miss. On Jackson's election to the presidency, he became his confidential adviser and private secretary, continuing in that capacity until the close of his second administration. The annexation treaty between the United States and Texas having been rejected by the senate in April, 1844, Mr. Donelson was asked to undertake new negotiations, and accordingly was appointed charge d' affaires to the republic of Texas. In 1846 he was appointed minister to Prussia, and in 1848 to the federal government of Germany, which office he resigned in 1849. He assumed the editorship of the Washington "Union" in 1861, but relinquished it during the following year. After the inauguration of President Pierce in 1853, he abandoned the Democrats and joined the American party, receiving the nomination of vice-president on the ticket with Millard Fillmore in 1856. After his defeat in the election that followed, he retired from public life, and devoted himself to the management of his extensive estates. Subsequent to the civil war he practised his profession in Memphis. He published "Reports of Explorations" (Washington, 1855).

DONAGH, Thomas, colonial governor of New York, b. in Castleton, County Kilclare, Ireland, in 1634; d. in London, England, 14 Dec., 1715. He early entered the army, and served with the British and then with the French, attaining the rank of colonel. Later he was made lieutenant-governor of Tangeri by Charles II., and in 1682 the Duke of York appointed him governor of the colony of New York. His instructions were to conciliate the French, and to give no countenance to Indian tribes hostile to this nation. These suggestions he failed to carry out, and he was accused of inciting the tribes known as the Five Nations to war. In 1686 he gave to the city of New York a charter, and in 1688 resigned his office, but did not return to England until three years later.

DONIPHAN, Alexander William, soldier, b. in Mason county, Ky., 9 July, 1808. He was the youngest of ten children. His father, Joseph Doniphan, a native of Virginia, died in 1813. Alexander was graduated at Augusta college, Ky., in 1828, and on being admitted to the bar in 1830 began the practice of law at Lexington, Mo. Three years afterward he removed still farther west, to the village of Liberty, in Clay county. He soon came to be known as one of the foremost lawyers at the Missouri bar, but at the same time devoted himself with such zeal to military studies that he will be remembered chiefly as a soldier. It seems to have been under the influence of Albert Sidney Johnston, who was for some time stationed at Fort Leavenworth, that this military zeal was awakened in Mr. Doniphan. In 1848 he had risen in the state militia to the grade of brigadier-general, when there was trouble with the Mormons. At the head of a considerable force of state troops, Doniphan imposed terms upon the prophet Joseph Smith; the Mormons were obliged to give up their leaders for trial, lay down their arms, and leave the state of Missouri. When war began with Mexico, in 1846, Doniphan entered the United States service as colonel of the 1st regiment of Missouri mounted volunteers, and took part in Gen. Kearney's expedition to Santa Fe; and, when Kearney, in September, 1846, set out from Santa Fe for California, he ordered Col. Doniphan to proceed with such troops as could be spared from New Mexico to the city of Chihuahua, and there report to Gen. Wool. But before this order could be carried out it became necessary to reduce to submission the warlike Navajos Indians, and having accomplished this difficult task, Col. Doniphan set out from Valverde on 14 Dec. At Bracito river he was met by a superior force of Mexicans, who sent forward an officer with a black flag summoning Doniphan to surrender. "If you don't obey," said the Mexican, "we will charge, and give no quarter." "Charge and be d—d," was the laconic reply. In less than half an hour the Mexicans were put to flight, leaving more than 200 of their number killed or wounded. Of Doniphan's men not one was killed, and only seven were wounded. Two days later he occupied El Paso, where he was obliged to wait for artillery to be sent to him. On 8 Feb., 1847, he set out on a terrible march of 250 miles, through a savage and sterile country, for Chihuahua. On the 28th, having surmounted a pass, his men arrived within seventeen miles of his goal, he was confronted by a force of 4,000 Mexicans at the pass of the Sacramento. Although his own force numbered but 924 men, and the enemy were strongly intrenched, he nevertheless attacked with such fury as to completely rout the Mexicans, who lost more than 800 in killed or wounded. Doniphan's loss was one man killed and eleven wounded. It was like the ancient fights between Greeks and Persians. The next day Chihuahua surrendered. After waiting there weeks until further orders were received, the brave little army marched 700 miles to Saltillo, where they arrived on 21 May, to find the active business of the war in that part of Mexico ended. Since 1847 Col. Doniphan has led a quiet life at his home in western Missouri. In 1836, 1840, and 1854 he was elected to the legislature.

DONKIN, Robert, British soldier, b. 19 March, 1797; d. near Bristol, England, in March, 1821. He entered the army in 1746, was at the siege of Belle Isle in 1761, afterward served in Flanders with Wolfe, and through the Seven years' war, and was aide-de-camp and secretary to Gen. Ruyane, governor and commander-in-chief at Martinique. He was commissioned captain in 1770, and had risen to the rank of general in 1800. He served through the whole of the American war from 1775 till 1783, in the early part of it as aide-de-camp to Gen. Gage, and then as major of the 44th regiment. He was the author of "Military Collections and Remarks" (New York, 1777. "published for the benefit of the children and widows of the valiant soldiers inhumanly and wantonly butchered when peaceably marching to and from Concord, April 19, 1775, by the rebels ").

DONELLY, Ignatius, author, b. in Phila., May 17, 1807. He was educated in the public schools of his native city, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practiced. - He went to Minnesota in 1857, was elected lieutenant-governor in 1859, and again in 1861, and was then elected to congress as a republican, serving from 7 Dec., 1863, to 3 March, 1865. In 1865 he moved to Chicago, where he taught the art of engraving, and in 1867 he went to New York, where he became editor of the "Atalanta," a monthly national periodical. He has written an "Essay on the Sonnets of Shakespeare"; "Atalanta, the Antediluvian World" (New York, 1888), in which he attempts to demonstrate that there once existed in the Atlantic ocean, opposite the straits of Gibraltar, a large island, known to the ancients as "Atalanta"; and "Ragnarok" (1886), in which he tries to prove that the deposits of clay, gravel, and decomposed rocks, characteristic of the drift age, were the result of contact between the earth and a comet. - His sister, Eleonora Cecilia, poet, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 6 Sept. 1865, studied her profession in the public schools of Philadelphia and at the French academy of Mme. Adele Signoigné, of that city. She is a singer, having a rich contralto voice of power and considerable range. Her poetical publications are "Ballads" (Boston, 1888), "Sonnetto Solito" (New York, 1889); "Domus Dei" (1874); "Legend of the Best Beloved, and other Poems" (New York, 1880); "Crowned with Stars" (published by and for the University of Notre Dame, Indiana, 1881); "Hymns of the Sacred Heart," with music (Philadelphia, 1883); "Children of the Sacred Heart," with music (Philadelphia, 1884); "Garland of Festival Songs," with music (New York, 1883); and "Little Compliments of the Season," original, selected, and translated verses (1886). She has also published "Our Birthday Banquet," in prose and verse (New York, 1885); "The Life of Father Felix" (Philadelphia, 1886); and two compilations, "Pearls from the Casket of the Sacred Heart of Jesus" (New York, 1880) and "Signori Leaflets" (1887). Her labors have received the special apostolic benediction of Pope Leo XIII., and she has been awarded a medal by one of the chief religious orders of Ireland. Donel's "The Soliloquy of Priapus," a comedy read at a grand academy in the Royal college of the Escorial, Madrid, Spain, in May, 1887.

DONOP, Carl Emil Kurt von, Count, British officer, b. in Germany in 1740; d. in New Jersey, 28 Oct., 1777. He was 17 at the time of his appointment to the command of four battalions of grenadiers and the yagers in the detachment of Hessian troops in the British employ destined for service in the American war. He landed on Long Island on 22 Aug., 1776, and took part in the battle there on 27 Aug. In December, 1776, when Howe went into winter quarters in New York, he left Donop as acting brigadier, with two Hessian brigades, the yagers and the 42d Highlanders, to hold the line from Trenton to Burlington. On hearing of the defeat of Pell, Donop hurriedly retreated to Princeton, abandoning his children, his sick face, and wounded men. In October, 1777, Sir William Howe gave verbal orders to Col. Donop to carry Red Bank, N. J., by assault, if it could be done easily; and on the 22d he, with his Hessians, attacked Fort Mercer at that place, but was repelled after a most desperate resistance. Donop being mortally wounded. He survived the battle three days, and said to a brother officer: "It is finishing a noble career early; but I die the victim of my ambition, and of the avarice of my sovereign."

DOOLITTLE, Amos, engraver, b. in Cheshire, Conn., in 1794; d. in New Haven, Conn., 31 Jan., 1832. He was entirely self-taught, and, after serving an apprenticeship as a silversmith, began business as an engraver in 1775. While a volunteer at Cambridge he visited the battle-ground of Lexington and, to his return to Nahant. He made an engraving of the action, his first attempt in that art. This is believed to have been the first historical engraving made in America. Mr. Doolittle executed three other historical prints in relation to the expedition to Concord and Lexington.

DOOLITTLE, Edwin Stafford, artist, b. in Albany, N. Y., in 1843; d. about 1880. He studied painting under John A. Hows in 1865, and in the studio of William Hart for a short time in 1866. In 1877 he opened a studio in New York, but in 1890 went to Europe. He bought art for some time in Rome, till failing health forced him to return to the United States. In 1890 he painted his "Shadow of a Great Rock in a Weary Land," of which he made several copies. In the summer of 1872 he studied in Providence, Rhode Island, in 1872, and at Cambridge, Mass. In 1873, he visited the Ruins of the Claudian Aqueduct on the Tiber, and the Palazzo Farnese, the Palazzo Bracco, the Giudecca Canal, Venice; "The Arch of Titus," "Autumn in the Catskill Clove," "The Oxenstrasse, Lake Lucerne;" "The Old Toll-Gate;" and "Sunset on Schroon Lake." Mr. Doolittle also designed book-covers, decorated churches, and executed illuminations. The latter, including "The Soliloquy of Priapus," for the Centennial exhibition at Philadelphia, which was afterward presented to the poet Longfellow, and of "A Prayer to the Virgin," now in the convent of the Sacred Heart at Savannah, Ga. He was the author of "Grace Home and Other Poems," and was a member of "The Soliloquy of Priapus," an illuminated manuscript presented to the poet Longfellow.

DOOLITTLE, James Rood, senator, b. in Hampton, Washington co., N. Y., 3 Jan., 1815. After attending Middletown academy, he entered Geneva (now Hobart) college, where he graduated in 1834. He then studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1837, and practised at Rochester and at Warsaw, N. Y. He was elected district attorney of Wyoming county, N. Y., in 1845, and also served for some time as a colonel of militia. He removed to Wisconsin in 1851, and was elected judge of the first judicial circuit of that state in 1853, but resigned in 1856, and was elected U. S. senator as a Democratic Republican, to succeed Henry Dodge, serving two terms, from 1857 till 1869. He was a delegate to the peace convention of 1861. While in the senate, he served as chairman of the committee on finance at both sessions of the important committees. During the summer recess of 1865, he visited the Indians west of the Mississippi as a member of a special senate committee. He took a prominent part in debate on the various war and reconstruction measures, upholding the national government, but always insisting that the seceding states had never ceased to be a part of the Union. He opposed the fifteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States, on the ground that each state should determine questions of suffrage for itself. Mr. Doolittle retired from public life in 1869, and has since resided in Racine, Wis. through practising law in Chicago. He was president of the Philadelphia national union convention of 1866, and also of the Baltimore national Democratic convention of 1872, which adopted the nomination of Horace Greeley for the presidency. Judge Doolittle has been a trustee of Chicago university since its foundation, served for one year as its president, and was for many years a professor in its law school.

DOOLITTLE, Mary Antoinette, lecturer, b. in Lebanon, N. Y., 8 Sept., 1810; d. in Mt. Lebanon, Columbia co., N. Y., 31 Dec., 1886. She was graduated in New Lebanon in 1825. She became a member of the Shaker society in 1824, a deaconess in a Shaker community in 1826, and was an elderess from 1828. Her lectures on religious subjects, which were delivered in various cities in the United States, attracted much attention. In 1873-5 she edited, with Frederick W. Evans, the "Shaker and Shakeress," a periodical published at Mt. Lebanon college, and is author of an "Autobiography" (1880), and of a series of remarkable tracts on religious subjects.

DOOLITTLE, Theodore Sandford, educator, b. in Ovid, Seneca co., N. Y., 30 Nov., 1838. He was graduated at Rutgers in 1859, and at the New Brunswick theological seminary in 1862, and in the Theological seminary at Union, N. Y. He and his family left Newark church, and became pastor of Flatlands, near Brooklyn, N. Y. In 1864 he accepted the chair of rhetoric, logic, and metaphysics at Rutgers, which he has since held, becoming also associate editor of the "Christian at Work" in 1873, Western University's "gazette" and of D. T. in 1872. Dr. Doolittle has frequently lectured on art and literature. Besides articles in periodicals, he has published an "Account of the Centennial Celebration of Rutgers College" (1870), and a "History of Rutgers College," written for the Rutgers alumni.

DOOLITTLE, John Mitchell, lawyer, b. in Lincoln county, Ga., about 1772; d. there, 26 May, 1827. Little is known of his early life, or the time at which he was admitted to the bar. He was appointed solicitor-general of the Western circuit of Georgia, 2 Sept., 1802, to fill a vacancy, and on 22 Nov., 1804, was elected to the same office by the legislature. In 1816 he was elected judge of the same circuit, and in 1822 chosen first judge of the Northern circuit, to which latter place he was re-elected in 1823. He also represented his county in the legislature during the embargo and other restrictive measures adopted by the general government, and the war with Great Britain, successfully advocating the "suffering," "thirsting," and "stop" laws then passed. It is chiefly a wit that Judge Doolittle is still remembered. He was quick and brilliant in repartee and, when provoked, would launch at his adversary the most biting sarcasm. But, notwithstanding this powerful weapon with which nature had furnished him, he had a genial companion, and utterly unslelish. The reports of his wise and witty sayings, handed down by tradition, have kept the bench and bar of Georgia supplied with anecdotes for a half century.

DORANTES, Pedro (do-rah-'tays), Spanish explorer, b. in Bejar, Spain, in the 16th century; d. in Paraguay. He was attached as commissary to the expedition commanded by Caboza de Vaca, which left Santiago River Plate on 2 Nov., 1540, and reached the island of Santa Catalina, 29 March, 1541. Thence the expedition went to the continent, and as they intended to go to Asuncion by land the commander sent Dorantes to open the way. After exploring the country for three months, he reported that the journey would be difficult, and advised Cabeza de Vaca to ascend Atricua river, which was successfully followed, and the president signed the treaty of Asuncion, 11 March, 1542. Dorantes proved to be a brave, intelligent, and useful officer, but his maladministration compelled the governor to deliver him to the court of justice. At the same time the colonists were in great danger of perishing at the hands of the hostile natives, as every one thought Dorantes to be the only man able to save them, it was decided to stop the proceedings against him and let him continue at his post. The war with the Indians was short, but during that time Dorantes joined the other officers in a plot to force the governor to return to Asuncion, an eight days afterward (25 April, 1544) took an important part in the deposition of the governor and in the election of his successor, Domingo de Irala. He soon became an enemy of the new ruler, who, in 1547, went to Peru, leaving Dorantes in Mendoza's place; but Dorantes was also opposed to Mendoza, and worked for the election of Diego de Abreu, whose party he left again on the return of Irala from Peru. After the death of Irala in 1557, Francisco Ortiz de la Vega was elected governor, and Dorantes assisted in the expedition against the Indians in 1559, when he greatly distinguished himself, as well as during the expedition to Peru in 1564, where he remained for five years. In 1569 he returned to Asuncion, and lived in Paraguay to a very old age.

DOREW, Amelia Platt, philanthropist, b. in New York city, 3 Aug., 1802; d. there, 29 Jan., 1877. She was the daughter of Elias Haines, a merchant of New York, and her mother was the daughter of Robert Ogden, a distinguished lawyer of New Jersey. In 1812 she united with her mother in praying for the conversion of the world, and from that time dates her interest in foreign missions. She married, in 1821, Thomas C. Doremus, a merchant, whose wealth thereupon was freely expended in her benevolent enterprises. In 1826, with eight ladies, she organized the first mission, and she engaged Dr. Louis King to Greece to distribute supplies. Seven years later she became interested in the mission at Grand Ligne, Canada, conducted by Madame Henriette Feller, of Switzerland, and in 1830 was made president of the organization. In 1840 she began visiting the New York city prisons, and after establishing Sabbath services, used her influence in 1842 toward founding the Home for women discharged from prison, now the Isaac T. Hopper home, of which she became president on the death of her friend and co-founder, Miss Catherine M. Sedgwick. She aided in founding, in 1850, the House and school of industry for poor women, becoming its president in 1867, and in 1854 became vice-president of the Nursery and child's hospital. In 1853 she assisted Dr. J. Marion Sims in his project of establishing the New York woman's hospital, and she took an active part as president of the Presbyterian home for aged women, organized in 1866. She aided in collecting supplies to relieve the sufferers from famine in Ireland in 1849, and was for many years manager of the female branch of the City mission and tract society and of the Female Bible society. The last society in which she labored was known as the "Gould Memorial," and had for its objects the establishment of Italo-American schools. All foreign missions, without regard to creed, shared her sympathies. Her private charities for the poor were incessant, amid the cares of a family of nine children and a very extensive household, with which she adjoined a—

Her son, Robert Ogden, chemist, b. in New York city, 11 Jan., 1824, studied at Columbia, and was graduated at the New York university in 1842. Here he came under the influence of John W. Draper, and in 1843 became his assistant in the medical department of the university. This office he held for seven years, and aided Prof. Draper in many of his famous researches on light and heat. In 1847 he went to Europe, continuing his chemical studies in Paris with special reference to electro-metallurgy, also visiting the establishments where chemical products were manufactured. On his return to New York, in 1848, with Dr. Charles T. Harris, he established a laboratory on Broadway for the purpose of giving instruction in analytical chemistry, and for making commercial analyses. He was elected professor of chemistry in the New York college of pharmacy in 1849, and delivered the first lectures in his own laboratory. Meanwhile he studied medicine with Dr. Abraham J. Cox, and received his degree from the medical department of the university in 1850. He was one of the founders of the New York medical college in 1850, and at his own expense arranged and equipped its first laboratory in the United States for instructing medical students in analytical chemistry. A few years after, gas were introduced between decks, the hatches battened down, and the vapor allowed to accomplish its work of destroying the disease-germs. This heroic treatment proved thoroughly successful, and in 1875 the process was again used, with equal success. In 1871 he was appointed president of a Board for examining the druggists and their clerks in New York city, which in six months examined over 900 persons. He obtained aid from the Board of health in suppressing the gases emanating from the gas-houses, and supervised its work of testing the purity of milk. Dr. Doremus is known as a brilliant lecturer on scientific topics, and has frequently appeared before New York audiences in that capacity. He has patented methods for extinguishing fires, and for purifying mine gases, also introducing into the United States several chemical industries. The New York university has conferred on him the degree of LL.D. Dr. Doremus held for several years the presidency of the New York philharmonic society, and has also been president of the New York medico-legal society, of which organization he was a life member.

In 1851 he was elected professor of natural history in the Free academy (now the College of the city of New York), and in 1859 was associated with others in establishing the Long Island college hospital, where he lectured for several years. He was appointed professor of chemistry and toxicology in Bellevue hospital medical college, New York, in 1861, which chair he retained, A year later he went to Paris, where he spent two years in developing the use of compressed granulated gunpowder in fire-arms. The cartridges patented by him require no separate envelopes as are ordinarily used in muzzle-loading cannon, and hence no sponging of the gun after firing is necessary. Dr. Doremus was authorized by the French minister of war to modify the machinery in his apparatus so that gunpowder of the American character could be produced. Subsequently an exhibition of the firing of compressed granulated powder in cannon and small arms was made in Vincennes, before Napoleon III. and many of his generals. This system was adopted by the French government, and a large portion of the Mont Cenis tunnel was blasted with "la poudre comprimée." While in Paris he was invited to fill the chair of chemistry and physics in the College of the city of New York, and he still holds that appointment. His lectures on toxicology at Bellevue hospital medical college resulted in his being called upon by coroners and district attorneys to examine poison cases, and he introduced radical changes in the system of medical jurisprudence. He established a special toxicological laboratory in his office, and applied to it the latest scientific investigation than was formerly common in poison examinations. In the case of James Stephens, convicted of poisoning his wife, Dr. Doremus analyzed not only the entire body of Mrs. Stephens, but another human body, to test the question of "normal arsenic." He was the expert in the celebrated Burdell murder case (1857), and examined the blood-stains found in Dr. Burdell's room. In another case he proved the presence of strychnine in a body that had been buried for four months. In 1860 he came to New York, and during his voyage from Liverpool sixty of her passengers had died from cholera. A quick method of disinfection was necessary, and Dr. Doremus recommended that chlorine in enormous quantities be used. Under his direction, specially prepared vessels for the generation of this powerful gas were introduced between decks, the hatches battened down, and the vapor allowed to accomplish its work of destroying the disease-germs. This heroic treatment proved thoroughly successful, and in 1875 the process was again used, with equal success. In 1871 he was appointed president of a Board for examining the druggists and their clerks in New York city, which in six months examined over 900 persons. He obtained aid from the Board of health in suppressing the gases emanating from the gas-houses, and supervised its work of testing the purity of milk. Dr. Doremus is known as a brilliant lecturer on scientific topics, and has frequently appeared before New York audiences in that capacity. He has patented methods for extinguishing fires, and for purifying mine gases, also introducing into the United States several chemical industries. The New York university has conferred on him the degree of LL.D. Dr. Doremus held for several years the presidency of the New York philharmonic society, and has also been president of the New York medico-legal society, of which organization he was a life member.

Avery, chemist, b. in New York city, 6 Sept., 1851, was graduated at the College of the city of New York in 1870, and subsequently studied in the universities of Leipsic and Heidelberg, receiving the degree of Ph. D. from the latter institution in 1872. In 1877 he became assistant professor of chemistry in the medical department of the University of Buffalo, which office he held until 1882, when he became assistant to the chair of chemistry and physics in the College of the city of New York. Meanwhile he had received the appointment of professor of chemistry and toxicology in Bellevue hospital medical college, and professor of chemistry in the American veterinary college. The chemical laboratories in these institutions, excepting Bellevue, were organized under his direction. Dr. Doremus has made a specialty of medical chemistry and toxicology, and has frequently been called into courts as an expert in such matters. He is chemist to the Medico-legal society, and a member of the chemical societies of Berlin, Paris, and New York, and for some time edited the journal of the latter society. He has written frequent papers on sanitary chemistry and methods of analysis, which have appeared in the proceedings of the societies to which he belongs, and he is the author of a "Report on Photography," contributed to the U.S. government reports on the Exhibition held in Vienna in 1873.

DORGAN, John Aylmer, poet, b. in Philadelphia, 13 Jan., 1836; d. there, 1 Jan., 1867. He was educated in the public schools of Philadelphia, where he always resided, and was so diligent in his studies as to have prepared himself for entering the Central High school a year before he was old enough for admission. After a four-year's course at this institution, he was graduated with the degree of A. B. He then entered a law office, but he remained until his last illness. He died of consumption, and much of his poetry was written while his body was wasting from the inroads of that disease. His writing was done in the intervals of his daily toil, as he never took any vacation. In 1860 he published the first and only poem of his under the title of "Studies." In 1864 he issued a second edition, and a third in 1866. He also contributed to the "Atlantic Monthly," and other periodicals. Many of his poems are set in a minor key, but they are characterized by strong and vigorous thought. Some of his lyrics pass far beyond the work of a beginner, and indicate what their author would probably have accomplished had a longer life been vouchsafed him.

DORHMAN, Arnold Henry, merchant, b. in Portugal in 1748; d. in Philadelphia, Oktob. 24, 1813. He proved himself to be one of the strongest friends of American liberty not born on American soil, and put forth such strenuous efforts to relieve our captured seamen that the British government demanded his expatriation. He was originally a merchant, engaged in business in Lisbon, but came to this country in 1788. In view of his services, and the losses he had sustained in his devotion to the young republic, congress voted him a money compensation and a Western township, besides appointing him U.S. agent in Lisbon.

DORLAND, Thos. L., Canadian Statesman, b. in St. Anne de la Perade, Quebec, 17 Jan., 1818. He was educated at Nicolet college, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in January, 1842. He was a representative for Montreal in the Canada assembly from 1854 till 1861, when he was defeated; and for Hochelaga from 1862 till 1867. He repre- sented the same county in the commons from the union until the general election of 1872, when he was returned for Napierville, which he represented till 1874. He declined a seat in the Canadian cabinet in 1856, but was a member of the executive council of Canada several times, holding the portfo- lios of commissioner of crown lands from 2 till 4 Aug., 1858, when the government resigned; provincial secretary from May, 1862, till January, 1863, when he resigned on the question of the intercol- lation and annexation of Lower Canada and leader of the government (with John Sandfield Macdonald as premier) from May, 1863, till March, 1864, when the administration retired from office. He was sworn of the privy council, 7 Nov., 1875, and was minister of justice from that date until his appointment, in June, 1874, as chief-justice of the province. He was administra-Trinity church, Utica, in 1829—35. In 1835—7 he travelled 15,000 miles as general agent of the domestic committee of the Board of missions. But his real life-work did not begin until 1837, when he succeeded the venerable Bishop White in the reorganization of the church in the north. Dorr remained until his death. In 1888 the University of Pennsylvania conferred on him the degree of D. D., and in 1889 he was elected bishop of Maryland, but declined. In 1863 he visited Europe, extending his journey to Egypt and the Holy Land. Among his works are: "The Churchman's Manual"; "The History of a Pocket Prayer-Book, Written by Itself"; "Recognition of Friends in Another World"; "Sunday-school Teacher's Encouragement"; "Prophecies and Types Relative to Christ"; "An Affectionate Invitation to the Holy Communion"; "An Historical Account of Christ Church, Philadelphia" (1841); "Notes of Travel" (1856); and "A Memoir of John Fanning Watson" (1859).

DORR, Ebenezer Pearson, sea-captain, b. in Hartford, Ct., 13 March, 1817; d. in Buffalo, N. Y., 29 April, 1881. After following the sea for several years, Capt. Dorr settled in Buffalo in 1838, and from that time until 1843 was engaged in the navigation of the great lakes. In the latter year he became marine inspector of the New Era mutual insurance company, and acted as agent of the New York board of underwriters for the entire northwest. He was also for some time the Buffalo representative of many insurance companies, and served for seven years as president of the board of inland underwriters. He acted at different times as president of the Board of trade, the Society of fine arts, and the Historical society of Buffalo, and as vice-president of the National board of trade. He was the first to organize a regular system of wreckage on the lakes, and did much to improve the condition of seamen and to obtain recognition of their acts of heroism. When Jefferson Davis, as secretary of war, first suggested the value of weather reports, Capt. Dorr, at the request of Lieut. Maury, forwarded daily meteorological observations from Buffalo. On 5 July, 1874, Capt. Dorr read before the Buffalo historical society a paper entitled "A Brief Sketch of the First Monitor and its Inventor" (Buffalo, 1874).

DORR, Julia Caroline Ripley, author, b. in Charleston, S. C., 13 Feb., 1825. Her maternal grandparents were natives of France, who fled to South Carolina from San Domingo at the time of the servile insurrection in that island. She lost her mother when a child, and her father, William Young Ripley, a native of Vermont, removed shortly afterward to New York, and in 1830 to his native state, where he was one of the first to develop the Rutland marble quarries. In 1847 Miss Ripley married Seneca R. Dorr, then of New York, who shortly afterward went to Rutland, Vt., and lived there till his death in 1884. She has written since early childhood a number of published poems sent to the "Union Magazine" by her husband, without her knowledge, a year or two after their marriage. In 1848 she became a contributor to "Sartain's Magazine," taking one of its hundred dollar prizes by her first published prose tale, "Isabel Leslie." She has since contributed both prose and poetry to prominent periodicals. Mrs. Dorr's works include "Farmingdale," a novel, published under the pen-name of "Caroline Thomas" (New York, 1854); "Lanmere," a novel (1856); "Sibyl Huntingdon," a novel (Philadelphia, 1899); "Poems" (1871); "Expiation," a novel (1872); "Frier Anslem, and other Poems" (New York, 1879); "Daybreak, an Easter Poem" (1882); "Bermuda" (1884); and "Afternoon Songs" (1885). A series of essays on marriage, contributed by Mrs. Dorr, appeared in a religious journal under the titles "Letters to a Young Wife" and "Letters to a Young Husband," has appeared in book-form without her sanction, with the title "Bride and Bridegroom" (Cincinnati, 1873).

Dorr, Thomas Wilson, politician, b. in Providence, R. I., 5 March, 1809; d. in Providence, R. I., 27 Dec., 1883. His father, Sullivan Dorr, was a successful manufacturer. Thomas was educated at Phillips Exeter academy and at Harvard, where he was graduated in 1823. He then studied law in New York in the office of Chancellor Kent, was admitted to the bar, and began practices in his native city. He was a member of the assembly in 1833—7, being elected at first as a Federalist, but becoming a Democrat in the last-named year. In 1836 he introduced and carried through the legislature an important bill curtailing the powers of the banks in the state. At this time the movement of the.SKIP.CONTENT.IS.NOT.BAD.
DORRANCE, Gordon, clergyman, b. in Stirling County, N. Y., in 1846. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1869, taught at Griswold, Conn., and studied theology. He was pastor of the Congregational church at Windsor, Mass., in 1873-1884, and afterward preached in Sunderland, Mass., and its vicinity. He published a "History of Windsor" (Pittsfield, Mass., 1889).

DORREGO, Manuel, Argentine soldier, b. in Buenos Ayres, 15 Feb., 1857; d. at Navarro, 13 Dec., 1888. He was graduated in law at the university of San Carlos, in his native city, in 1888, and went to Santiago de Chile to discharge his duties. While he was there the news of the revolution against Spanish rule in Buenos Ayres, in 1814, reached him, and he immediately returned to his native city, and joined the revolution. The Chilian government, after its independence was recognized, struck a medal in his honor, with the inscription "Chili to its first defender." In 1811 Dorerego returned to his native city, and was appointed commander of a regiment of cavalry, and distinguished himself in the battle of Salta under Gen. Saavedra. In 1812, commanding a brigade in the army of Gen. Pueyrredon, he marched to Upper Peru, and defeated the Spanish forces in Nazareno and Suipacha, being severely wounded in the latter battle. In September of the same year he took a distinguished part in the battle of Tucuman, and in February, 1813, in that of Salta, and when Artigas took possession of Uruguay in 1814, Doregreso defeated the M. on him in the bloody battle of Guayaco, and in the following year participated in the battles of Barrios and Sourena, in which he captured many prisoners, and those of Pozo Verde and Llalatare, saving those towns from conflagration and pillage. When Pueyrredon was deposed and the M. 1819, declared Cathol. self dictator, Doregro energetically opposed him in the press, and on a charge of military insubordination and arrogance, was banished. He went to the United States, resided there nearly four years, and published "Cartas Apologéticas en contescación de auto de expatriación." (Bailit, 1817). On the downfall of the dictator in 1830, Doregro went home, was elected governor of Buenos Ayres, and organized troops to subdue the lawless bands that opposed the authorities in the interior under the name of "montoneros," whom he defeated, 2 Aug., at San Nicolas de los Arroyos. In 1833 he was elected, by a popular vote, a member of the Junta de Representantes, and in 1836 of the constituent congress, where he distinguished himself by his eloquence, defending federal principles against the central party or "Unitarios." In July, 1827, he was again elected governor of Buenos Ayres, on the resignation of Gen. Rivadavia as unitario president, and as such recognized the independence of Uruguay, notwithstanding the opposition of the other Argentine provinces, and, with the general of other American republics and European governments. On 1 Dec., 1828, Gen. Lavalle pronounced against Doregro's government, and the latter, with such forces as he could collect, marched against the insurgents, but was defeated at Navarro on the 19th, taken prisoner, and shot the same day, by Lavalle's order, without a trial. When in 1862 the federal principle triumphed, the government erected a monument to him in Buenos Ayres.

DORSEY, Anna Hanson, author, b. in Georgetown, D. C. She received her education in Mexico and her early profession in the French schools. She became a convert to the Catholic faith, and the first chaplain appointed in the U. S. navy. During her girlhood she contributed many short anonymous poems to periodicals. At the age of twenty-two she married Owen Dorsey, for many years judge of the Orphan's court in Baltimore. In 1840 she became a convert to the Catholic faith, and the first chaplain appointed in the U. S. navy. Her works include dramas, poems, novels, tales, essays, and stories for young people. Many of her stories have appeared first as sermons, and when issued in book form have been reproduced in foreign countries. One of her books, "May Brooke," republished the book form, was first published in book form in that country since the reformation. She has also written many political articles, as well as sketches and poems on national topics. The following is a partial list of her books: "The Student of Blenheim Forest" (Baltimore, 1847); "Flowers of Love and Memory," poems (1848); "Oriental Pearl" (1857; translated into German, and republished in Vienna); "Woodtree Manor" (Philadelphia, 1852); "May Brooke" (New York, 1850); "Conia, the Rose of the Algonquins" (1868); "Nora Brady's Vow" (Boston, 1869); "Mora, the Vexed" (1869); "The Fleming, or Truth Triumphant." (New York, 1869); "The Old Gray Rosary" (1870); "Guy, the Leper," an epic poem (Baltimore, 1850); "Tangled Paths" (1879); "The Old House at Glenorra" (Baltimore, 1886); "Warp and Woof," and "We de la de de," a poetic sequel to the last two.

DORSEY, Godwin Volney, physician, b. in Oxford, Butler co., Ohio, 17 Nov., 1812. He was educated at Miami university, Oxford, Ohio, and was graduated at the medical college of Ohio in 1838, where he settled in Piqua, Ohio. He was for many years president of that medical society. He was an elector on the democratic presidential ticket in Ohio in 1848, a member of the Ohio constitutional conventions of 1850 and 1873.
A member of the democratic national convention in 1856, and of the republican national convention in 1864, state treasurer of Ohio in 1861 and 1865, and a member of the convention of 1863-’4, and supplied the place of Governor Todd as elector at large on the Republican ticket in 1868.

DORSEY, James Owen, ethnologist, b. in Burt county, Neb., 31 Oct., 1847. He was educated at the Central high school (now Baltimore city college), from 1862 till 1863, and then at the theological seminary of Virginia from 1867 till 1871. After being ordained a deacon, 18 April, 1871, he was sent as a missionary of the Protestant Episcopal church to the Ponka Indians in Dakota, where he remained for two years. From 1873 till 1879 he was engaged in parish work in Maryland. He was appointed ethnologist to the U. S. geological and geographical survey of the Rocky mountain region under Major J. W. Powell, and sent to the Omaha Indians in Nebraska, remaining there until 1880. Meanwhile, in 1879, he had been transferred to the bureau of ethnology in the Smithsonian institution, and in 1880 was also appointed Ponka interpreter to Gen. Crook’s commission. Prior to 1884 his investigations were confined to the languages, medicines, and mythology of the Dakota or Siouan family, but since then he has made original researches for linguistic material among nineteen Oregon tribes of the Athapascan, Kusan, Takhilman, and Yaknon families. He was made member of the council of the Anthropological society of Washington in 1884, and general secretary in 1885, vice-president of the section on anthropology of the American association for the advancement of science in 1885, honorary local correspondent of the Victoria institute of Great Britain in 1884, and member of the Magdeburg diderssenschaft in 1886, from which organization in 1886 he received a gold medal for his works on sociology. A record of his work will be found in the annual reports of the Smithsonian institution. He has published “Ponkas A B C Wab-ta,” a Ponka primer (1879); “Bouquet Sociologs” (1888); “Osage War Customs” (1884); “Kansas Mourning and War Customs” (1885); “Omaha Sociology” (1885); “Siouan Migrations” (1886) and “Indian Personal Names” (1886). Most of the foregoing were issued as pamphlets or reprints of his government publications or transactions of societies.

DORSEY, John Syng, physician, b. in Philadelphia, 23 Dec., 1783; d. there, 12 Nov., 1818. He received his early education at the Friends’ academy in Philadelphia, studied medicine, and was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1802. The yellow fever broke out in Philadelphia a few weeks later, and committed such ravages that a hospital was opened, and the young graduate received the appointment of resident physician. He combated the idea of contagion, and strengthened his theory regarding the disease by courting infection in the most reckless manner. The next year, 1803, he visited France and England, attended the lectures of Humphry Davy, the distinguished chemist, and afterward visited the medical schools of Paris, returning to Philadelphia after an absence of about a year. He was elected adjunct professor of surgery in the school where he had been graduated but five years previously, was transferred to the chair of materia medica in 1810, and, having given two courses of lectures, was subsequently appointed professor. He died the evening of 20 April, 1818, after passing the previous day under the examination and direction of the doctors of the University of Pennsylvania, his last words being: “I am ready to die.”

DORSEY, Stephen W., politician, b. in Benson, Vt., 28 Feb., 1842. He received an academic education, and removed with his father’s family to Oberlin, Ohio. At the beginning of the civil war he enlisted in the national army, served in the west until 1864, was transferred to the Army of the Potomac, with which he remained until the close of the war. Returning to Ohio, he resumed business as an engineer, and was elected to the U. S. senate, serving from 3 March, 1875, till 3 March, 1879. During the presidential canvass of

DORSEY, Sarah Anne, author, b. in Mississippian, Miss., 16 Feb., 1829; d. in New Orleans, La., 4 July, 1879. Her maiden name was Ellis. She received a careful education, and enjoyed the advantage of extended foreign travel. Her mother was a sister of Catherine Warfield, author of “The Household of Bouvier,” who died in 1877, and left in Mrs. Dorsey’s hands a mass of manuscript, the greater part of which is still unpublished. Mrs. Dorsey’s mother married Gen. Charles G. Dahlgren, afterward of the Confederate army, and the daughter, in 1833, married Samuel W. Dorsey, of Ellenton’s mills, Md., who was then practising law and planting in Tensas parish, Louisiana. Mrs. Dorsey used her pencil with artistic skill, and performed on the harp with exquisite taste. She spoke fluently several modern languages, was a proficient in Latin and Greek, and read the Dakota or Siouan family, but since then he has made original researches for linguistic material among nineteen Oregon tribes of the Athapascan, Kusan, Takhilman, and Yaknon families. He was made member of the council of the Anthropological society of Washington in 1884, and general secretary in 1885, vice-president of the section on anthropology of the American association for the advancement of science in 1885, honorary local correspondent of the Victoria institute of Great Britain in 1884, and member of the Magdeburg diderssenschaft in 1886, from which organization in 1886 he received a gold medal for his works on sociology. A record of his work will be found in the annual reports of the Smithsonian institution. He has published "Ponkas A B C Wab-ta," a Ponka primer (1879); "Bouquet Sociologs" (1888); "Osage War Customs" (1884); "Kansas Mourning and War Customs" (1885); "Omaha Sociology" (1885); "Siouan Migrations" (1886) and "Indian Personal Names" (1886). Most of the foregoing were issued as pamphlets or reprints of his government publications or transactions of societies.

DORSEY, John Syng, physician, b. in Philadelphia, 23 Dec., 1783; d. there, 12 Nov., 1818. He received his early education at the Friends’ academy in Philadelphia, studied medicine, and was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1802. The yellow fever broke out in Philadelphia a few weeks later, and committed such ravages that a hospital was opened, and the young graduate received the appointment of resident physician. He combated the idea of contagion, and strengthened his theory regarding the disease by courting infection in the most reckless manner. The next year, 1803, he visited France and England, attended the lectures of Humphry Davy, the distinguished chemist, and afterward visited the medical schools of Paris, returning to Philadelphia after an absence of about a year. He was elected adjunct professor of surgery in the school where he had been graduated but five years previously, was transferred to the chair of materia medica in 1810, and, having given two courses of lectures, was subsequently appointed professor. He died the evening of 20 April, 1818, after passing the previous day under the examination and direction of the doctors of the University of Pennsylvania, his last words being: "I am ready to die."

DORSEY, Stephen W., politician, b. in Benson, Vt., 28 Feb., 1842. He received an academic education, and removed with his father’s family to Oberlin, Ohio. At the beginning of the civil war he enlisted in the national army, served in the west until 1864, was transferred to the Army of the Potomac, with which he remained until the close of the war. Returning to Ohio, he resumed business as an engineer, and was elected to the U. S. senate, serving from 3 March, 1875, till 3 March, 1879. During the presidential canvass of 1880 he was secretary of the Republican national committee, and did much toward securing the election of Garfield and Arthur. His services commanded the gratitude of his party, so that when he was tendered and accepted a banquet in New York, in February, 1881. At the time of the star-route exposures it was claimed that the necessary legislation was procured through his influence in the Senate, in opposition to which he was indicted by the grand jury of Washington, and, as he failed to appear at the time appointed, a warrant was issued for his arrest, and for months it was impossible to ascertain his whereabouts. Later he appeared in court, and also addressed a card to the public in explanation of his co-action with Major Dorr in the investigation of mail contracts, claiming that his relations were disinterested except so far as they benefited his brother and brother-in-law, who held contracts. The first trial resulted in a disagreement, and at the second a verdict of "not guilty as indicted" was rendered. Mr. Dorsey has since been largely occupied with real estate and other interests in the far southwest.

DORSHEIMER, William. Journalist, b. in Lyons, N. Y., 5 Feb., 1832. His father was Philip Dorsheimer, a native of Germany, afterward a westerner, one of the founders of the Republic party. William entered Harvard in 1849, but at the end of two years impaired health forced him to leave his studies. He was admitted to the bar in 1854. In politics he began as a Democrat, joined the Republican party in 1866, and in 1869 he again supported the Republican ticket. In 1859 Harvard gave him the degree of M. A. At the beginning of the civil war he was appointed major on Gen. Fremont's staff, and at the close of the Missouri hundred-days' campaign Maj. Dorsheimer returned to civil life, and published a series of articles in the "Atlantic Monthly," entitled "Fremont's Hundred Days in Missouri." In 1867 he was appointed by President Johnson U. S. district attorney for the northern district of New York. His term expired in 1871. In the Democratic state convention of 1874 he was nominated for lieutenant-governor, with Samuel T. Tilden as candidate for governor, and both were elected. Mr. Dorsheimer having a majority of 51,488 over his opponent. In the prosecution of the measures against the Canal ring, Mr. Dorsheimer was an active member. He was governor of New York, serving from 1 Jan., 1875, till 1 Jan., 1880. In 1875 he was appointed a commissioner of the state survey, and in 1883 one of the commissioners of the state reservation at Niagara, being elected chairman of the latter commission. In 1882 he was elected to congress from the 4th district of New York, and became a member of the judiciary committee, and was also chairman on the part of the house of the joint committee having in charge the proceedings of congress on the completion of the Washington monument. He was a member of the Liberal Republican national convention held in Cincinnati in May, 1872, and also of the Democratic convention held in St. Louis in 1876, a member of the committee on resolutions in the latter body, and reported the platform. He has contributed to public affairs, both as a private citizen and taken part as a public speaker in various political canvasses. In 1884 he published a biography of Grover Cleveland, the Democratic candidate for the presidency, and in July, 1885, was appointed U. S. attorney for the southern district of New York. When he retired, in September, 1885, he purchased the New York "Star," and began its publication as a daily paper on 15 Sept. of that year. Mr. Dorsheimer was one of the founders and original officers of the Buffalo fine arts society and the Buffalo historical society. DORSNONENS, Erasmus. French author. He is a resident of Montreal, and has contributed tales and sketches to the French Canadian press, among others, "Esquisses Jugiennes" in "La Patrie" (1856) and "Angelines" in "La Guipe" (1869). He is the author of "Pécheuse" (Montreal, 1860) and "Une apparition" (1860).

DOSQUET, Peter Herman. Canadian R. C. bishop, b. in Lille, Flanders, in 1801; d. in Paris, France, in 1777. He studied theology in the Seminary of St. Sulpice, Paris, became a member of the order, and was sent to Quebec in 1734 or 1732. After a short stay in the Seminary of Montreal he received orders to go to the Lake of the Two Mountains, where the Sulpicians had established a mission among the Ottawa Indians, but his health was injured by the fatigue that he underwent in the discharge of his duties, and after two years he returned to France. He was summoned to Paris to superintend the organization of a house of foreign missions, and afterward sent to Rome as procurator-general of the society. Here he was named bishop of Samos by Benedict XIII, and consecrated in 1726. He founded the Seminary of Quebec in 1728, and arrived in that city in 1729. In 1732 the needs of his diocese obliged him to go to France, where he learned that the resignation of Bishop Duplessis-Mornay made him titular bishop of Quebec. Several young ecclesiastics of the diocese of Quebec had entered religious orders with the view of escaping the hardships of missionary life, and to counteract this evil he obtained a decree from Rome that all candidates for orders should take an oath before ordination to perform missionary service. In 1734 he had the licence of the bishop or his successors to leave it. He returned to Quebec after an absence of two years, rebuilt at his own expense the Seminary of Quebec, which had been burned in 1705, endowed it with a valuable tract of land near Quebec, and erected a large and amply endowed for the students. He founded a new Latin school in Quebec, and another in Montreal, and also established a school for girls in Louisburg, conducted by sisters of the congregation of Notre Dame. His health was undermined by his labors, and he emigrated again to France. Feeling his infirmities increase, he resigned his bishopric and was appointed vicar-general of Paris.

DOSTIE, Anthony Paul. Dentist, b. in Saratoga county, N. Y.; d. in New Orleans, La., 5 Aug., 1886. He was a barber in early life, but became a dentist, and removed to Chicago, and subsequently to New Orleans. He was an active Union man during the civil war, and by his fearlessness gained both warm friends and bitter enemies. On the organization of the Louisiana government, during the war, he was appointed state auditor, and he was also a member of the constitutional convention of 1864. Dr. Dostie, in company with a Republican minority in New Orleans, was anxious to extend the suffrage to the freedmen, and to deny it to all those who had taken part against the national government. He attacked the addresses of 1864, in adjourning, had resolved that it should be the duty of the president to recall it "for any cause, or in case the constitution should not be ratified, for the purpose of taking such measures as may be necessary for the formation of a civil government in Louisiana." After March, 1865, some of his associates now began to agitate the recall of the old convention. The project was at first received everywhere with decision, being regarded as a revolutionary movement, since it was claimed that the resolution above quoted gave the convention no power to amend the constitution that it had adopted. Finally, however, the president pro tem of the convention, Dr. Dostie, in a speech made on the 30th July, 1866, on 27 July a meeting was held, which adopted resolutions calling for the disfranchisement of the negroes, and at the same time speeches were made to a large assembly of freedmen outside. That of Dr. Dostie asserted that, if the constitution was thrown into the fire, the streets of New Orleans would run with blood." This speech was afterward spoken of as "intemperate" by Gen. Sheridan. The city authorities now threatened to break up the convention as an unlawful assemblage, but the mayor was told that this would not be permitted by the U. S. forces then in the city. Part of the convention assembled on 30 July, and, while a recess was taken for the purpose of obtaining a quorum, a conflict between a body of negroes and the police occurred outside of the building. This precipitated a riot, and the negroes took refuge in the building, and were attacked by the police and by a mob, which also wreaked its animosity on members of the convention. Dr. Dostie was one of its first victims. Although unarmed, he was shot and beaten till he was supposed to be dead. He was adopted as the duellist for the bodies of other victims of the riot. He was finally taken to the hospital, where he died, six days afterward in great suffering. See "Life of A. P. Dostie, or the Conflict of New Orleans," by Emily H. Reed (New York, 1866).

Doton, Hosea, b. in Plymouth, Mass., 1 April, 1828. She received a good early education, but was mostly self-taught. She has been known as an "inspirational speaker," and as an improviser of poetry, which she produces with little or no intellectual effort, claiming that it is dictated to her by spirits. She has published a book of the poetry, "Poems from the Inner Life" (Boston, 1863) and "Poems of Progress" (1871).

Doton, Lyde, b. in Pomfret, Vt., 29 Nov. 1809; d. in Woodstock, Vt., 19 Jan., 1866. After receiving a common-school education, he studied law, and became one of the best mathematicians in the state. He taught at various places till 1850, when he opened a normal school in his native town, and continued it till 1866. Fully 150 of Mr. Doton's pupils became successful teachers, and his school was a great aid to the educational system of the state. He also worked as a surveyor, and from 1866 till his death was chief engineer of the Woodstock railroad. His work in determining the altitudes of Vermont mountains is accepted as authority. He made astronomical calculations for the "Vermont Register," and for eighteen years kept a meteorological record, making full monthly reports to the war department at Washington. He was a member of the state senate in 1865-6, and in the latter year the legislature established his method of computing interest, known as "Doton's method." He was graduated in 1845. He published many scientific articles.

Doty, Elihu, missionary, b. in Berne, Albany co., N. Y., 20 Sept., 1809; d. at sea, 30 Nov., 1864. He was apprenticed to a merchant in 1824, but afterward entered college. He received the degree of M. A. from Norwich university, Vt., in 1845. He published many scientific articles.

Doby, James Duane, governor of Wisconsin, b. in Salem, Washington co., N. Y., in 1799; d. in Milwaukee, 1856. Thrown into the street by law he removed to Detroit, Mich., in 1818, and became secretary of the territorial council and clerk of the court. In 1820 he was one of the party that, under Gen. Lewis Cass, explored the upper lakes in canoes, travelling 4,000 miles, and making treaties with the Indian tribes of that region. In 1832-33 he was U. S. judge for northern Michigan, holding his first court at Prairie du Chien, then a military outpost. He was one of a commission appointed by congress in 1830 to lay out a military road from Green Bay through Chippewa to Prairie du Chien, and in 1834 was a member of the Michigan legislature. Here he introduced a bill that led to the division of Michigan and the creation of Wisconsin and Iowa territories. He was one of the founders of the present city of Madison, Wis., secured its adoption as the city site, and was delegate to congress from the new territory, having been elected as a Democrat. In 1841-4 he was governor of the territory; but his administration was marked by bitter contentions and a collision with the legislature, and after the appointment of his successor he was placed on a commission to treat with the Indians of the northwest. He was a member of the constitutional convention of 1846, and, on the admission of Wisconsin to the Union, served two more terms in congress, from 1849 till 1855, being chosen the second time as a free-soiler. He was made United States minister of Indian affairs in 1861, and in 1864 was appointed by President Lincoln governor of Utah territory, of which he had previously been treasurer. Gov. Doty was a man of great ability, commanding presence, and winning address. Though he had many political enemies, he was beloved by all the people. He was devoted to the cause of education, especially to the establishment of a common-school education in Ohio. He went to California in the early days of the "gold fever" and led a life of adventure. Early in 1854 he embarked from San Francisco for New York, by way of Nicaragua, but remained in that country, and espoused the people. He was in the civil war then in progress, raising and commanding a company of American and English riflemen. He subsequently became major and colonel, and, after the arrival of Walker and his party (see Walker, William), was with that adventurer in the battles of Rivas and Virginia Bay. After Walker had unfolded to Doubleday his visionary scheme of a southern empire, the latter left him in disgust and returned to New York late in 1855. But he afterward joined the unsuccessful attempt to re-enforce Walker, was injured by the boiler explosion that frustrated that attempt, and subsequently accompanied a party of adventurers that sailed from Mobile, and was shipwrecked on the coast of Central America. In 1861-2 Col. Doubleday served in the capacity of cavalry in the service of the United States, and was for a time acting brigadier-general. He has published "Reminiscences of the Filibuster War in Nicaragua" (New York, 1886).

Doubleday, Edward, English naturalist, b. in 1810; d. in London in 1849. He was a member of the Society of friends. After making a tour of the United States, he published a paper on the "Natural History of North America," and was made one of the curators of the British museum. He contributed largely to periodicals on ornithology and zoölogy, and published a costly, illustrated, and valuable work on the "Genera of Diurnal Lepidoptera."

Doubleday, Ulysses Freeman, congressman, b. in New Lebanon, Conn., 15 Dec., 1792; d. in 1838. He was an active Whig of western New York, and fought at Bunker Hill and Stony Point, and was confined for some time in the Jersey prison-ship during the revolution. Ulysses was apprenticed to a printer in 1809, worked at the trade with Thurlow Weed at Cooperstown, N.Y., and in 1812 served as a private more than a year with the British at Sackett's Harbor. After working in Utica and Albany he went to Ballston Spa, N.Y., in 1818, where he established and edited the "Saratoga Courier." He removed to Auburn in 1819, and published and edited the "Cayuga Patriot," there for twenty years. He was chosen to congress as a Jackson Democrat, serving two terms, in 1831-3 and 1833-7. He became a farmer in Scipio, Cayuga co., N.Y., in 1837, but in 1846 went to New York city, where, in company with his brother Elihu, he opened a stationery store in John street, and became a speculator in land. His son, Thomas Donnelly, b. in Albany, N.Y., 18 Feb., 1816; d. in New York city, 9 May, 1864, was engaged in the book trade, and in 1852 became colonel of the 4th New York artillery. He was run over by an omnibus in Broadway, New York, and fatally injured.—Another son, Abner, soldier, b. in Ballston Spa, N.Y., 26 June, 1819, was a civil engineer in 1836-8, when he was appointed to the U. S. military academy, and on his graduation in 1843 was assigned to the 6th artillery. He served in the 1st artillery during the Mexican war, being engaged at Monterrey and at Resaca de la Palma during the battle of Buena Vista. He was promoted to 1st lieutenant, 3 March, 1847, to captain, 3 March, 1855, and served against the Seminole Indians in 1856-8. He was in Fort Moultrie from 1890 till the garrison withdrew to Sumter on 28 April of that year, and aimed the first gun fired in defence of the latter fort on 12 April, 1861. He was promoted to major in the 17th infantry on 14 May, 1861, from June till August was with Gen. Patterson in the Shenandoah valley, and then served in defence of Washing to. He commanded at Raipahannock and in the northern Virginia campaign from May till September, 1862, including the second battle of Bull Run, where on 30 Aug. he succeeded to the command of Hatcher's division. In the battle of Antietam his division held the extreme right and opened the battle, losing heavily, but taking six guns. He was promoted to major-general of volunteers. He was at Fredericksburg and Chancellorville, and succeeded in the capacities of the army. On 1 July, 1864, he was sent to Gettysburg to complete the command of one wing of the army. On 1 July, 1864, he was sent to Gettysburg to complete the command of one wing of the army. On 1 July, 1864, he was sent to Gettysburg to support Buford's cavalry, and on the fall of Gen. Reynolds, took command of the field till the arrival of Gen. Howard, some hours later. His division fought gallantly in the battle that followed, and on the third day aided in the repulse of Pickett's charge. Gen. Doubleday served on courts-martial and commissions in 1863-5, and on 12 July, 1864, temporarily commanded the southern army at Washington, and the city was threatened by Early's raiders. He was breveted colonel in the regular army on 11 March, 1863, and brigadier and major-general on 13 March, for his services during the war. In November and December, 1866, he was in command at Galveston, Tex., served as assistant commissioner of the Freedman's bureau there till 1 Aug., 1867, and, after being mustered out of the volunteer service, was made colonel of the 35th infantry, 15 Sept. 1867. He was a member of the retiring-board in New York city in 1868, and in 1869-71 superintended the general recruiting service in San Francisco, where in 1870 he suggested and obtained a charter for the first cable street-railway in the United States. After commanding posts in Texas he was retired from active service on 11 Dec., 1873. He has published "Reminiscences of Fort Sumter and Moultrie in 1860-1" (New York, 1879); "Chancellorville and Gettysburg" (1882); and articles in periodicals on army matters, the water supply of cities, and other subjects.—Another son, Ulysses, soldier, b. in Auburn, N.Y., 31 Aug., 1824, was educated at the academy in his native town. He became major in the 4th New York artillery, 23 Jan., 1862, lieutenant-colonel of the 8th U.S. colored troops, 15 Sept., 1863, and colonel of the 45th colored troops, 8 Oct., 1864. He commanded a brigade at the battle of Five Forks, and was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers, 11 March, 1865, for his gallantry there. Gen. Doubleday was for many years a member of the stock exchange in New York city.

Dougherty, Daniel, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 15 Oct., 1826. He was educated at private schools and a law school in his native city on 2 May, 1849, and soon became noted as an orator and humorist. He has been a political speaker, and was a strong friend of the national government in 1862. He was one of the founders of the first Union league, and worked earnestly for President Lincoln's re-election in 1844, but subsequently acted with the Democratic party. Mr. Dougherty's lectures on "The Stage," and "Orators and Oratory," have been much admired. Among his noteworthy addresses is one delivered from the library of Lafayette college, which was quoted and commented on by Lord Lyttton in the house of commons (1859). He made the speech of welcome to President Lincoln at the Philadelphia union league in January, 1864, and the speech nominating Gen. Hancock for the presidency of the Democratic party (Boston, 1866); "Claudius" (1867); "Stephen Dane" (1867); "Sydnie Adriance" (1868); "With Fate Against Him" (New York, 1870); "Katie's Stories for Young People" (6 vols., Boston, 1870-1); "Lucia: Her Problem" (New York, 1871); "Sons of a Desert Land" (Boston, 1873); "Boston Nights" (1873); "The Old Woman who Lived in a Shoe" (1874); "Seven Daughters" (1874); "Nelly Kinnard's Kingdom" (1876); "From Hand to Mouth" (1877); "Hope Mills" (1878); "Lost in a Great City" (1880); "Whom Katie Married" (1883); "Floyd Graddon's Honor" (1888); "Out of the Wreck" (1884); "A Woman's Inheritance" (1885); "Foos of Her Household" (1886).
DOUGHTY

DOUGLAS, Sir Charles, British naval officer, b. in Scotland; d. in 1739. After being for some time in the service of Holland he entered the British navy, and at the beginning of the American war had command of the squadron destined for the Gulf of St. Lawrence. In the spring of 1776 he forced his way up that river, through fields of drifting ice, and for the timely relief of his countrymen at Quebec; with which he closed the war. In 1787 he was created a rear-admiral. Sir Charles introduced the mode of firing guns on board ships by means of locks instead of matches. His son, Sir Howard, soldier, b. in Gosport, England, 1 July, 1776; d. in England, 9 Nov., 1861, entered the British army as a cadet at the age of 16, and served in the Peninsular and Spanish wars, in 1808-12. He was appointed governor of New Brunswick in 1823, and remained there until 1829. During his term of office he constructed military roads, established schools, and displayed a deep interest in the Presbyterian church and collegiate instruction. He was, in fact, the energetic promoter of the material, educational, and religious interests of the province. On his return to England he was made lord high commissioner of the Ionian Islands (1833-40), and represented his island in Parliament. He was created a baronet (1842) and raised to the peerage in 1848. He was promoted to the rank of general in 1851. His scientific attainments were large, and his "Treatise on Naval Gunnery" (1819), which was approved by the admiralty, is considered an authority. He was also the author of an "Essay on Military Bridges" (1810), and other works on fortifications and gunnery.

DOUGLAS, David, botanist, b. at Scone, Perthshire, Scotland, in 1798; d. in the Hawaiian Islands, 12 July, 1884. He was employed in the botanical garden of the University of Glasgow, where he attracted the notice of Dr. (afterward Sir William) Hooker, who procured for him an appointment as botanical collector in the United States to the Horticultural society of London. In this capacity he travelled extensively in America, extending his researches in 1834 as far as Oregon and California, exploring Columbia river and parts of California, and in 1837 traversing the continent from Fort Vancouver to Hudson bay, where he met Sir John Franklin, and returned with him to England, having many valuable acquisitions for English flora. Shortly after, when on a similar mission to Columbia river in 1829, he went to the Hawaiian Islands, where he was killed in 1834. Through his agency 217 new species of plants were introduced into England, and he collected 800 specimens of the California flora. A gigantic species of pine, which he discovered in California, is named Pinus Douglasii.
DOUGLAS, George, Canadian clergyman, b. at Ashkirk, Roxburghshire, Scotland, in October, 1825. In 1832 the family removed to Canada, and made their home in Montreal. After being apprenticed, in 1839, to a bookseller and printer, he began a school, and, serving in a book store, he entered into partnership with his brother, a carpenter and builder. He had become an insatiable reader, possessing a natural gift of eloquence and a polished diction unusual for his age, and enrolled himself as a medical student at the University of Toronto. In the first dist church, he became a class-leader, a local preacher, and a probationer for the ministry, and in 1849 went to England to attend the Wesleyan theological college, but was at once sent as a missionary to the Bahamas. After his ordination in 1850, he was ordered to the Bermuda Islands, residing there eighteen months, until feeble health compelled him to resign, after which he returned to Canada and was engaged eleven years in the pulpit, and seven as the president of the Wesleyan college in Montreal. As a minister he was stationed three years in each of the cities, Kingston, Toronto, and Hamilton. The disadvantages of his youth made him a student through life, and he has given special attention to literature, philosophy, the natural sciences, and metaphysics. He is one of the oldest members of the church in Canada. In 1869 the degree of L.L.D. was conferred upon him by McGill University.

DOUGLAS, James, Canadian physician, b. in Brechin, Scotland, 20 May, 1800; d. in New York, 14 April, 1886. He received his early education in Aberdeen, Scotland, and was commenced in a medical school in Edinburgh, and in 1820 was admitted to the Royal college of surgeons of that city, and soon afterward to the college of physicians of London. After serving in India as assistant surgeon of the Indian army, and in the fatal expedition to the Mosquito territory, from the coast of which he was rescued and taken to Havana, he came to New York in 1824, and for a short time resided in Utica, where he was appointed lecturer on anatomy to the Utica medical institution. In 1826 he arrived in Quebec and during the succeeding twenty-five years practised there, attaining the highest rank as a surgeon and physician. In 1845 he, together with Drs. Mearns and Fremont, founded the lunatic asylum at Beaufort, near Quebec, the institution being managed by Dr. Douglas. He was an enthusiastic traveller and antiquarian.

DOUGLAS, Sir James, colonial governor, b. in Demerara, British Guiana, 14 Aug., 1800; d. in Victoria, British Columbia, 2 Aug., 1877. He was the son of a poor Scotchman, who had emigrated to the colony a short time previous to his birth, and was early left an orphan. At the age of twelve he set out with an elder brother to push his fortunes in the British possessions of North America. Thence he went to the coast between Hudson Bay and North-west companies was very young. Young Douglas entered the service of the latter, bringing to his duties remarkable powers of endurance, an iron constitution, and a resolute spirit. He soon displayed prudence, determination, and capacity in the arduous service, which he was engaged, and his business ability and the tact that he exhibited in his intercourse with the Indians secured him rapid advancement. After the consolidation of the rival companies, he was appointed chief factor, the duties of which office compelled him to visit the remotest outposts and undergo many hardships. He was once captured and held for weeks by a tribe of Indians. Having at length succeeded in escaping, he made his way back after much suffering to one of the company's forts, where he was not only arranged for, but also had his wounds taken up as dead. In 1838 he was appointed to the chief agency for the region west of the Rocky mountains. In 1848, his headquarters being at Fort Vancouver, Oregon territory, a company of forty men landed by his orders at what is now Victoria (Canada) in 1848. To the North west, negotiations were concluded for the erection of a fort. In 1851 he became governor of the infant colony, and in 1857 his commission was renewed for a further period of six years. In 1859 Vancouver island was constituted a crown colony, with Victoria as its capital, and Mr. Douglas was appointed governor, and received the dignity of C.B. British Columbia having been organized as a colony the year previous, and the governorship also vested in Mr. Douglas, he exercised the arduous and responsible duties of his office so well that in 1858 he was knighted. The following year he retired from public life, on the expiration of his term of office, and, after making the tour of Europe, returned to end his days in the land for which he had done so much. He married in 1857, and for some years was a member of the legislative council of Victoria. In 1897 he represented Victoria in the provincial legislature.

DOUGLAS, John Hancock, physician, b. in Waterford, Saratoga co., N. Y., 5 June, 1824. He was graduated at Williams in 1843, and in the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1846, and in 1847 he settled in New York. He was appointed surgeon in the U.S. Navy and served for two years in the Navy. In 1852 he was appointed surgeon in the U.S. Public Health Service, and in 1855 he was appointed to the Regular Army as surgeon. In 1866 he was appointed to the Regular Army as surgeon.

DOUGLAS, Silas Hamilton, chemist, b. in Fredonia, N. Y., 16 Oct., 1818. He was educated at the academy in Fredonia, and then entered the office of Dr. Zina Pitcher in Detroit, Mich., for the study of medicine, after which he was graduated in Baltimore as a physician, and entered on the practice of his profession in Dearborn, Mich. In 1834 he was appointed instructor in chemistry in the University of Michigan, and at once was given charge of that department, Dr. Douglas Houghton, the professor of chemistry, being absent in the prosecution of the geological survey of Michigan. Two years later he was elected professor of chemistry, and, in 1847, he was appointed to the office of the department of medicine, which was organized in 1848. He secured at that time the promise of a chemical laboratory in the medical department, but its fulfillment was delayed until 1856, when he was given the separate building provided for twenty-six students, at a time when few of the older colleges of this country, and not many universities in Europe, were supplied with laboratories. Dr. Douglas served in charge of the chemical department of the University of Michigan for thirty-three years, during which time his labors were directed to the establishment of a laboratory of instruction, as the object of his life, a purpose in which he was eminently successful. As a result of his efforts the laboring classes received enlargements reached a capacity for 370 students in 1880. He has been connected with various scicentific societies, both as active and corresponding member. His publications include, "Tables for Qualitative Chemical Analysis" (Ann Arbor, 1864); and "Qualitative Chemical Analysis" (New York, 1873; 3d ed., 1880).

DOUGLAS, Stephen Arnold, statesman, b. in Brandon, Vt., 28 April, 1813; d. in Chicago, III., 3 June, 1881. His father, a graduate of Middlebury college, land sale, St. Louis, and Jacksonville, Ill., suddenly, when Stephen was two months old, and the widow with her two children retired to a farm near Brandon. Here her son lived with her until he was fifteen years of age, attending school during the three winter months and working on the farm the remainder of the year. During this time he earned his living; he went to Middlebury and became an apprentice at cabinet-making. This trade he followed for about eighteen months, when he was forced to abandon it on account of impaired health. He then attended the academy at Brandon for about a year. In the autumn of 1830 he moved to New York state with his mother, who had married Ghezzi Granger, of Ontario county, and attended the academy at Canandaigua until December, 1832, when he began the study of law; but, finding that his health would be unable to support him through the long course of legal studies prescribed by the state, he determined upon going to the west, and on 24 June, 1833, set out for Cleveland, Ohio, where he was dangerously ill with fever for four months. He then visited Cincinнати, Louisville, St. Louis, and Jacksonville, Ill., but failed to obtain employment. Finding his money exhausted, he walked to Winchester, where he arrived at night with only thirty-seven and a half cents. Here he secured three days' employment as clerk to auctioneer at an administrator's sale, and was paid six dollars. During the sale he made so favorable an impression that he at once obtained a school of about forty pupils, whom he taught for three months. During this time he studied law at night, and on Saturday practiced before justices of the peace.

In 1833 he removed to Jacksonville, obtained his license, and began the regular practice of law. Two weeks thereafter he addressed a large Democratic meeting in defence of Gen. Jackson's administration. In a short sketch of his early life, written in 1888, from which the foregoing facts have been taken, Mr. Douglas thus spoke of this event: "The excitement was intense, and I was rather severe in my remarks upon the opposition. The next week the 'Patriot,' the organ of the opposition, devoted two entire columns to me and my speech, and continued the same course for two or three successive weeks. The necessary consequence was that I immediately became known to every man in the county, and was placed in such a situation as to be supported by one party and opposed by the other. Within one week therefore the election showed an excess of thousands of dollars from persons I had never seen or heard of.
How foolish, how impolitic, the indiscriminate abuse of political opponents whose humble condition or insignificance prevents the possibility of injury, and who may be greatly benefited thereby, receiving the patronage of the people . . . . Indeed, I sincerely doubt whether I owe most to the kind and efficient support of my friends (and no man similarly situated ever had better and truer friends), or to the violent, reckless, and imprudent opposition of my enemies." During the remainder of the canvass Mr. Douglas bore a prominent part, and on the assembling of the legislature, although not yet twenty-two years of age, he was elected attorney-general, an officer to whom, in addition to his other duties, rode the metropolitan circuit. His opponent was Gen. John D. Harlin. This office he resigned in December, 1885, having been elected to the lower house of the legislature, of which he was the youngest member. The mental vigor and capacity he there displayed, in striking contrast with his physical frame,
which was then very slight, was for him the title of the "Little Giant," which followed him through life. In 1837 he was appointed register of the land-office at Springfield. In 1838 he was the Democratic candidate for congress; but his opponent was declared elected by a majority of five votes. Over fifty votes cast for Mr. Douglas were rejected by the canvassers because his name was misspelled. In December, 1840, he was appointed secretary of state of Illinois, and in the following February elected a judge of the supreme court. Here his decision of character was shown in the trial of Joseph Smith, the Mormon prophet. A mob had taken possession of the court-room, intending tolynch the prisoner, and the officers of the court appeared powerless.
In this emergency Judge Douglas saw a bystander idly looking on whose great strength and desperate courage were well known. Above the shouts of the rioters rose the voice of the judge appointing this man a special officer, and directing him to select his deputies and enter the court-room. In ten minutes order was restored.

In 1843 Judge Douglas was elected to congress by a majority of 400, and he was re-elected in 1844 by 1,000, and again in 1846 by over 8,000; but before the term began he was chosen U. S. senator, and took his seat in the senate, 4 March, 1847. He was re-elected in 1852 and 1858, and had served fourteen years in that body at the time of his death.
His last senatorial canvass was remarkable from his joint discussions with Abraham Lincoln. Each was conceded to be the leader of his party and the fittest exponent of its principles, and the election of one or the other to the senate was the real issue of the contest, which was for members of the legislature. Mr. Buchanan's administration was understood to be hostile to Mr. Douglas. The result of the election showed that it was a Republican popular majority of 4,000; but the Democrats returned a majority of eight members to the legislature, which secured Senator Douglas's re-election. In 1852, at the Democratic national convention in Baltimore, he was strongly supported for the presidential nomination, receiving the necessary number of ac-throughout the convention controlling more than enough votes to prevent any nomination under the two-third rule. On the sixteenth ballot he received 121 votes; but, as he was opposed to the principle of the two-third rule, he at once withdrew in favor of Buchanan, who had received a majority, thus securing his nomination. At the Democratic national convention, which was held in Baltimore, on the first ballot he received 1454 votes out of 2394 cast. On the twenty-third ballot he received 1324 votes, which was not only a large majority of the votes cast, but also a majority of all those entitled to representation. The convention having adjourned to the first ballot 1734 out of 1904 votes cast. On the second ballot he received 1814 votes out of 1944, and his nomination was then made unanimous. The succeeding delegates nominated John C. Breckinridge. Abraham Lincoln was the nominee of the Republican party, and John Bell of the Constitutional Union party. Of the electoral votes only twelve were cast for Douglas, although he received 1,373,157 of the popular votes, distributed through every state in the Union. Mr. Lincoln received 180 electoral votes and 1,806, 358 popular votes. Fugitive slaves, until his death, with the exception of about two years, Mr. Douglas's entire life was devoted to the public service. During his congressional career his name was prominently associated with numerous important measures, many of which were the offspring of his own mind or received its controlling impress. In the house of representatives he maintained that the title of the United States to the whole of Oregon up to latitude 54° 40' N. was "clear and unquestionable." He declared that he "never would, nor, therefore, yield up one inch of Oregon to Great Britain or any other country." He advocated the policy of giving notice to terminate the joint occupation, of establishing a territorial government over Oregon protected by a sufficient military force, and of putting the crown at once in a state of preparation, so that if war should result from the assertion of our just rights we might drive "Great Britain and the last vestiges of royal authority from the continent of North America, and make the United States an ocean-bound republic." In advocating the bill re- ferring to the same, impressed on Gen. Jackson by Judge Hall, he said: "I maintain that, in the exercise of the power of proclaiming martial law, Gen. Jackson did not violate the constitution nor assume to himself any authority not fully authorized and legalized by his position, his duty, and the unavoidable necessity of the case. . . . His power was commensurate with his duty, and he was authorized to use the means essential to its performance. . . . There are exigencies in the history of nations when necessity becomes the paramount law, to which all other considerations must yield." Gen. Jackson personally disliked Mr. Douglas for this speech, and a copy of it was found among Jackson's papers endorsed by him: "This speech constitutes my defense." Mr. Douglas was among the earliest advocates of the annexation of Texas, and, after the treaty for that object had failed in the senate, he introduced joint resolutions having practically the same effect. As chairman of the committee on territories in 1846, he reported the joint resolution by which Texas was declared to be one of the United States, and he vigorously supported the administration of President Polk in the ensuing war with Mexico. He was for two years chairman of the committee on territories in the house (then its most important committee, in view of the slavery question), and became chairman of the same committee in the senate immediately upon entering that body. This position he held for eleven years, until removed in December, 1858, on account of his opposition to some of the measures of President Buchanan's administration. During this time he reported and carried through the bills organizing the territories of Minnesota, Oregon, New Mexico, Utah, and Nevada, and also those for the admission of the states of Iowa, Wisconsin, California, Minnesota, and Oregon.

On the question of slavery in the territories he early took the position that Congress should maintain, that Congress should not interfere, but that the people of each state and territory should be allowed to regulate their domestic institutions to suit themselves. In accordance with this principle he opposed the Wilmot proviso when it passed the house of representatives in 1847, and afterward in the senate when it was offered as an amendment to the bill for the organization of the territory of Oregon. Although opposed to the principles involved in the Missouri compromise, he preferred, as it had been so long acquiesced in, to carry it out in good faith in the exercise of twenty-year-old section of the Missouri compromise. In August, 1848, he offered an amendment to the Oregon bill, extending the Missouri compromise line to the Pacific ocean, thus prohibiting slavery in all the territory north of the parallel of 49° 40', and by implication tolerating it south of that line. This amendment was adopted in the senate by a large majority, receiving the support of every southern and several northern senators; but was defeated in the house by nearly a sectional vote. This action of the house of representatives, which Mr. Douglas regarded as a triumphal repudiation of the principles of the Missouri compromise, together with the refusal of the senate to prohibit slavery in all the territories, gave rise to the sectional agitation of 1849-50, which was temporarily quieted by the legislation known as the "compromise measures of 1850," the most famous of which was the fugitive slave law (see Clay, Henry, vol. i., page 644). Mr. Douglas strongly supported these measures, the first four having been originally reported by him from the committee on territories. The two others, including the fugitive slave law, were added by the committee of thirteen, and the measures were reported back by its chairman, Henry Clay. On his return to Chicago, the city council passed resolutions denouncing him as a traitor, and the measures as violations of the law of God and of the constitution; enjoining the city police to disregard the laws, and urging the citizens not to obey them. The next evening a large meeting of citizens was held, at which it was resolved to "defy death, the dungeon, and the grave," in resistance to the execution of the law. Mr. Douglas immediately appeared upon the stand and announced that on the following evening he would speak at the same place in defense of his course. Accordingly, on 23 Oct., he defended the entire series of measures in a speech in which he defined their principles as follows: "These measures are the great fundamental principle that every people ought to possess the right of framing and regulating their own internal concerns and domestic institutions in their own way. . . . These things are all contrived by the constitution to each state to decide for itself, and I know of no reason why the same principle should not be extended to the territories." This constituted the celebrated doctrine of "Popular Sovereignty," sometimes called by its opponents "squatter sovereignty" (see BUTTS, ISAAC). At the close of his speech the meeting unanimously resolved to sustain all the compromise measures, including the fugitive slave law, and on the following evening the common council repealed their nullifying resolution by an overwhelming vote. In December, 1853, Mr. Douglas reported his celebrated bill to organize the territories of Kansas and Nebraska, which formed the issues upon which the Democratic and Republican parties became arrayed against each other. The passage of this bill caused intense excitement in the slaveholding states, and Mr. Douglas, as its author, was bitterly denounced. He said that he travelled from Washington to Chicago by the light of his own burning effigies. The controversy turned upon the following provision repealing the Missouri compromise: "Which, being inconsistent with the principles of non-interference by congress with slavery in the states and territories, as recognized by the legislation of 1850 (commonly called the compromise measures), is hereby declared inoperative and void; it being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery in any territory or state, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the constitution of the United States." In the congressional session of 1854-5, he denounced this and all other unconstitutional, on the ground that "it was not the act of the people of Kansas, and did not embody their will."

Mr. Douglas was remarkably successful in promoting the interests of his own state during his congressional career. In 1848 he introduced and procured the passage of the bill granting to the state of Illinois the alternate sections of land along the line of the Illinois Central railroad, which so largely contributed to developing the resources and restoring the credit of the state. He was one of the earliest and warmest advocates of a railroad to the Pacific. In foreign policy he opposed the treaty with England limiting the territory of Oregon to the forty-ninth parallel. He also opposed the Trist peace treaty with Mexico. He opposed the ratification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, chiefly because it purported to give the United States never to annex, colonize, or exercise dominion over any part of Central America. He maintained that the isthmian routes must be kept open as highways to the American possessions on the Pacific; that the time would come when the United States would be compelled to occupy Central America; and declared that he would never pledge the faith of the republic not to do in the future what its interests and safety might require. He also declared himself in favor of the acquisition of Cuba whenever it could be obtained consistently with the laws of nations and the honor of the United States.

In 1855 he introduced a bill for the relief of the U. S. supreme court, giving circuit-court powers to the district courts, requiring all the district judges in each circuit to meet once a year as an intermediate court of appeals under the presidency of a justice of the supreme court, and providing for appeals from the district courts to these intermediate courts, and thence to the supreme court, in cases involving large amounts. In 1857 he declared that the only solution of the Mormon question in Utah was to "repeal the organic act absolutely and unconditionally, blasting out of existence the territorial government, and bringing Utah under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States government."

In 1858, and again in 1860, he visited the southern states, and made many speeches. Everywhere he boldly denied the right of secession, and maintained that, while this was a union of sovereign states independent in all local matters, they were bound together in an indissoluble compact by the constitution, which established a national government inherently possessing all powers essential to its own preservation. During the exciting session of 1860-1, Mr. Douglas, as a member of the committee of thirteen, and on the floor of the senate, labored incessantly to avert civil war by any reasonable measure of adjustment, but at the beginning of hostilities he threw the whole weight of his influence in behalf of the Union, and gave Mr. Lincoln's administration an unaltering support. In public speeches he denounced secession as crime and madness, and declared that, if the new system of resistance by the sword and bayonet to the result of the ballot-box shall prevail in this country, "the history of the United States is already written in the history of Mexico." He said that "no one could be a true Democrat without being a patriot." In an address to the legislature of Illinois, delivered at its unanimous request, he urged the oblivion of all party differences, and appealed to his political friends and opponents to unite in support of the government. In a letter dictated for publication during his last illness, he said that but one course was left for patriotic men, and that was to sustain the government against all assailants. On his death-bed his last coherent words expressed an ardent wish for the preservation of the Union, and his dying message to his sons was to "obey the laws and uphold the constitution."

Mr. Douglas was somewhat below the middle height, but strongly built, and capable of great mental and physical exertion. He was a ready and powerful speaker, discarding ornament in favor of simplicity and strength. Few equalled him in personal influence over the masses of the people, and none inspired them more fervent friendship. While considering it the duty of congress to protect the rights of the slave-holding states, he was opposed to slavery itself. His father's wife was the only child of a large slave-holder, who in his last will provided that, if Mrs. Douglas should die without issue, all her slaves should be freed and removed to Liberia at the expense of her estate, saying further that this provision was in accordance with the wishes of Judge Douglas, who would not consent to own a slave. He married, 7 April, 1847, Martha, daughter of Col. Robert Martin, of Rockingham county, N. C., by whom he had three children, two of whom, Robert M. and Stephen A., both lawyers, are living (1867). She died 19 Jan., 1853. He married, 20 Nov., 1856, Addie, daughter of James Madison Cutts, of Washington, D. C., who is now the wife of Gen. Robert Williams, U. S. A. The spot on the bank of Lake Michigan in Chicago that Mr. Douglas owned in 1858 and here he mortgaged establishment in 1859, he bought from his widow by the state, and there his remains lie under a magnificent monument begun by private subscriptions and completed by the state of Illinois. It is surmounted by a statue executed by Leonard Volk. His life was written by Jackson and Child; New York, 1860; and by Henry M. Flint (Philadelphia, 1890).

DOUGLAS, William, soldier, b. in Plainfield, Conn., 17 Jan., 1742; d. in Northford, Conn., 28 May, 1777. At sixteen years of age he enlisted among the troops furnished by Connecticut to serve the rank of corporal. He was present at the taking of Quebec, and by 1768 had attained the rank of sergeant. He then removed to New Haven, became a sailor, and in a few years was master of a West India merchantman. Before the Revolution he had made a fortune. At the battle of Lexington he raised a company, became its captain, and joined Montgomery's expedition against Canada. He did good service at the capture of St. John's and Chambly, in command of the sloop on Lake Champlain, and on his return to New Haven in 1776 he had raised and equipped a company. At the battle of Long Island and in the fight for his future home, he was shot under him, his clothes were riddled with bullets, and he received wounds that forced him to retire to a farm in Northford, where he died from their effects.—His brother, John, was commissioned lieutenant-colonel early in the war, rose to the rank of colonel, and finally to that of general, and served with distinction throughout the war.—William's grandson, Benjamin, manufacturer, b. in Northford, Conn., 3 April, 1810, worked on a farm and attended school till he was sixteen years old, when he became a merchant. At the age of twenty-nine, he was appointed a clerk in the New York government of the state in 1861-2. He has been a trustee of Wesleyan University since 1862.

DOUGLASS, David, actor, b. in England about 1729; d. in Kingston, Jamaica, W. I., Mr. Douglas was a member of Middletown for several years, a republican presidential elector in 1860, and lieutenant-governor of the state in 1861-2. He has been a trustee of Wesleyan University since 1862.

DOUGLASS, David, actor, b. in England about 1729; d. in Kingston, Jamaica, W. I. Mr. Douglas was a gentleman, was a resident in England and France, and he had emigrated to Jamaica about 1750. His brother Lewis Hallam had transported his company after he found that the colonies could not yield a sufficient harvest in return for his labor, and here he found the situation. Mr. Douglas, after the death of Lewis Hallam, married his widow, and with her and the rest of the company visited the continent in 1758, where he established theatres successively in New York, Philadelphia, Newport, Perth Amboy, and Charleston, S. C., and between these localities he continued to travel, acting and superintending his company till congress closed the theatres by an act passed 34 Oct., 1774. After this he returned to Jamaica, and was appointed a judge. In early life he had been a printer, and on his return he became a partner in a thriving printing establishment. In 1772, he received valuable contracts from the government. He accumulated a fortune of £25,000.—His wife, an actress, b. in England; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1773. In her own country Mrs. Douglass had been an eminent actress at Goodman's Field's Theatre, London, as Mrs. Hal- lam, and was the leading actress at the time of Garrick's first success. She came to America with her first husband, Lewis Hallam, in 1752, and made her first American appearance at Williamsburg, Va., 5 Sept., 1752, as Portia in the Merchant of Venice. She first appeared in New York at the theatre on Nassau Street, 17 Sept., 1753, as Lucinda in "The Conscientious Lovers." She had fine talents, and her favorite parts were the pathetic. Mr. Dunlap says: "in his youth he had heard the old ladies of Perth Amboy speak almost in raptures of her beauty and grace, and especially of her pathos in her representation of Jane Shore." She retired from the stage in 1769.

DOUGLASS, David Bates, civil engineer, b. in Pompton, N. J., 21 March, 1790; d. in Geneva, N. Y., 10 Oct., 1844. He was graduated at Yale in 1813, in the same year eight companies raised by Connecticut early in 1776. He was commissioned colonel in June of that year, and took a prominent part in the disastrous campaign that ended with the evacuation of New York, distinguishing himself at the battles of Long Island and in the fight for his future home, was shot under him, his clothes were riddled with bullets, and he received wounds that forced him to retire to a farm in Northford, where he died from their effects.—In his brother, John, was commissioned lieutenant-colonel early in the war, rose to the rank of colonel, and finally to that of general, and served with distinction throughout the war. DOUGLASS, Frederick, orator, b. in Tuckahoe, near Easton, Talbot co., Md., in February, 1817. His mother was a negro slave, and his father a white man. He was a slave on the plantation of Col. Edward Lloyd, until the age of ten. He was sent to Baltimore to live with a relative of his master. He learned to read and write from one of his master's relatives, to whom he was lent when about nine years of age. His master allowed him later to hire his own time for three dollars a week, and he was employed in a ship-yard, and, in accordance with a resolution long entertained, fled from Baltimore and from slavery, 3 Sept., 1838. He made his way to New York, and thence to New Bedford, Mass., where he married and lived for two or three years, supporting himself by day-labor on the wharves and in various workshops. While there he changed his name from Lloyd to Douglass. He was aided in his efforts for self-education by William Lloyd Garrison. In the summer of 1841 he attended an anti-slavery convention at Nantucket, and made a speech, which was well received. That year he had offered the agency of the Massachusetts anti-slavery society. In this capacity he travelled and lectured through the New England states for four years. Large audiences were attracted by his graphic descriptions of slavery and his eloquent appeals. In 1845 he went to Europe, and lectured on slavery to enthusiastic audiences in nearly all the large towns of England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales. In 1846 his friends contributed $750 to have him manumitted in due form of law. He remained two years in Great Britain, and in 1847 began at Rochester, N. Y., the publication of "Frederick Douglass's Paper," whose title was changed to "The North Star," a weekly journal, which he continued for a year. His supposed implication in the John Brown raid in 1859 led Gov. Wise, of Virginia, to make a requisition for his arrest upon the governor of Michigan, where he then was, and in consequence of this Mr. Douglass went to England, and remained six or eight months. He then returned to Rochester, and continued the publication of his paper. When the civil war began in 1861 he urged upon President Lincoln the employment of colored troops and the proclamation of emancipation. In 1863, when permission was given to free negroes in the armed forces, he assisted in enlisting men to fill colored regiments, especially the 54th and 55th Massachusetts. After the abolition of slavery he discontinued his paper and applied himself to the preparation and delivery of lectures before lyceums. In September, 1870, he became editor of the "National Era" in Washington, which was continued by his sons, Lewis and Frederick. In 1871 he was appointed assistant secretary to the commission to Santo Domingo, and on his return President Grant appointed him to the territorial council of the District of Columbia. In 1872 he served as presidential elector at large for the state of New York, and was appointed to carry the electoral vote of the state to Washington. In 1876 he was appointed U. S. marshal for the District of Columbia, which office he held till 1881, after which he became recorder of deeds in the District, from which office he was removed by President Cleveland in 1886. In the autumn of 1886 he revisited England, to inform the friends he had made as a fugitive slave of the progress of the African race in the United States, and the interesting sporting the winter on the continent and the following summer in the United Kingdom. His published works are entitled "Narrative of My Experience in Slavery" (Boston, 1844); "My Bondage and My Freedom" (Rochester, 1855); and "Life and Times of Frederick Douglass" (Harper, 1881).
and missed him. Regarding this as a divine interposition in his favor, he wrapped up the sacred vessels and ran for the canoe. His two companions, believing him dead, had put off; but he waded and swam out to them, and as he was climbing into the boat, turning to see if he was pursued, he received a ball that was shot in the mouth. They next began their flight down the river, Father Doutreleau steering. The Indians pursued them for more than an hour, and kept up an incessant fire, but without effect. At last, frightened by an old musket, which he kept pointing at them, they gave way when they drew near Natchez; several volleys were fired at them. The same occurred at the Tensas, where a canoe pursued them unsuccessfully. While they were passing the Tonicas, a boat put out after them, manned by their own countrymen. They were then brought to the little French army that was marching against Natchez, which had halted among the Tonicas. Here they were attended to, and after a night's rest they proceeded to New Orleans. Father Doutreleau accomplished a journey of over a thousand miles through a hostile country! The officers of the party, to arrest his admiration of the French vessel was captured while endeavoring to break the blockade; but Doutreleau was befriended by the Brazilian admiral, and sent to Buenos Ayres, where, finding his resources nearly exhausted, he attempted to replenish them by mercantile operations. Accused of some fraudulent transactions of which he was acquitted, he left Buenos Ayres in disgust, and went to Rio Janeiro in August, 1827. A few weeks later he embarked for Congo, whence he returned to France in 1831. The stories of his discoveries in several kingdoms hitherto almost unknown to Europeans, and of his exploration of the Congo, or Zaire, and other rivers, aroused great enthusiasm among the Parisians. He received a medal from the geographical society; his researches were published under the title of "Voyage au Congo et dans l'Afrique équinoxiale" (4 vols., with a map, Paris, 1832), and his book and chart were used as the basis of subsequent maps of Africa. But the evident exaggerations of some of his statements soon awakened suspicion. The "Foreign Quarterly Review" assailed him as an impostor, and a few weeks later his decepions were more fully exposed in the "Revue des deux mondes." To cover his shame by real discoveries, he sailed for Brazil in 1833, and penetrated to the interior of South America by the Amazon, where, according to an uncertain report, he was killed. Recent discoveries in Africa prove the truth of the accusation against him, although it is supposed that he reached the interior of that country, or at least that he obtained his information from Portuguese documents before unpublished; and some geographers of repute still credit a portion of his narrative.

DOW, DanieL, clergyman, b. in Ashford, Conn., 19 Feb., 1772; d. in Thompson, Conn., 19 July, 1849. He was graduated with honor at Yale in 1798, studied theology while teaching psalmody for a livelihood, and on 20 April, 1796, was ordained pastor of the Congregational church in Thompson, Conn. His discourses were never written, but were remarkable for their logical arrangement and clear and forcible style. He published a Facsimile Letters to the Rev. John B. (1800); "The Presbyterian Catechism" (1807); a "Dissertation on the Sinaic and Abrahamic Covenants" (1811); and "Free Inquiry Recommended on the Subject of Free Masonry" (1820). His son, Jesse Erskine, b. in Thompson, Conn., 21 Jan., 1804, with Commodore Elliott in 1835, as professor of mathematics, and later became clerk in the United States patent office in Washington, D. C. He has been a correspondent of various periodicals, and written frequently in prose and verse. His literary productions have not been collected.

DOW, Lorenzo, clergyman, b. in Coventry, Conn., 16 Oct., 1777; d. in Georgetown, D. C., 2 Feb., 1834. In his youth he was disturbed by religious speculations until he accepted Methodist doctrines, and determined, in opposition to the wishes of his parents, to enter the ministry of that denomination, though his education was very limited. In 1796 he made an unsuccessful application for admission into the Connecticut conference; but two years later he was received, and in 1799 was appointed to the Cambridge circuit, N. Y. During the years 1800 and 1805, and by his coadjutors and attractively eloquent drew after him immense crowds, who sometimes indulged in a spirit of bitter persecution. He introduced camp-meetings into England, and the controversy about them resulted in the organization of the Primitive Methodists. In 1802 he preached in the Albany district, N. Y., "against atheism, deism, Calvinism, and Universalism." He passed the years 1803 and 1804 in Alabama, delivering the first Protestant sermon within the bounds of that state. In 1807 he extended his labors into Louisiana, and followed the settlers to the extravagance; he returned to N. Y. in 1810, he had no official relation to the ministry of the Methodist church, but continued to adhere to and to preach the prominent doctrines of that communion till his death. During his later years his efforts were more specially directed against the Jesuits, whom he regarded as dangerous enemies to pure religion and to republican government. His singularities of manner and of dress excited prejudices against him, causing him to be called "Crazy Dow," and counteracted the effect of his eloquence. Nevertheless he is said to have preached to more persons than any man of his time. Among his numerous writings are "Polenical Works" (New York, 1814); "The Stranger in Charleston, or the Trial and Confession of Lorenzo Dow" (Philadelphia, 1828); "A Short Account of a Long Travel with Beauties of America", (Cincinnati, 1831; often reprinted).—His wife, Peggy, whom he married in 1804, accompanied him in all his travels.

DOW, Moses A., publisher, b. in Littleton, N. H., in 1810; d. in Charlestown, Mass., 23 June, 1866. He learned the printer's trade in Haverhill, DOW.

N. H., went to Boston in 1839, was foreman in his brother's printing-office for several years, and in 1840 established a job office. In 1850 he began the publication of the "Waverly Magazine," in which he published all the contributions of fiction and poetry that were offered by school-girls and other young writers. He began with no capital, printed without discrimination the articles of amateur authors, and was successful from the beginning, finding many readers among the friends of the numerous contributors. At one time he engaged an editor of taste and experience, who rejected many of the communications; but the circulation at once fell off, and the paper was restored to its original basis. He gave much thought and care to the typography and appearance of his magazine, and it obtained a wide circulation among young people of scatty education and immature taste in the factory towns of New England and throughout the western states. Before the civil war his income from the paper had reached $60,000 a year. The circulation for many years was 50,000 copies, but it afterward sank to 20,000. He built a fine hotel in Charlestown.

DOW, Neal, temperance reformer, b. in Portland, Me., 20 March, 1804. He is of Quaker parentage, a member of the Friends of the Bedford, Mass., and was trained in mercantile and manufacturing pursuits. He was chief engineer of the Portland fire department in 1809, and in 1831 and again in 1854 was elected mayor of the city. He became the champion of the project for the prohibition of the liquor traffic, which was first advocated by James Appleton in his report to the Maine legislature in 1837, and in various speeches while a member of that body. (See Appleton, James.) Through Mr. Dow's efforts, while he was mayor, the Maine liquor law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating beverages was passed in 1851. After drafting the bill, which he called "A bill for the suppression of drinking-houses and tippling-shops," he submitted it to the principal friends of temperance in the city, but objection was made to its radical character, as certain to insure its defeat. It provided for the seizure, condemnation, and confiscation of such liquors, if found; and for the punishment of the persons keeping them by fine and imprisonment. Notwithstanding the discouragement of friends, he went to the legislature, then in session at Augusta, and a public hearing in the hall of representatives, which was densely packed by the legislators and citizens of the town, and at the close of the hearing the bill was unanimously accepted by the committee. It was printed that night, was laid on the desks of the members the next morning, and on the next day it was passed through all its stages, and was enacted without any change whatever. Mr. Dow was a member of the Maine legislature in 1838-9. On 31 Dec., 1861, he was appointed colonel of the 13th Maine volunteers, and with his regiment he joined Gen. Butler at New Orleans. He was commissioned a brigadier-general of volunteers, 28 April, 1862, and placed in command of the forts at the mouth of the Mississippi, and afterward of the district of Florida. He was wounded twice in the attack on Fort Hudson, 27 May, 1863, and taken prisoner while lying in a hospital. After imprisonment for over eight months in Libby prison and at Mobile, he was exchanged. He resigned on 30 Nov., 1864. In 1857, and again in 1866 and 1874, Mr. Dow went to England at the invitation of the Fabian Society. In 1867 he formed an alliance, and addressed crowded meetings in all the large cities. He has spent many years in endeavoring, by public speeches in the United States and Canada, as well as in Great Britain, and by frequent contributions to magazines and newspapers, to win the popular sanction for prohibition legislation. In 1880 he was the candidate for the national prohibition party for president of the United States, and received 10,505 votes. In 1884 an amendment to the constitution of Maine was adopted by a popular vote of nearly three to one, in which it was made legal to prohibit the sale and keeping for sale of intoxicating beverages was for ever forbidden, and commanding the legislature to enact suitable laws for the enforcement of the prohibition.

DOWD, Patrick, Presbyterian clergyman, b. in the County Leitir, Ireland, in 1813. He was educated at Newry and at Paris, where he went in 1832, and pursued his theological studies in the Irish college there. In 1837 he was ordained priest by Archbishop Quein, of Paris, and soon afterward returned to Ireland, where he resided until 1846, being for a part of that time president of the diocesan seminary of Armagh. In 1848 he removed to Canada, and officiated as assistant to Father Connolly, the pastor of St. Patrick's church at Montreal, until 1856, when he was appointed pastor of the congregation. On his arrival in Montreal he saw the necessity for an asylum for Irish orphans in that city, and in 1849 he established one. He was also mainly instrumental in securing the erection of the present St. Patrick's orphan asylum in Montreal, which was opened in November, 1849, and in 1856 the night-refuge for the destitute and St. Bridget's home for the old and infirm, and in 1866-7 he secured the erection of a commodious building on Lagueheutres street as a refuge for the poor. In 1877 he organized the great Irish Roman Catholic pilgrimage to Lourdes and Rome. He has been offered, on several occasions, the highest dignities of the church, and refused the offer of the bishopric of Toronto, or Kingston. He has been more thoroughly identified with the Irish Catholics of Montreal than any other clergyman.

DOWELL, Greensville, physician, b. in Albemarle county, Va., 1 Sept., 1822; d. in Galveston, Texas, in 1881. He was educated at the University of Louisville and at Jefferson medical college, and was graduated M. D. from the latter. After practicing in several towns in Kentucky he located himself in Galveston, Texas, and was for fifteen years preceding his death professor of surgery in the Texas medical college. He was a surgeon in the Confederate army, from 1863 to 1875 was editor and publisher of the "Galveston Medical Journal," originated the first medical school in Galveston, and was author of several books on that subject and yellow fever.
DOWLER, Bennet, physician, b. in Elizabeth (now Moundville), Ohio, Vol. 16, April, 1797; d. in New Orleans in 1879. He was graduated M. D. at the University of Maryland in 1827, and settled in Clarksville, Harrison co., Va., where he was postmaster for four years, but in 1836 he removed to New Orleans, and was for a few years editor of the "New Orleans Medical and Surgical Journal." Early in his career he began experimenting upon the human body, immediately or soon after death, and the results of his investigations, comprising some important discoveries relative to contractibility, calorification, capillary circulation, etc., were published in 1843-4. Since then these and other original experiments have been extended and generalized by him. His researches on animal heat, in health, in disease, and after death, which have been published in various medical journals, have disclosed the fact that post-mortem calorification takes place from fever, cholera, sunstroke, etc., arise in some cases much higher than its antecedent maximum during the progress of the trouble. Dr. Dowler began in 1845 a series of experiments in comparative physiology on the alligator, in which he succeeded in concluding that, after decapitation, the head and, especially, the trunk afford evidences of possessing the faculties of sensation and motion for hours, and that the headless trunk, deprived of all the senses but that of feeling, still retains the powers of perception and volition, and may act with intelligence in avoiding an irritant. As the result of these discoveries, he held that the functions and structure of the nervous system constitute a unity inconsistent with the assumption of four distinct and separate sets of nerves, and a corresponding four-fold sensation. He was a founder of the Royal society of northern antiquities, Copenhagen, a permanent member of the American medical association, and founded the New Orleans academy of sciences. He is the author of a "Tableau of the Yellow Fever of 1833" (1854), and various other contributions to medical science.

DOWLING, John, clergyman, b. in Penavesey, Sussex, England, 12 May, 1807; d. in Middletown, N.Y., 4 July, 1878. In an irregular way he acquired a classical education, and became a tutor in a classical institution in London in 1826. Three years later he established a school a few miles from Oxford, where he taught until 1832. In that year he emigrated to the United States and united with the Baptist church in Catskill, N.Y., where he was ordained. In 1834 he removed to Newport, R.I., and two years later was called to a church in New York. He afterward preached in Providence, Philadelphia, Newark, and other places. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by Transylvania university. Dr. Dowling's published works include "Vindication of the Baptists" (New York, 1821); "Exposition of the Prophecies" (1840); "Defence of the Protestant Scriptures" (1843); "History of Romanism" (1845), of which 30,000 copies were sold in less than ten years; "Power of Illustration"; "Days and Mornings"; and "Judson Offering." He edited a Conference book (1835); "Note on Autumn," 5th Psalm; the works of Lorenzo Dow, Cowen's "Middleton, on the Conformity of Popery and Paganism"; "Memoir of the Missionary Jacob Thomas"; and a translation from the French of Dr. Cote's work on "Rer Domus." He was associated with his father, a West India merchant. He afterward engaged in the manufacture of sperm oil and candles, and in 1854 directed a series of experiments in producing hydro-carbon oils by distillation from various substances. From a kind of bituminous coal known as Albertite he obtained what is now called kerosene. The demand for this oil increased, and Albert began to sell it as "Albertite" till the discovery of petroleum in Pennsylvania in 1851. Another result of these experiments, made principally by Mr. Joshua Merrill, superintendent of the Downes works, was the discovery in 1860 of "mineral sperm oil," and these and other products of the distillation of crude petroleum are manufactured by the company under Mr. Merrill's patents.

DOWNES, John, author, b. in Brooklyn, N.Y., 4 Sept., 1790; d. in Washington, D.C., 30 Sept., 1862. His father, John Downes, of New Haven, Conn., a descendant of one of the regicides of that name, died when his son was a few months old, and the mother removed to Shrewsbury, Mass. After his marriage, John removed to Boston and adopted music as a profession. He afterward became proficient in several languages and in medicine. After serving for a time on the board of the U.S. commission for the northeast boundary survey, he resided for a year or two in Worcester, and was engaged in making wood engravings for John W. Barber's historical collections. In 1843 Mr. Downes removed to Philadelphia, where he published the "U.S. Almanac," and other astronomical and mathematical works. He removed to Washington, D.C., in 1856, and for more than twenty years was employed as a computer for the U.S. coast survey. When the "U.S. Nautical Almanac" was established, Mr. Downes was the first to receive an appointment as a computer, and retained it till his death. He collected many rare books. He was the author of "Peter Parley's Almanacs for Old and Young" (1836-7); "Botany" (Boston, 1840); United States "Almanac Complete, or Ephemeris," (Philadelphia, 1845-7). He also calculated mathematical tables, but only a part of them have been published.

DOWNES, John, naval officer, b. in Canton, Mass., in 1796; d. in Charleston, S.C., 11 Aug., 1855. He entered the navy as a boy, and was in the frigate "New York" in the war with Tripoli, and distinguished himself in a boat attack upon Tripolitan feluccas. In March, 1807, he was made a lieutenant, and in the war of 1812 he served as executive officer of the frigate "Essex." In 1814, he was promoted to the rank of master commandant in 1813, and two years later commanded the brig "Esperier" in the squadron employed against Algiers under Decatur, and captured 17 guns and 180 men, off Cape Palos. After the conclusion of peace with Algiers, he returned to the United States, transferred Downes to his own ship the "Queen." He became captain in March, 1817, and from 1819 till 1821 commanded the frigate "Macedonia" in the Pacific. In 1828-9 he commanded the "Java." in the Mediterranean, and from 1832 to 1884 the squadron in the Pacific. On his way to his station he attacked (Feb., 1833) and nearly destroyed Queen Charlotte, off the coast of Sumatra, where an outrage had been committed on an American vessel. His sea service terminated with this cruise. From 1887 till 1842, and from 1850 till 1853, he commanded the navy-yard at Boston.

—His son, John A., naval officer, b. in Massachusetts, 23 Jan., 1813; served at sea from 1833 to 1852; in the summer of 1845, entered the navy on 4 Sept., 1847; became a midshipman in 1848, lieutenant in 1851, and a commander in 1862. During the civil war he commanded the iron-clad "Nahant," at the bombardment of Fort McAlister, 9 March, 1863, and in the first attack upon Fort Sumter, 7 April, 1863. In the report of Rear-Admiral Dupont he is mentioned as one of those "who did everything that the utmost gallantry and skill could accomplish in the management of their untried vessels." He aided in the capture of the Confederate iron-clad "Atlanta." He was on special duty at Boston during the war and for a short time, and was then given command of the Gulf squadron, in which service he died.

DOWNING, John, educator, b. in Germantown, Pa., in 1770; d. in Harrisburg, 21 July, 1827. He received classical education at the local academies at Germantown, and in 1795 opened a Latin and grammar school in Harrisburg. At this time he proposed, in a letter to Gov. Thomas Mifflin, a plan of education that foreshadowed the present public-school system, which placed him in the front rank of American educators. This plan was pronounced by Henry Barnard of Connecticut, far in advance of the age in which he lived. He was the first cashier in the Harrisburg bank, was one of the corporators of the Harrisburg and Middletown turnpike company, and the person instrumental in the erection of the bridge over the Susquehanna. In 1817 he was a member of the Pennsylvania legislature. He wrote frequently for the press, and was the author of a series of humorous sketches under the signature of "Simon the Wagoner." He compiled a work on "State Finance."

DOWNIE, George, British naval officer, b. in Ross, Ireland; d. near Plattsburg, N. Y., 11 Sept., 1814. He was the son of a clergyman, and entered the navy at an early age. He was engaged in the battle of Copenhagen, served in the West Indies, and in 1816 was placed in command of the British fleet on the lakes of Canada. He commanded the squadron in the battle of Plattsburg, and was killed while gallantly fighting the American fleet under Commodore Macdonough.

DOWNING, Andrew Jackson, horticulturist, b. in Newburgh, N. Y., 20 Oct., 1815; drowned in the Hudson, near Yonkers, 28 July, 1832. From an early age his tastes were directed to horticulture, botany, and the natural sciences, which the occupation of his father, a nurseryman, gave him opportunities to cultivate. His education was acquired chiefly in the academy of the neighboring town of Montgomery. At the age of sixteen he joined his brother in the management of the nursery, and began a course of self-education. He soon formed the acquaintance of Baron de Lesseps, of Virginia. In 1823 he married Charles Downing, who was then secretary of the state of Florida. Her novels include "Nameless" (Raleigh, 1863); "Perfect through Suffering"; and "Florida," published in the "Southern Home Journal." Her best known poems are "Pluto, the Origin of Mint Julep," being the Soul and Lamentable Fate of the Fair Minthe" (1867); "The Legend of Catawba"; and "Dixie." She has written under the pen-names of "Viola" and "Frances Davenport."

DOWNING, Sir George, British statesman, b. in Dublin, Ireland, in 1824; d. in East Hatley, Cambridgeshire, England, in 1864. His father emigrated to Salem, Mass., in 1838, and represented that place in the general court in 1838-43. His wife was one of the daughters of Gov. The lib- rary was valued at $40,000. Mr. Dowse had a golden lamb in front of his store as a sign; and, when some Harvard students broke off its head, he was so irritated that he changed his will, by which he had intended to give property valued at $100,000 to Harvard, and bequeathed it instead to the Massachusetts historical society. His library was deposited in a special room in their building in Boston, and he left $10,000 as a permanent fund for its preservation and care. He was an admirer of Benjamin Franklin, and erected a monument to his memory in Mount Auburn cemetery. A collection of essays and water-colors, which he drew in a lottery about 1820, was given to the Boston Athenæum. Dowse had given the degree of L.L. D., which Edward Everett translated into "Literary Leather-Dresser."

DOX, Peter, Myndert, lawyer, b. in Geneva, Ontario county, N. Y., 25 Oct., 1813. His maternal grandfather was John Nicholas, a representative in congress during the administrations of Washington and Adams. Peter was graduated at Hobart in 1838, studied law, and was admitted to practice. He was elected to the New York legislature in 1841, and was afterward chosen judge of the Ontario county courts. In 1855 he removed to Alabama, where he became a planter. He was elected to the convention that revised the state constitution in 1860, and took an active interest in restoring Alabama to its place in the Union. In 1869 till 1873 he was a member of congress, having been elected as a Union democrat, and served on the committee on banking and currency. He has held many minor offices, such as commissioner of schools, justice of the peace, etc. He is the author of numerous speeches in congress, including one delivered 6 June, 1870, on the admission of Georgia to the Union, the true condition of the south, and in favor of universal amnesty.

DOYLE, Sir John, British soldier, b. in Dublin, Ireland, in 1756; d. 8 Aug., 1834. He was graduated at Trinity college, Dublin, in 1774, and was a lieutenant of light infantry at Boston in 1775. He served as adjutant at the battles of Long Island and Germantown, captain of the volunteers of Ireland, then a major of brigade at the capture of Charleston, and in the battles of Camden and Holly's Hill. In command of a corps of light cavalry, he operated against Gen. Marion in the spring of 1781, and destroyed his camp at Snow Island, but, being pursued by Marion, escaped with the loss of his baggage. He served in Holland in 1794, in 1798 was made a colonel, and was soon afterward appointed secretary of war in Ireland. He served as a brigadier-general with Abercrombie in Egypt in 1800, distinguished himself, and was made a colonel in 1803, and a full general in 1814. His nephew, Sir Charles Hastings, British general, possessed several hundred volumes of good books well bound. In 1803 he set up in business as a leather-dresser at Cambridgeshire, and pursued the occupation successfully till he was far advanced in life. From the earliest period he devoted a large part of his income to the purchase of books. Standing at his bench, he would buy books, speculate on philosophical truths, and discuss the great problems of existence. By diligent search, great knowledge of bibliography, shrewdness, and strict economy in his "architectural" expenditures, he built up a library consisting of about 5,000 volumes in good, often elegant, binding, and of the best editions. It was mostly English, though containing translations of the principal authors in the ancient languages and the cultivated languages of modern Europe. The library was valued at $40,000. Mr. Dowse had a golden lamb in front of his store as a sign; and, when some Harvard students broke off its head, he was so irritated that he changed his will, by which he had intended to give property valued at $100,000 to Harvard, and bequeathed it instead to the Massachusetts historical society. His library was deposited in a special room in their building in Boston, and he left $10,000 as a permanent fund for its preservation and care. He was an admirer of Benjamin Franklin, and erected a monument to his memory in Mount Auburn cemetery. A collection of essays and water-colors, which he drew in a lottery about 1820, was given to the Boston Athenæum. Dowse had given the degree of L.L. D., which Edward Everett translated into "Literary Leather-Dresser." general of that province upon the confederation of the provinces of British North America, being placed in command of her Majesty's forces in North America. For his services in these capacities he was knighted. In 1874 he was assigned to the command of the southern district of England; in 1880 he became a major-general, and in 1870 a lieutenant-general. He is also colonel of the 87th regiment (Royaumont fusiliers).

DRAKE, Benjamin M., clergyman, b. in North Carolina, 11 Sept, 1800; d. in Mississippi in 1860. He joined the Tennessee conference in 1820, and the next year was transferred to the Mississippi conference, in connection with which he attained a man amazing position. He was instrumental in building the Ist Methodist church in New Orleans, was president of Elizabeth female academy, the first Methodist school established in that state, and was also president of Centenary college.

DRAKE, Daniel, physician, b. in Plainfield, N. J., 20 Oct, 1785; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 8 Nov, 1832. At an early age he and his family emigrated to Mayslick, Ky., where they dwelt in a log cabin. In his sixteenth year the boy left home, to study medicine in Cincinnati, and at the age of twenty found his way to Philadelphia, where he attended the medical faculty of the University of Pennsylvania. Returning to the west, he practised medicine for a year near his old home in Kentucky, and finally settled in Cincinnati. In 1815 Dr. Drake attended a second course of lectures in the University of Pennsylvania, when his health failed him, and on his return to Cincinnati he soon gained a large and profitable practice. During the two years preceding he had entered on several business ventures and speculations in connection with his father, all of which miscarried. In 1818 he was appointed one of the board of assessors in Transylvania university, Ky., and thereafter occupied a chair in other medical schools in succession, until 1835, when he organized the medical department of the Cincinnati college. Here he remained four years, and then accepted the chair of clinical medicine and pathological anatomy in the University of Louisville, Ky. He returned to Cincinnati, and once more, for a single session, filled the chair of medicine in the medical college of Ohio. In 1839 he again went to Louisville, and finally re-entered the medical college of Ohio. In 1843 he was appointed one of the editors of the "Medical and Physical Sciences," continuing as one of the editors until 1848. Among his publications are "Topography, Climate, and Diseases of Cincinnati" (a pamphlet, 1810); "Picture of Cincinnati and the Miami Country" (Cincinnati, 1816); "Practical Treatise on the History, Prevention, and Treatment of Epidemic Cholera" (1832); "Practical Essays on Medical Education" (1832); and "Systematic Treatise on the Principal Diseases of the Interior Valley of North America" (1830; 2d vol, Philadelphia, 1854). The last production of his pen was a small volume of "Discourses" (1835).—His brother, Benjamin, biographer, b. in Mason county, Ky., in 1794; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 1 April, 1841, studied and at first practised law in Cincinnati. In 1810 he established a newspaper, "The Western Farmer," ("Agriculturist," continuing for many years its editor and proprietor. Like his brother, he was much devoted to western interests. His publications include "Cincinnati in 1826" (Cincinnati, 1827); "Life and Adventures of Black Hawk" (1838); "Tales and Sketches of the West" (Cincinnati, 1839); "Life of William Henry Harrison" (1840); and "Life of Tecumseh" (1841). To the last-named work he gave much time and attention, and it is historically valuable.—Another son, Charles Daniel, lawyer, b. in Cincinnati, 11 April, 1811, received a common-school education, and spent a short time at St. Joseph's college, Ky., and at a military academy in Middletown, Conn. From 1827 till 1839 he was a midshipman in the U. S. navy, in 1833 was admitted to the bar in Cincinnati, and in 1834 removed to St. Louis, Mo. In 1847 Mr. Drake returned to Cincinnati, whence in 1859 he again went to St. Louis to practise his profession. In 1859 he was elected a member of the Missouri house of representatives and was conspicuous for his opposition to the secession movement, in 1863 a member of the state convention, and in 1864 was chosen a member of a convention to revise the state constitution. In 1867 he became U.S. senator from Missouri, but this office he resigned to accept the appointment of chief justice of the court of claims in Washington. He has published a "Treatise on the Law of Suits by Attachment in the United States" (Boston, 1854), and a "Life of Daniel Drake," his father (1871).

DRAKE, Sir Francis, navigator, b. near Tavistock, Devonshire, according to some authorities in 1539, and to others in 1543 or 1546; d. near Puer to Bello, 27 Oct, 1596. He was the eldest of twelve sons, nearly all of whom followed the sea. He received a scanty education through the liberality of a kinsman, and was apprenticed to the master of a bark, who bequeathed him his vessel as a reward for his faithful service. Being thus at the age of eighteen years not only a good sailor, but the proprietor of a ship, he made commercial voyages to the bay of Biscay and the coast of Guinea. He then sold his vessel and invested the proceeds, with all his savings, in vessels engaged in the sugar trade, and finally took command of one of his former ships and proceeded to Mexico, where he made a fortune. In 1567 there were five ships, Drake receiving command of the "Jubilet," a vessel of fifty tons. The expedition, after capturing 400 or 500 negroes on the African coast, crossed to Dominica for trade, then attempted to reach Florida, but was driven by tempest into the harbor of San Juan de Ulua (now Vera Cruz) for repairs and supplies. The next day a fleet of twelve ships arrived from Spain. A naval battle followed, in which only two of the English ships escaped. Drake returned to England, having lost his entire property, and fruitlessly petitioned the court of Spain for indemnity; but getting no satisfaction, and enraged at the treatment he received, he began to sail with the avowed object of pillaging the Spaniards. In 1570 he obtained a commission from Queen Elizabeth, and in 1572 he armed two ships at Plymouth, with which, joined by a third at Port Pheasant on the coast of South America, he made a descent on New Granada, captured and plur... dered various Spanish settlements, and made, at the expense of his enemies, a fortune vastly larger than that they had taken from him. He visited the isthmus of Darien, saw from a mountain-top the waves of the Pacific, and planned an expedition into those waters. He returned to England in 1577, and was welcomed as a hero. Under the patronage of Elizabeth, he set sail from Plymouth, 13 Dec., 1577, with five vessels and 164 gentlemen and sailors, to follow the route that had been traced by Magellan. Of these vessels, the “Pelecan” was the only one that completed the adventure. Her armament was twenty guns of brass and iron, with others stowed away in the hold. Drake pilaged the Spanish settlements of Chili and Peru, and every vessel he found, among them a royal galleon, laden with gold, silver, and precious stones, to the value of about $3,000,000. He then sailed northward, and, landing on the coast of California, took possession in the name of his sovereign, and named it Nova Albion. He remained for some weeks, and made friends with the natives, who regarded the new-comers as gods. The chief, dressed in furs, came with his official attendants, and indulged in a wild dance. Drake was asked to sit down, and the king, singing with all the rest, set a crown on Drake’s head and saluted him as Illuh (“sovereign.”) On leaving the place, Drake, fearing lest he should meet the Spaniards in superior force if he returned by the way he came, sailed to the north, and sought a passage to the Atlantic through Bering strait. Repelled by the intense cold, he again sought the Pacific, and determined by sailing westward to make the circuit of the globe. He traversed the Pacific and the Indian Ocean, doubled the Cape of Good Hope, and arrived at Plymouth in November, 1580, after an absence of two years and ten months. Elizabeth received him with favor, dined on board his ship, and made him a knight. The Spaniards demanded that he should be given up to them as a pirate, but Elizabeth refused, and the case that followed between her and Philip II. gave Drake a new opportunity. Within one year he captured and plundered Cartagena and other towns, burned the forts of San Antonio and Saint Augustine, then visited and carried back to England the remains of the colony at Roanoke, Virginia. In 1587 he was placed in command of a fleet of about thirty sail, designed to attack the Spanish ports. He destroyed 100 ships in the harbor of Cadiz, which were destined for the invasion of England, and captured an immense carrack, from papers in which the English first learned the value of the East India traffic, and the manner of carrying it on. In 1588, as vice-admiral, he commanded one squadron of the fleet, by which, with the assistance of the elements, the armada sent by Spain against England was annihilated, and in 1589 ravaged the coasts of the Spanish peninsula. In 1592–3 he was a member of parliament for Plymouth. In 1594, a report having reached England that Spain was preparing a fleet more numerous and powerful than the armada, he again entered the service. Convinced that the West Indies was the point where Spain could be best attacked, he sailed for America in 1595 with 26 vessels, in company with Admiral Hawkins. A divided command caused its usual bad results, and their first attempts were fruitless. The Spaniards were also forewarned, and the English expedition proved a melancholy failure. At Puerto Rico Hawkins died, either of a wound or disease, and Drake then gained new triumphs. He burned Santa Marta, Rancheria, Nombre de Dios, and Rio Hacha; but a fatal malady broke out among the sailors, and as he heard of the defeat of a division of his forces, which he had sent to move by land, he fell sick and died from the combined effects of fever and of mental agitation on account of the reverses of the expedition. His remains were placed in a leaden casket and buried at sea off Puerto Cabello, Venezuela.

DRAKE, Joseph Bodman, poet, b. in New York city, 7 Aug., 1875; d. there, 21 Sept., 1890. He was an only son, one of four children, who, early bereaved of their parents, were subjected to many of the pains and privations incident to poverty and the loss of their natural protectors. Like his sisters Caroline and Louise, he was a poet from childhood. Some of his juvenile verses were found by the writer among Halleck’s papers. At fourteen Drake wrote the “Mocking-Bird” and “The Past and Present,” a pair of sonnets, which furnished the concluding passage of “Leoni” in the published volume of his poems. Four years later he abandoned merchandise from a distaste for business, and began the study of medicine with Drs. Bruce and Romayne. In the winter of 1825–6 Drake and Halleck met, and immediately became friends. When the young and handsome physician was married in the summer of 1816 to a daughter of Henry Eckford, the opulent ship-builder, it was Halleck who officiated as groomsman; when he went to Europe with his accomplished wife, it was to his brother-poet that he addressed several amusing epistles; when their daughter and only child was born, she was christened Halleck; when the pulsations of his gentle heart were daily growing weaker, it was his faithful friend “Fitz” who with more than a brother’s love soothed his dying pillow; and when the grave had forever closed over Drake, it was the same sorrow-stricken friend who wrote those exquisitely touching lines so familiar to the English-speaking world, and which will ever continue to be among Halleck’s and Drake’s most enduring memorials. The Culprit Fay,” on which Drake’s reputation as a poet chiefly rests, was written in his twenty-second year, and not, as it has always been said, in the summer of 1819. A MS. copy now before the writer states that it was composed in August, 1816. In March, 1818, the literary partners began, contributing anonymously to the “Evening Post,” a series of good-natured verses known as “The Croakers,” which appeared almost daily during three months and occasionally afterward. These humorous poems were in 1860 collected and issued in a handsome octavo by the Bradford club of New York, and in 1868 they were included, with several unpublished "Croakers," in an edition of Halleck's poems. In place of the original title-page of the first edition of "Croaker & Co.," the editor of the volume made known for the first time the respective author of each poem, indicating also by the letters D. and H. the joint authorship of the literary partners, or, to quote Halleck's familiar words to his biographer, that "from the upper valley of the Tennessee, Missouri, and Indiana.—His daughter-in-law, Frances Ann, actress, b. in Schenectady, N. Y., 6 Nov., 1797: d. in Oldham county, Ky., 1 Sept., 1875. Her maiden name was Denney. She made her first appearance on the stage in the spring of 1815 at Chatsworth in "Midnight Hour." The father-in-law's company in the character of Julia in "The Midnight Hour." The first character in tragedy that she acted was Imma in "Adelgitha." At Pittsburg, Pa., she played many important parts, and in Kentucky she became a great favorite. In 1819 she tried her fortune in the northern and eastern theatres, going first to Canada and performing at Montreal and Quebec, then to Boston, and thence to New York city, where she made her first appearance, 17 April, 1820, at the Park theatre in the character of Helen Worret in the comedy of "Man and Wife," in which she gave great satisfaction. She then became a regular member of the Park company, and, after the burning of that theatre, was with the same company, performing at the Anthony street theatre, New York, and the Union theatre, New York, in 1822. She married Alexander Drake, and in 1824 appeared at the Chatham theatre, New York, as Imogene in "Bertram." Shortly after this she returned to the west with her husband to his father's theatres, occasionally visiting the east during the vacations of her western engagements, married the actress Ophelia in New York was in 1825 at the Park theatre, 22 April, as Bianca in "Fazio." Mrs. Drake, after the death of her husband, married George W. Cutter (q. c.); but the match proved unhappy, they separated, and at a mutual appointment she returned to the stage, resuming the name of Drake, and managed theatres in Kentucky and Ohio.

DRAKE, Samuel, actor, b. in England, 15 Nov., 1768; d. in Oldham county, Ky., 16 Oct., 1854. He may properly be called the pioneer of the drama in the west. It is said that his name was Bryant by his mother, who resided in the county of York, England, and in 1818-25 was a teacher. He early showed a fondness for literary pursuits, and in 1828 established in Boston, whither he had removed, the first antiquarian book-store in the United States, devoting special attention to the collection of books relating to the early history of this country. He continued to do business as a bookseller and publisher during his life, and the most noted writers of his day availed themselves of the store of information that he had collected. Mr. Drake was one of the founders of the New England historical genealogical society in 1844. Its president in 1858, and for many years edited its quarterly "Register," contributing many articles to its pages. In 1858-60 he resided in London, England. He published Church's "Entertaining History of King Philip's War," the "Indian Biography" (1833); "Book of the Indians," a standard authority (1833; 11th ed., enlarged, 1851); "Old Indian Chronicle" (1836; new series, 1867); "Indian Captivities" (1839); "Account of the Family of Drake" (1845); "Review of Savage's ""Notes of a Journey Through North and Antiquities of Boston"" (1856); "Result of Searches among the British Archives" (1860); "Memoir of Sir Walter Raleigh" (1863); editions, with introduction and notes, of Mather's ""Indian War of 1675-9"" (1863); "Early History of New England"" (1864); and Hubbard's ""Indian Wars"" (1865); "The Witchcraft Delusion in New England," being reprints of Mather's "Wonders of the Invisible World," and Robert Cale's "More Wonders of the Invisible World," with introductions and notes (3 vols., 1866); "Annals of Witchcraft in the United States" (1869); and "History of the French and Indian War" (1870).—His son, Francis Samuel, b. in Northwood, N. H., 22 Feb., 1828; d. in Washington, D. C., 22 Feb., 1883, was educated in the public schools of his youth, then entered a counting-house in that city, went to Leominster, Mass., in 1862, and engaged in bookselling there till 1867, when he returned to Boston. Mr. Drake inherited his father's taste for historical work, and was an eager collector and orator before he wrote anything for publication. He prepared without aid a "Dictionary of American Biography," the materials for which he was twenty years in collecting (Boston, 1872). He also published a "Memoir of the Mother of the Cincinnati" (1873); "Life of Gen. Henry Knox" (1873); "The Town of Roxbury" (1873); "Tea-Leaves" (1884); and "Indian History for Young Folks" (1885). He edited Schoolcraft's "History of the Indians," and contributed articles on Brighton, Watertown, and Roxbury to the "Memorial History of Boston." His "Dictionary of American Biography," with his latest corrections and all the materials that he had gathered for a new edition, is incorporated in "Appletons' Cyclopedia of American Biography."—Another son, Samuel Adams, b. in Boston, Mass., 20 Dec., 1828, was educated in the public schools of his native city. He went to Kansas in 1858 as telegraphic agent of the New York associated press, became the regular correspondent of the St. Louis "Republican" and the Louisville "Journal," and was edited for Leavenworth "Times." On the organization of the state militia at the beginning of the civil war he became adjutant-general of the northern division, and in 1861 was a captain of militia in the service of the United States. He had risen to the rank of brigadier-general of militia in 1863, and in 1864 was colonel of the 17th Kansas volunteers, commanding the post of Paola, Kan., during Price's invasion of Missouri in that year. In 1871 Gen. Drake returned to Massachusetts. His first publication was "Hints for Emigrants to Pike's Peak" (a pamphlet, 1860). He has since written "Old Landmarks of Boston" (1872); "Old Landmarks of Middlesex" (1873); "Nooks and Corners of the New England Coast" (1875); "Bunker Hill" (1875); "Captain Nelson" (1879); "History of Middlesex County, Mass." (1880); "Heart of the White Mountains" (1881); "Around the Hub" (1881); "New England Legends" (1883); "Our Great Benefactors" (1885); and "The Making of New England" (1886).

DRAFER, John William, scientist, b. in St. Helen's, near Liverpool, England, 5 May, 1811; d. in Hastings-on-Hudson, 4 Jan., 1882. He was the son of John C. Draper, a Wesleyan clergyman, who was interested in scientific subjects. Young Draper was educated, at home under private tutors, and at Woodhouse grove, a public-school of the Wesleyans, where he developed a fondness for science. In 1829 the University of London was opened, and he was sent there to receive a course of instruction in chemistry under Dr. Edward Turner, but the death of his father kept him from attaining a degree, and in 1832 he came to the United States with his mother and his sister Catherine, settling in the Wesleyan colony in Christiansville, Va., where for a time he devoted himself entirely to scientific pursuits. He was graduated at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1836. The results of several investigations published in the "Journal of the Franklin Institute" and in Silliman's "American Journal of Science" gave him reputation, and he was called to be chairman of the chair of chemistry and natural philosophy in Hampden-Sidney college, Va., where he began his official duties in the autumn of 1836, meanwhile prosecuting his researches in various directions. In 1837 he was elected professor of the proposed medical department in the University of New York, but the financial difficulties of that year caused the abandonment of the project. Two years later, however, he was appointed professor in the university and in 1840 was very active in the organization of the medical department, becoming its professor of chemistry. In 1850 he succeeded Dr. Valentine Mott in the presidency of the medical college, and maintained his relations with that institution until 1873. His lectures at the university itself were continued until 1881. During the civil war he was appointed one of the committees to inspect hospitals and attend the wounded of Antietam and Gettysburg. Of his many investigations, one of the earliest was in relation to capillary attraction, and in 1844 he published a memoir on that subject. His study of osmose, especially in reference to its physiological actions, dates from 1836. The application of the principles investigated to the explanation of sap in plants and of blood in animals is admirable. His researches on the chemical phenomena of light in both the organic and inorganic world include the most valuable work done by him. Daguerre's announcement of his discovery of the action of sunlight on silver, and its application to the permanent preservation of views, in 1839, was at once taken up by Draper. He made it the subject of special study, and was the first person in the world to apply it to individuals. The first photographic portrait from life was made by me," he says, and "the face of the sitter," his sister Catherina, "was dusted with a white powder"; but a few trials showed that this was unnecessary. In March, 1840, he presented the Lyceum of natural history in New York with the first photograph ever taken by photography. In the investigation presented to the British association in 1843, on the action of light on chlorine gas, he showed that this gas underwent a decided modification, in consequence of the absorption of the chemical rays from sunlight. He investigated light from the standpoint of its action on the growth of plants, and his results were presented in a memoir read before the American philosophical society on the occasion of its centennial anniversary in 1834. Besides his connection with the development of photography, he was actively engaged with Samuel F. B. Morse in his production of the electro-magnetic telegraph. The series of experiments made by Prof. Draper in the laboratory of the university was the first to establish with certainty the practicability of utilizing electricity for the transmission of the telegraphic message. In 1847 he published his "Production of Light by Heat," an important and early contribution to spectrum analysis, and one that is worthy of special recognition, for it clearly outlines the principles that subsequently were recognized and form part of the brilliant researches of Kirchoff, who has since specialized the department of prismatic analysis. In this connection he also deserves mention as the first to photograph the diffraction spectrum. His "Production of Light by Chemical Action" (1848) and his "Researches in Actino-Chemistry" (1872) were most important contributions to science. He received in 1875 the Rumford medals from the American academy of science and arts for his researches in "Radiant Energy." In 1860 Princeton conferred on him the degree of LL.D. He was a member of many of the learned societies of Europe, including the Accademia dei Lincei of Rome and the Physical society in London. In the United States he was elected to the American philosophical society in 1843 and to the National academy of sciences in 1877. He was the first president of the American chemical society, and his inaugural address, delivered in November, 1876, was on "Science in America." The titles of his papers exceed 100, and extend from 1832 till 1880. His lectures and addresses, principally delivered at the beginning of the medical course in the university, also include "Thoughts on the Future Civil Policy of America," before the Historical society of New York in 1864, and before the Unitarian institute in Springfield, Mass., in October, 1877, on "Evolution—its Origin, Progress, and Consequences." The most celebrated of his larger works is "History of the Conflict between Science and Religion" (New York, 1874), which has passed through twenty editions in the English language, and has been translated into the French, Spanish, German, Dutch, Russian, Italian, Portuguese, Polish, and Servian languages. It placed him on the "Index Expurgatorius," and Draper praised Galileo, Copernicus, Kepler, Locke, and Mill on the list of those under the ban of the church. His other works are "Elements of Chemistry," by Robert Kane, American edition, edited (New York, 1849); "A Treatise on the Forces which Produce the Organization of Plants" (1844); "Text-Book on Chemistry" (1846); "Text-Book on Natural Philosophy" (1847); "Human Physiology, Statical and Dynamical" (1866); "History of the Intellectual Development of Europe" (1862); "Thoughts on the Future Civil in 1862 of America" (1875); "A Text-Book on Physiology" (1866); "History of the American Civil War" (3 vols., 1867-70); and "Scientific Memoirs; being Experimental Contributions to a Knowledge of Radiant Energy" (1879). See Memoir by Prof. George F. Barker, contributed to "Dictionary of National Biography" and "National Academy of Sciences" (vol. ii.). His son, John Christopher, physician, b. in Mecklenburg county, Va., 31 March, 1833; d. in New York city, 20 Dec., 1888, entered the University of New York in 1853, but, leaving the classical department, was graduated at the medical school in 1857. From March, 1856, till July, 1857, he held the office of house physician and surgeon to Bellevue hospital, and published at that time papers on "The Production of Urea" (February, 1856) and "Experiments on Respiration" (July, 1856), which were subsequent to his graduation was spent in Europe in travel and study. In December, 1858, he became professor of analytical chemistry in the University of New York, holding that chair until 1871. From 1880 till 1863 he was professor of chemistry in Cooper Union, and in 1863-64 was an officer of a New York regiment to the front as assistant surgeon, serving for three months. In 1863 he was elected professor of natural sciences in the College of the city of New York, and in 1866 professor of chemistry in the medical department of the University of New York, which chairs he held until his death. Dr. Draper was a member of the New York academy of medicine, and in 1873 received the degree of LL.D. from Trinity college. He was an occasional contributor to medical and scientific journals, and, besides twenty-four original papers, published numerous articles on diet, dress, and ventilation, in the "Galaxy" (1868-71). In 1872-3 he edited the "Year-Book of Nature and Science," and also the department of "Natural Science" in "Scribner's Monthly," from 1872 till 1875. He published "Text-Book on Aerology and Hygiene" (New York, 1866); "A Practical Laboratory-Course in Medical Chemistry" (1882); and a "Text-Book of Medical Physics" (1885).—Another son, Henry, physicist, b. in Prince Edward county, Va., 7 March, 1837; d. in New York city, 20 November, 1861, studied at the University of New York, but on the completion of his sophomore year abandoned the classical course to study medicine, and was graduated in 1858, publishing a thesis on "The Changes of Blood-cells in the Spleen." Subsequently he traveled in Europe, and visited the great telescope of Lord Rosse in Ireland.
the sight of which impressed him with a desire to construct a similar but smaller instrument, and attract the attention of the American Society of Arts in the fine arts. Draper demonstrated this instrument before the Smithsonian Institution in 1865, and became the standard authority on the subject. Meanwhile he had been appointed on the medical staff in Bellevue hospital, and served for eighteen months. In 1866 he became professor of physiology in the university, and in 1866 to the similar chair in the medical department, becoming soon afterward its dean. His specialty of celestial photography was not neglected, and a photograph of the fixed lines in the spectra of the stars is of this period. His most celebrated photograph was that of the moon, and it probably gives the best representation of its surface thus far made. Upward of 1500 negatives were made by Dr. Draper with this instrument. In 1867 he married Mary Anna, the daughter of Courtland Palmer, who became his assistant in astronomy. In 1869 it was engaged in the spectrum of a Lyrae (Vega), showing dark lines, a result then unique in science, and in 1873 the finest photograph of the diffraction spectrum ever made. He resigned his chair in the medical department in 1874, in order to devote more time to original research, but the death of Mr. Palmer in 1874 made it necessary for him to take charge of a large estate. In 1874 he was chosen by congress to superintend the photographic department of the commission appointed to observe the transit of Venus. For three months he was busily occupied in Washington, organizing, experimenting, and instructing. Home duties prevented him from joining the expedition, but he received from congress a gold medal in recognition of his services. In 1876 he made a negative of the solar spectrum, and one of the spectropods is an incandescent sun upon the same plate, with their edges in contact. These results and corroborative experiments led him to assume the presence of oxygen in the sun, and in July, 1877, he announced “The Discovery of Oxygen in the Sun by Photography, and a New Theory of Solar State.” The investigations culminating in perhaps the most original discovery ever made in physical science by an American, could not pass unchallenged. English astronomers were slow to accept the results, and in 1879 Dr. Draper submitted his research to the Royal astronomical society in London. The sun told its own story, and its light, acting on the delicate metallic film on the glass negative, was evidence that could not be disputed. In 1878 he observed the solar eclipse of 28 July, in Rawling, W. T., and obtained excellent photographs of the corona. Later he photographed the great nebula of Orion, and in 1890 photographed the spectrum of Jupiter. In 1882 he received the degree of LL.D. from the University of New York and also from the University of Wisconsin during the same year. Draper was a member of scientific societies in the United States and in Europe, and in 1877 was elected to the National academy of sciences. His original papers number but a score, and are principally devoted to researches on the chemistry of heavenly bodies. They appeared chiefly in the "American Journal of Sciences," Draper also published "A Text-Book on Chemistry," (New York, 1866). Biographical sketches of Henry Draper were contributed by Prof. George F. Barker to the "American Journal of Science" (February, 1889), the "Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society" (December, 1888), and to the "Biographical Memoirs of the National Academy of Sciences" (vol. iii.). —Another son, DANIEL, meteorologist, b. in New York City, 2 April, 1841, was educated at the University grammar-school, and subsequently followed scientific studies under Professor James S. Dana, and his lectures, also becoming his amanuensis in the preparation of the "History of the Intellectual Development of Europe" and in the "History of the American Civil War." In the designing and construction of the observatory in Hastings-on-Hudson, Daniel was associated with his father. For five years he served an apprenticeship in the Novelty iron-works, New York, where he was employed during the building of the "Roanoke" and other iron-clads for the U. S. government in the early years of the civil war. In 1869 he was appointed director of the New York meteorological observatory established at that time in Central park. For the work under his control he designed and manufactured the self-recording instruments, including the photographic barograph and thermographs (diagram). In 1873 he studied snow, direction of the wind, and for the velocity and force of the wind. In 1871 he began a series of meteorological investigations in connection with the observatory. Of these, his consideration of the question "Does the clearing of land increase or diminish the fall of rain?" showed that the prevalent impression of its diminishing was not founded on fact. Besides several researches concerning the variations in temperature, he took up the question "Do American storms cross the Atlantic?" It was found that from 1889 till 1878 eighty-six out of eighty-eight storms were found to have crossed the European coast. This led to telegraphic announcement of storms from the United States to Great Britain. A more recent investigation has shown the increased prevalence of pneumonia at times when the atmosphere is clear. His researches have earned for him the degree of Ph. D. from the University of New York, and they have been fully described in scientific journals both in the United States and Europe. He is a member of scientific societies and has published annual reports of the observatory. He has been brilliant in his researches in meteorology.

DRAPER, Lyman Copeland, antiquarian, b. in Hamburg (now Evans), Erie co., N. Y., 4 Sept., 1815. He removed with his father to Springfield, Pa., and in 1821 to Lockport, N. Y., where he was educated at the village school, worked on his father's farm, and in 1830-3 served as clerk in various stores. In the latter year he went to Mobile with a relative, and began obtaining information about the Creek chief Weatherford. Since then he has devoted his life to the collection of material relating to western history and biography. And is regarded as an authority on those subjects. In 1835-6 he was a student in Grove college, Ohio. In 1838 he began an extensive correspondence with well-known western pioneers, and had personal interviews with many of them, thus collecting a great amount of valuable historical information. He became editor of a paper in Pontotoc, Miss., in 1840, and in 1842 was clerk in the office of the Erie canal at Buffalo, N. Y. The next ten years were spent mostly in the family of a relative in Philadelphi, in the prosecution of his search for historical data. He removed from there in 1853, to become corresponding secretary of the State historical society, and has been instrumental in securing for it a library of 116,000 volumes and valuable antiquarian collections. In 1858-9 he was state superintendent of instruction, but in 1860 returned to his former office. On 6 Jan., 1897, he declined a re-election, intending to devote himself to his scholarship and the improvement of the library for life. The state university gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1871. Dr. Draper has published "Collections" of the State historical society, mostly gathered by himself (10 vols., 1853-87); "Madison, the Capital of Wisconsin" (1867); "The Hocking Hills" (1874); "Ohio's 14 Oct. and "King's Mountain and its Heroes" (Cincinnati, 1881). He has many works in preparation, two of which, "The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence" and "Border Forays and Adventures," are nearly ready for publication.

DRAPER, Richard, journalist, b. in 1727; d. 6 June, 1774. He was early appointed printer to the governor and council of Massachusetts, and retained the office through his life, becoming the proprietor of the "Massachusetts Gazette and Boston News Letter," which strongly supported the crown in its controversies with the colonists. Mr. Draper was esteemed the best compiler of news of his day. He was a man of feeble health and of great gentleness of manner.—His wife, Margaret, d. in England about 1800, continued, with the aid of her son, John, the management of the journal from his death to the evacuation of Boston in 1776, and her paper was the only one published there during the siege. She went with the British army to Halifax, and thence to England, where she spent the rest of her life, receiving a pension from the government. Dr. John McFingal, of New York, speaks of her as "Mother Draper."

DRAPER, Simeon, politician, b. in 1804; d. in Whitestone, L. I., 6 Nov., 1866. He was for many years a prominent merchant in New York, but was unfortunate in business, and became an auctioneer. He was an active Whig, and was long the personal and political friend of William H. Seward, but soon after the formation of the Republican party he opposed Gov. Seward's policy. He was several times a member of the Whig state central committee, and chairman of the finance committee of the Union party. He was provost marshal for New York city in 1862, and in 1864 was appointed by President Lincoln collector of the port of New York, but resigned in 1865. At the time of his death he was government cotton agent, having charge of all the cotton received at New York. For many years before the war Mr. Draper was one of the board of governors in charge of the city charities, and after the law creating this board was repealed he was a commissioner of public charities and corrections until his resignation of the office in 1864.

DRAPER, William Henry, Canadian jurist, b. near London, England, 11 March, 1801; d. in Yorkville (then a suburb of Toronto), 3 Nov., 1877. His father was rector of St. Anthony's church, London, and when the son was a mere lad he ran away from home and went to sea. He was afterward a clerk in an East India house, but in his eighteenth year he gave up the sea and set out for Canada, where he arrived in 1820. After teaching for a time, he began the study of law, and in 1828 was called to the bar. In 1837 he was called to the legislative council, and accepted a seat in the executive council. In 1838 he became solicitor-general of Upper Canada, and, on the resignation of Mr. Hagerman, was appointed to succeed him as attorney-general. He was not in favor of many of the reforms introduced into the system of governing the British-American colonies subsequent to the rebellion of 1837. In 1847 Mr. Draper withdrew from political life and became puisne judge of the court of queen's bench, and in February, 1856, was made chief justice of the court of common pleas, and in 1865 chief justice of Upper Canada. He returned to the United States in 1864, when he became president of the court of errors and appeals. He was a brilliant man, and so eloquent and persuasive was his style of address that he was known among his associates as "Sweet William."

DRAPER, William Henry, physician, b. in Brattleborough, Vt., 14 Oct. 1819, was graduated at Columbia in 1841, and at the College of physicians and surgeons in 1855. After study in Paris and London, he settled in New York city as a general practitioner, and has acquired a large practice. In 1880 he became clinical professor of diseases of the ear and eye in the College of physicians and surgeons, which chair he held until 1886, when he was appointed professor of clinical medicine. He is attending physician of the New York and the Roosevelt hospitals, also consulting physician of St. Luke's and of the Presbyterian hospitals. In 1886 Dr. Draper became president of the New York academy of medicine. He has contributed numerous professional papers to medical journals.

DRAYTON, William, jurist, b. in South Carolina in 1738; d. 18 May, 1790. After studying law four years, he resided in London, and in 1762 he published a journal from his death to the evacuation of Boston in 1776, and her paper was the only one published there during the siege. She went with the British army to Halifax, and thence to England, where she spent the rest of her life, receiving a pension from the government. Dr. John McFingal, of New York, speaks of her as "Mother Draper."

congressional career he retired from public life and removed to Philadelphia, partly influenced by the illness of his wife, and returned to his business in the nullification contest. In 1839-40 he was Nicholas Biddle's successor as president of the U. S. bank, and tried to revive it, but retired as soon as he had placed the remaining assets of the bank in the hands of assignees, which he had decided to do as the only course, though it was unpopular.—Thomas Fenwick, son of the second William, b. in South Carolina about 1807, was originally named Thomas. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1828, and served in garrison in Jefferson barracks, Mo., and Newport, Ky., in 1828-29, and then on telegraphical duty, but resigned on 15 Aug., 1836, and became a civil engineer in Charleston, Louisville, Ky., and Cincinnati, Ohio. He was also a planter in St. Luke's parish, S. C., in 1838-61, was a state senator in 1853-5, and president of the Charleston and Savannah railroad in 1853-61. At the beginning of the civil war he entered the Confederate service, was commissioned brigadier-general, and commanded the Confederate troops on Hilton Head island at the time of the Port Royal expedition. In which he might be a distinctly better officer, Capt. Percival, Drayton, commanded a national vessel. After the war Gen. Drayton became a farmer in Georgia, and in 1870 was made president of the South Carolina immigration association, and removed to Charlotte, N. C.—His brother, Percival, naval officer, b. in South Carolina, 25 Aug., 1812; d. in Washington, D. C., 4 Aug., 1865, entered the navy as a midshipman, 1 Dec., 1827, was promoted to lieutenant, 28 Feb., 1838, and served on the Brazilian, Mediterranean, and Pacific squadrons. He was attached to the naval observatory in Washington in 1852, and soon after was sent on a course of reading in history and international law, and was admitted to the bar, and became an active writer on political topics. In 1879 he published letters opposing the patriotic associations in the colonies, which were answered by Christopher Gadsden and John McKenzie. Drayton then went to England, republished his letters there, and was induced to court, and on 27 Feb., 1871, received from the king the appointment of privy councillor for the province of South Carolina. He took his seat on 3 April, 1872, but as the revolutionary crisis approached he was often in opposition to the crown officers and judges, and aided the passage of laws that would otherwise have been negatived. On 25 Jan., 1874, in spite of the jealousy aroused by his course, he was appointed an assistant judge by his uncle, Lieut.-Gov. Bull. Just before the session of the first Continental congress he was suspended from his offices under the crown, but he lost none of his influence in the state. He became a member of the council of safety in 1776, and soon afterward its president, and was active in advising the seizure of the provincial arsenals and British mails. He was also president of the provincial congress in 1775, and in March, 1776, after the formation of a temporary constitution, became a privy councillor.

highest terms, in his last report, of Drayton's "capacity and courage." He afterward became fleet-captain of the West Gulf squadron, and commanded Farragut's flag-ship, the "Hartford," in the battle of Mobile Bay, 5 Aug., 1864. In his detailed report of that action Farragut spoke of Drayton's "courage and ability," and said: "He is the fleet-captain of my squadron, and one of more determined energy, untiring devotion to duty, and zeal for the service, tempered by great calmness, I do not think adorns any navy." Capt. Drayton afterward accompanied Farragut to New York, where a formal reception was given to the two officers on 12 Dec., 1864. On 28 April, 1865, Capt. Drayton was made chief of the bureau of navigation, and died while discharging the duties of that office. He was especially distinguished as a flag-officer, and his refined manners and knowledge of law caused his services in that position to be sought by every commanding officer with whom he sailed. and chief justice of the state. He delivered a charge to the grand jury of Charleston on 22 April, in which he declared that the king had abdicated the government, and had no more authority over the people of South Carolina. On 15 Oct., 1776, and in October, 1777, he delivered other charges bearing on the question of independence, which had been before the country some years among the Montagnais, Kistinauxen, Papinchois, and Abnakis. He accompanied a French expedition to the west in 1666, and made an unsuccessful attempt to reach Hudson's bay by land in 1661.

DREW, Daniel, capitalist, b. in Carmel, Putnam co., N. Y., in 1788; d. in New York city, 19 Sept., 1878. He began active life as a cattle-dealer, but soon became connected with steamboat-building, and constructed many of the Hudson river boats. Still later he became identified with railroad enterprises, and was a prominent speculator in Wall street. When in the height of prosperity his fortune was estimated at from $5,000,000 to $15,000,000. In 1866 he was treasurer of the Erie railroad company, to which he lent the sum of $3,500,000, receiving as security $3,000,000 of shares of unused stock and $5,000,000 of bonds convertible into stock. He began to sell the stock "short" at the new prices quoted by Van Buren and his adherents being the purchasers. When the contracts matured Drew converted the bonds into stock and threw into the market the 58,000 shares of stock that he possessed. The matter resulted in litigation, which Drew and his party to New Jersey, where they remained until the case was settled. Drew afterward lost heavily, and when the firm of Kenyon, Cox & Co., of which he was a partner, failed, he was compelled to make an assignment and ultimately to go into bankruptcy. He was then president of several educational foundations, furnishing the "Drew ladies' seminary" at Carmel, and giving large sums to Wesleyan university, Middletown, Conn. In 1866 he gave $250,000 to found the Drew theological seminary of Madison, N. J., and increased this sum by successive donations of from $1,000,000 to $15,000,000.

DREW, George Alexander, Canadian jurist, b. near the village of Williamstown, Glengarry co., Ont., 28 Feb., 1827. He is descended from Scotch loyalists who settled in Canada at the time of the American Revolution. He was educated at the grammar-schools of Williamstown, where he studied law under the late John Sandfield Macdonald at Cornwall, and was called to the bar of Upper Canada in 1854. In 1855 he settled in Kiora, in that province, and practised his profession. In 1867 he was elected to parliament for North Wellington, and was re-elected for the same constituency in 1878. At the dissolution of parliament in 1882 he retired from politics, and was appointed judge of the county of Wellington, and afterward local judge of the high court of justice. that year. He was considered the best Irish comedian on the American stage. — His wife, Louisa, arrived in London, England, subsequent to Paris, in 1812, the daughter of an English actor named Lane, and first appeared in child's parts at eight years of age. In 1828 she came to the United States with her mother, acted in New York and Philadelphia, and then visited Jamaica and other West Indies, and from this country she left in 1838. In 1833 she again played in the New York theatres, and in 1834, at the age of fourteen, essayed the part of Julia in the "Hunchback," at the Boston theatre. In 1835 Miss Lane went to New Orleans, where she played Lady Teazle in "School for Scandal," and other high comedy parts, with success, and "being leading lady at the pay of twenty dollars per week." She married Henry Hunt, a veteran English opera singer, in 1836, and in 1842-3 appeared at intervals in New York city as a member of the stock companies of various theatres, sustaining parts in domestic dramas, melodramas, and light comedy. In 1847 she went to Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Louis, Mobile, and New Orleans, where, as she says, "cold tea and molasses and water were provided as beverages in plays where the business required, and the refreshment was management, for once, taking high temperance grounds." In 1848, after separating from her first husband, she married George Mossop, a young Irish comedian, who died in 1849, and in the following year she became the wife of Mr. Drew. In 1857 Mrs. Drew went on a tour through this country with her husband, and in 1861 she assumed the sole management of the Arch street theatre, which has since been under her control. In her youth, notwithstanding the grace and refinement of her manner, she was too self-conscious, and her acting displayed neither favor nor frankness, but her later years and her success and earnest emulation have finally made her one of the most versatile and finished artists on the English-speaking stage. Her greatest successes have been in high comedy parts.

DREXEL, Francis Martin, banker, b. in Drexel, Pennsylvania, on Tyrol, 7 April, 1792. d. 5 June, 1863. In 1803 he was sent to study Italian and the fine arts in a Catholic institution near Turin. On his return in 1809 he found his country invaded by the French, and to escape conscription he went to England, and subsequently to Paris. In 1815 he returned to the Tyrol incognito, and, finding the conscription still in force, went to Bern and continued his studies of painting. He sailed for the United States in 1817, from Amsterdam, and settled in Philadelphia. After a few years he went to Peru and Chili, painting portraits, among which was one of Gen. Simon Bolivar, with whom he contracted a warm friendship. He visited South America twice, and went to Mexico, where he remained for some time. After his permanent settlement in Philadelphia he founded the banking house of Drexel & Co., in 1817, which represents one of the largest enterprises of that character in the United States. The Paris house, Drexel, Har- jes & Co., was founded in 1868, and the New York house, Drexel, Morgan & Co., in 1871. — His son, Anthony Joseph, banker, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1819. At the age of twenty-five, he founded in the bank, having been identified with this enterprise since the age of thirteen. He is zealous in promoting science and art, especially music, and contributes largely to philanthropic and educational interests. — Also the son of Joseph Wilhelm, banker, b. 24 Jan., 1823. His son, Joseph, was in turn at the Philadelphia high-school, and he has travelled through Spain, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, and Greece.

He retired from business in 1878. He holds the offices in New York of chairman of sanitary commission, commodore, in command of the New York philharmonic society, trustee of the National academy of sciences, and director of the Metropolitan opera-house. Among his philanthropic interests is a 200-acre farm near New York, where he has a personal interest in the work. He has taught agriculture until places are procured for them. He owns a large tract of land in Maryland, which has been divided into lots, and houses, mills, etc., erected upon them. These farms are sold to poor persons at cost. About 7,000 acres in Michigan is held for the same purpose.

DRINKER, Anna, poet, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 3 Dec., 1827. She was educated in Philadelphia, and has resided principally in Montrose, Pa. She is best known by her pen-name, "Edith May." Her contributions to "Sartain's Magazine" and to the "Home Journal" about 1848-50, attracted much attention. She has published "Poems by Edith May" (Philadelphia, 1854); "Tales and Verses for Children" (1855); and "Katy's Story." DRISCOLA, Michael, clergyman, b. in Drum- beagh, county of Antrim, Ireland, 1 Nov., 1827, and afterwards president of S. Francis Xavier college, New York. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1831, and was ordained in 1840. He exercised his ministry in Kentucky and New York, and attended the victims of the ship-fever in Canada. He was superior of the theological seminary at Farmham, and afterward president of St. Francis Xavier college, New York. He erected the church of St. Michael in Troy, N. Y.

DRISIUS, Samuel, clergyman, b. in 1602; d. about 1673. His name is also written as Dries and Driesch. His parents were Germans, and he was educated in the German language. The West India company was anxious to have a minister that could occasionally officiate in English, and requested his appointment to New Amsterdam. The Classis permitted him to deliver a sermon before them in Dutch, in order to test his pronunciation, and he left Holland on 4 April, 1653, and came to New Amsterdam, having charge of the church until 1673. On account of his knowledge of English he was employed and used as a spymaster to negotiate a treaty. He united with Maspeslenis in protesting against the Lutherans. In order that the youth might secure a classical education in New Amsterdam, Drissius proposed to establish a Latin school. He was often called to preach to the French and English, and for a while did once a month to the Huguenot and Vandois settlers on Staten Island, but after a few years was compelled to relinquish these services on account of failing health.

DRISLER, Henry, scholar, b. on Staten Island, N. Y., 27 Dec., 1818. He was graduated at Columbia in 1839, for several years he was a classical instructor in the grammar-school of the college, was appointed tutor of Greek and Latin in Columbia in 1843, adjunct professor of those languages in 1845, professor of Latin in 1857, and professor of Greek in 1857. Professor Drissler attended Barnard in 1873 and was acting president of the university. He was engaged with Dr. Anthon in the preparation of a series of text-books, and has re-edited, with additions, Liddell and Scott's edition of Paschas's Greek Lexicon, with a sale of 25,000 copies. After publication (1851-3) he had in press a greatly enlarged edition of Yonge's English-Greek Lexicon, which...
DROLET, Gustave Adolphe, Canadian lawyer, b. in St. Pie, Quebec, 16 Feb., 1844. He was educated at St. Hyscuitne college, and admitted to the Montreal bar in 1866. He was becoming acquianted with the theory and practice of law, when in 1876 he was called before a special jury at the centennial exhibition at Philadelphia, as counsel for Canada, and was created a knight of the Order of St. Gregory the Great by Pope Pius IX. in 1877. He has written many valuable papers for reviews and periodicals of Canada on topics in politics, political economy, and literature.

DROKE, Ezekiel Sylvester, journalist, b. in Zanesville, Ohio, 25 Jan., 1842. He was graduated at Harvard in 1866, studied law, and was admitted to the New York bar in 1869. Since 1880 he has been associated with the staff of the New York "Herald," as a writer on law subjects. He has contributed numerous articles to periodical literature and to the "American Cyclopaedia," the "Annual Cyclopaedia," and the "Encyclopedia Britannica," and is the author of a treatise on "Law of Property in Intellectual Productions, embracing Copyright and Copyright," (Boston and London, 1876), which is the first of its kind ever published on that subject.

BROWN, Thomas Messinger, chemist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 19 March, 1842. He was graduated at the Philadelphia high-school in 1869, and at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1874. Subsequently he studied at the Freiberg, Saxony, mining-school, and in the University of Heidelberg. During 1869-70 he was instructor of metallurgy in Harvard, and from 1874 till 1881 he held the chair of analytical chemistry at Lafayette college. In 1885 he was appointed 1st lieutenant of U. S. infantry on 18 Feb., 1847. He was brevetted 1st lieutenant for bravery at Chapultepec and the capture of the city of Mexico. After the war with Mexico he was transferred to the artillery, was engaged in the action at Blue Water, Neb., served as aide-de-camp to Gen. Harney in the Mexican expedition, and was in Kansas during the troubles of 1856. From 1856 till 1858 he served as acting assistant adjutant-general at the head-quarters of the Department of the West, and subsequently as adjutant in the artillery-school. At the beginning of the civil war he was appointed assistant adjutant-general of the U. S. army, and promoted to captain on 14 May, 1861, major on 3 Aug., 1861, and lieutenant-colonel on 17 July, 1862. On 13 Nov., 1862, he was brevetted colonel, and on 13 March, 1865, brigadier-general for services during the war. He continued in the adjutant-general’s department, was stationed in 1868–8 at Philadelphia, in 1888–9 at Atlanta, the headquarters of the Department of the South, receiving promotion as brigadier-general of volunteers in June, 1868, and succeeding Gen. Townsend, on the latter’s retirement, as adjutant-general of the army, with the rank of brigadier-general.—His elder brother, Simon Henry, soldier, b. in Greensburg, Westmoreland co., Pa., in June, 1807; killed in action at the storming of the city of Mexico, 13 Sept., 1847, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1830. He was assistant instructor of infantry tactics there in 1830–2, was engaged in the Florida war and the Canada border disturbances, and as captain of artillery in the occupation of Texas in 1846, served through the Mexican war, distinguished himself at Contreras, where he recaptured two field-pieces taken from his regiment at Buena Vista, and fell at the assault on the city of Mexico after he had entered the Belen gate while directing the attack on the town.

DRUMGOOLE, John C., clergyman, b. in County Longford, Ireland, in 1828. He studied for the priesthood in the United States, and, soon after being ordained priest, offered himself to Archbishop McCloskey to establish a mission for the protection of homeless and forlorn children. His first effort in this direction was to take charge of “St. Vincent’s lodging-house” in Warren street, which was transferred to his care by the Society of St. Vincent de Paul in 1871. He changed the title of that of “St. Vincent’s home for the protection of homeless and forlorn children,” and, in addition to opening evening-schools, and lodged homeless boys at a nominal price, with a free dinner on Sundays to encourage them to come for religious instruction. The extraordinary efforts the boys made to thrive in the habit encouraged him to attempt still greater enterprises. As there was not room enough in the building in Warren street for the children who applied for admission, Father Drumgoole was forced to build a larger house. To obtain funds he established the Mission of the immaculate virgin and the Homeless and forlorn children. The fund accumulated from the subscriptions to this paper enabled Father Drumgoole to purchase the property on the corner of Lafayette place and Great Jones street, and to erect there, at a cost of over $400,000, the first house of the “Mission of the immaculate virgin,” in which more than 500 boys are boarded and educated. Shortly afterward he purchased a farm of over 500 acres on Staten Island, gave it the name of Mount Lyttevo farm, and erected on it large buildings in which nearly 700 children are comfortably housed. The expense of carrying on these establishments has come almost entirely from the subscriptions to Father Drumgoole’s paper. Since 1871 has provided for 15,790 children. But the benefits his mission have extended to children. During the same period 6,264 destitute adults have been clothed, thousands of outside poor have been fed every year, and the number who receive their breakfasts gratuitously every day exceeds 300.

DRUMMOND, Sir Gordon, British soldier, b. in Quebec in 1771; d. in London, England, 10 Oct., 1854. His father, a member of a Perthshire (Scotland) family of distinction, was paymaster-general of the forces at Quebec. The son entered the army, as a boy under the age of 12 in 1790. In 1794 he had attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel, with the command of the 8th or king’s regiment. He served in the campaign in Holland in 1794–5, and especially distinguished himself at the siege of Nimquet in 1795; was at Minorca in 1800, and took part in the operations against the enemy in the Bosphorus and in the capture of Cairo and Alexandria. He afterward served as a staff-officer at Jamaica for a few years, and in Canada in 1808–11, being promoted lieutenant-general in the latter year. In August, 1816, he went to Canada again as second in command to Sir George Prevost. In December the stormed Fort Niagara, captured a large amount of naval and military stores, and planned the attack on Black Rock and Buffalo, which was successfully executed, 31 Dec., 1813, by a small force under Sir P. Riall. In May, 1814, the military force under Lt.-Gen. Drummond, and the fleet under Sir James Yeo, attacked and took Oswego, and destroyed a sixty-four-gun ship which had just been completed, together with barracks, works, and stores. He commanded at the obstinately contested battle of Lundy’s Lane, and next invested Fort Erie, assaulting the outer works so vigorously that an entrance was effected by Col. William Drummond. But at the moment when the assailants were confident of victory a large quantity of ammunition which had been placed under the platform was ignited by the firing of the guns in the rear; the result being that the greater part of the British forces which had entered the fort was blown into the air. This disaster compelled Gen. Drummond to relinquish the project of capturing Fort Erie. Soon afterward he succeeded to the property he had purchased in Canada, and as administrator of the government, and was eminently successful. He returned to Great Britain in June, 1816, and in 1817 received the grand cross of the Bath.

DRUMMOND, Thomas, jurist, b. in Bristol Mills, Lincoln co., Maine, 16 Oct., 1809. He was graduated at Bowdoin in 1830, studied law in Philadelphia, and was admitted to the bar there in 1833. He removed to Galena, III., in 1835, and in 1840–1 was a member of the Illinois legislature. He was appointed circuit judge for the district of Illinois in February, 1850, and in 1854 removed to Chicago. In 1855 the state was divided into two judicial districts, and he became judge of the northern one. In December, 1869, he was made judge of the U. S. circuit court for the 7th district, including the states of Illinois, Indiana, and Wisconsin, but resigned in July, 1884, and has since lived in retirement.

DRUMMOND, William, colonial governor, b. in Scotland; d. in Virginia, 20 Jan., 1677. In 1663, when a charter to the territory extending from the 30th degree of latitude to the St. John’s river in Florida was granted by Charles II. to the Duke of Albemarle, Lord Clarendon, Lord Ashley Cooper, Lord Berkeley, and his brother, Sir William, the settlement on the Chowan, near Edenton, N. C., established ten years before by Roger Green, was organized and named Albemarle, Governor Drummond for governor. He received his appointment from Sir William Berkeley, governor of Virginia and joint proprietor of Carolina, who, according to instructions from his associates, instituted a single form of government and an easy tenure of land. In order to swell the population, dissenters were tolerated in the new colony, Drummond himself being a Presbyterian.
afterward returned to Virginia, where he enjoyed esteem and popularity. In the great rebellion of 1676 he bore a prominent part. When Berkeley, after raising a body of men for Bacon’s rebellion, was called to Bacon to fight the Indians, proclaimed the general and his followers rebels, and endeavored to raise a force to surprise them, Drummond brought the news to the camp. When the governor heard of the turning forces he proposed that Berkeley should be deposed, asserting that he could find precedents in the ancient records of Virginia. The leading planters, meeting at Middle Plantation, now Williamsburg, agreed to support Bacon against the governor. When Sir William Berkeley returned with a band of hirelings, collected at Accomack, and occupied Jamestown, Drummond prepared for defence, and sent for Bacon, who had returned from an expedition against the Indians, and had disbanded his men. After the recapture of Jamestown he counseled the burning of the capital, removed the records to a place of safety, and with his own hand applied the torch to his dwelling, one of the best houses in the town. After the death of Bacon the insurges were conquered through the ability of Robert Beverley, and Berkeley wreaked his vengeance on all he could find, and summarily executed. “I am more glad to see you,” he said when Drummond was brought into his presence, “than any man in Virginia; you shall be hanged in half an hour.” Drummond avowed before the court-martial that condemned him the part that he had taken in the rebellion. His wife, Sarah, was as zealous a patriot as himself, and was denounced as a wicked and notorious rebel. “The child that is unborn,” she declared, “shall have cause to rejoice for the good that will come by the death of that country.” After the execution of her husband she was driven from her home with her children, and compelled to depend on the charity of the planters.

DRUMMOND, William, British soldier, b. in Kellet, Perthshire, Scotland; killed at Fort Erie, Canada, 16th August 1754. He entered the army at an early age, and at St. Vincent, when a lieutenant in the 2d West India regiment, received the highest testimonial from Lieut.-Gen. Hunter, under whom he served. At the attack on Sackett’s Harbor, in the war with the United States, he was wounded, and was pensioned by the government, and mentioned in the public dispatches. He was lieutenant-colonel of the 104th regiment, and quarter-master-general in Canada at the time of his death. He perished, according to some accounts, in the explosion of the mine at Fort Erie (see Drummond, Sir Gordon); but other authorities say that Drummond ordered his men to “give the Yankees no quarter,” and that he was killed by the side of Lieut. Macdonough, who had asked him for quarter, but was shot by him.

Drysdaile, Alexander Irvin, clergyman, b. in Savannah, Ga., in 1841; d. in Waukesha, Wis., 30 Aug., 1866. He entered the Protestant Episcopal ministry in early manhood, and after a few years' service in his native city received a call from Mobile, where he remained seven years. In 1852 he was called to New Jersey as the first rector of a church. A few days before his death he was elected to the vacant bishopric at Easton, Md., but it was not supposed by his friends that he would have accepted, as he was greatly interested in the growth of his own parish. His congregation was. but small, but he built one of the finest church edifices in the city. Dr. Drysdaile was a man of extensive learning, but was noted rather for the zeal with which he engaged in his pastoral work than for his eloquence. He died in Wisconsin, where he had gone for his health.

Drysdaile, Thomas Murray, physician, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 31 Aug., 1831. After spending some time in a drug-store, in order to become familiar with pharmacy, he studied medicine in the Pennsylvania medical college, and under the instruction of Dr. Washington L. Atlee, whom he assisted in the chemical laboratory of the college, and whose daughter he married in 1857. He was graduated M. D. in 1852. He lectured on chemistry in the Wagner science institute in 1858, but resigned to devote himself to his practice in surgery and gynecology. In 1862 he delivered a course of lectures on the microscope in the Franklin institute. He also made valuable microscopic observations, and discovered and described the ovarian cell which exists in ovarian tumors. He was one of the first to perform ovariotomy in Philadelphia. He was a delegate to the international medical congress in 1876, and one of the founders of the American gynecological society. He has published papers on rupture of the common duct of the liver, and the granular cell in ovarian fluid, “Dropeial Fluids of the Abdomen,” being chap. xxiv of W. L. Atlee's work on “Diagnosis of Ovarian Tumors” (Philadelphia, 1873), and addresses on tracheotomy, and the use of chlorate of potassa in diphtheria and pseudo-membranous group.

Duane, James, jurist, b. in New York city, 6 Feb., 1728; d. in Duquesne, N. Y., 1 Feb., 1789. He inherited a tract of land at Duquesne, on which he established a settlement in 1765. He became a lawyer, married in 1759 a daughter of Col. Robert Livingstone, and attained eminence in his profession in New York. He was the leading advocate of the rights of New York. He was a delegate to the New Hampshire grants, and drew up a memorial to the assembly in 1778 in support of the charter, and was one of the principal New York grantees of territory in Vermont, and when Ethan Allen, Seth Warner, and Remembrance Baker drove out the New York officials, he headed the applicants who induced the legislature to declare those men traitors and outlawed. He was one of the conservative candidates proposed for congress by the committee of fifty-one in 1774, and was elected a delegate to the 1st Continental congress. In that body he proposed the recognition of the British acts of navigation, and encountered violent opposition, though the resolution of John Adams that was adopted was nearly identical with his own. He seconded Galloway's proposal for organizing the colonies under a grand council, subordinate to parliament, and a president, nominated by the king, and with Galloway entered a protest against the resolution of 8 Oct., 1774, in favor of supporting Massachussetts in her opposition to the acts of parliament. He championed the idea that no acts of parliament could bind the congress, and moved to strike the Quebec act out of the list of grievances.
With John Jay and Peter Van Schaa k he drew up an article of association which all the revolutionists in the town adopted after the battle of Lexington. Like Jay, he was in the beginning of the Revolution devoted to the English form of government and to the English church, and opposed to the republican sentiments that prevailed among the mechanics of New York. In the contest between the 1774 and 1775 congresses, and the member of the state convention, of which those two prominent lawyers were exponents, obtained the representation in Congress in the 2d Congress, on May 24, 1775, Mr. Duane moved the opening of negotiations to settle the disputes between the colonies and Great Britain. He was present at the battle of Lexington.

He served subsequently as superintendent of fortifications on the coast of Maine and New Hampshire, as light-house inspector of the northeast coast, as a member of various engineer boards, and as president of the board of engineers in New York city. He was promoted colonel on Jan. 10, 1788, and in the summer of 1788 was appointed chief of engineers, with the rank of brigadier-general. He has published a "Manuel for Engineer Troops" (New York, 1829).

DUANE, William, journalist, b. near Lake Champlain, N. Y., in 1760; d. in Philadelphia, Nov. 34, 1833. He was educated in Ireland, learned the business of printing, and in 1794 went to India, where he remained three years. He was the editor of a journal entitled "The World." Having taken sides against the local government in a dispute with some of its troops, he was invited by the governor, Sir John Shaw, to breakfast, and while on the way to meet the appointment was seized by a vessel, put on board a vessel, and carried to England, and his large fortune confiscated. After vainly petitioning the parliament and the East India company for redress, he became editor of the "General Advertiser" (which was subsequently merged in the "London Mercury") and became a member of this country and became editor of the Philadelphia "Aurora," making it the leading organ of the democratic party. Jefferson attributed his election to the presidency to its vigorous support, and appointed Mr. Duane a lieutenant-colonel in July, 1783. He served in the army of 1812-15 as adjutantgeneral, his commission dating in March, 1813. The change of the seat of government to Washington diminished the political importance of the "Aurora," and Mr. Duane retired from its editorship in 1819, travelled through the republics of South America, and returned to Columbia in 1822-3. (Philadelphia, 1823). He was appointed prothonotary of the supreme court of Pennsylvania for the eastern district, an office which he retained until his death. He published "The Mississippi Question" (Philadelphia, 1803); a "Military Dictionary" (Philadelphia, 1809); "A Treatise on the Arts and Sciences" (1811); a "Hand-Book for Riflemen" (1813); "Hand-Book for Infantry" (1813); and "American Military Library" (1819).

—His son, William John, b. in Clonmel, Ireland, in 1780; d. in Philadelphia, 27 Sept., 1863, was originally a printer, afterwards a manufacturer. He studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1815, and often represented Philadelphia in the legislature. He became a distinguished lawyer, took a deep interest in schools, and was a trustee and subsequently a director in Girard college. During his father's editorship of the "Aurora" he was his assistant, became secretary of the U. S. treasury in 1833, and was removed by President Jackson for declining to order the removal of the deposits from the U. S. bank. He published "The Law of Nations Investigated" (Philadelphia, 1807); "Letters on Internal Improvements" (1811); and "Narrative and Correspondence concerning the Removal of the Deposits" (1838).—William, son of William John, b. in Philadelphia in 1807, has published "Christopher Marshall's Diary," edited (1859; new ed., 1849); "History of the Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, the Wilderness, and Cold Harbor," and distinguished himself at the siege of Petersburg. He became captain of engineers on 6 Aug., 1861, major on 3 March, 1863, and brevetted colonel on 6 July, 1864, and brigadier-general at the close of the war. From 1865 to 1866 he supervised the construction of the fort at Willet's Point, N. Y., receiving promotion as lieutenant-colonel on 7 March, 1867.

DUARTE, Juan Pablo (du-ar'-te), founder of the Dominican republic, b. in Santo Domingo city early in the present century; d. in Venezuela, 15
DUARTE COELHO

July, 1876. He studied law in Spain, where he was admitted to the bar. While he was studying, the eastern part of the island of Santo Domingo, which was independent of Spain, was conquered by the republic of Hayti, which occupied the western part, thus making the island into a single republic. The Haytians ruled with an iron hand on the conquered part, which was inhabited largely by people of Spanish descent. Duarte, being a lifelong advocate of the idea of freeing his country, and founded in 1838 "La Trinitaria," a secret society, which soon extended throughout the Spanish section of the island, and paved the way for national independence. A first attempt to obtain this, made in March, 1843, was unsuccessful, and Duarte was compelled to leave the country. On 27 Feb., 1844, another attempt was made, this time a successful one. A commission was sent to Caracas, where Duarte resided, to bring him to Santo Domingo, to take part in the provisional government of the new republic, and on 12 June, 1844, he was nominated in Chile for president by the liberal party, in opposition to Gen. Santana, appointed to the same office in Santo Domingo city by the reactionary party. Duarte was defeated and banished, remained in obscurity for many years, and only appeared in the island after the return of the Dominican, which occurred to Spanish rule in 1861. He took part in the struggle that ended in 1865, in the re-establishment of the republic, went on a mission abroad, and died in Caracas. In 1883 the board of aldermen of Santo Domingo recognized his life-size portrait of Duarte to be placed in the municipal hall, and in 1884 his remains were brought to Santo Domingo with appropriate public ceremonies.

DUARTE COELHO, Pereira (do-oor-te-coel-oh), Portuguese nobleman, d. 7 Aug., 1854, King Juan, less, of Portugal, bestowed on Duarte one of the first hereditary captainships of Brazil. When he was sailing along the coast of Africa adverse winds compelled him to put in at the island of Ilamaraa, where he fought the French, ascended the river Iguassu, and compelled the Portuguese Indians to lead him to the seat of his government. On 10 April, 1834, the captainship of Pernambuco was added to his royal donations, and on 24 Oct. his dominion was extended from San Francisco river to that of Iguassu. In 1835 Duarte founded the city of Olinda, where he resided with his wife and other colonists. He was at first seriously annoyed by the warlike tribe of Catetino Indians, who declared war against him, and afterward by revolts of the colonists, who were for the most part criminals and vagabonds, sent to the colony by the Portuguese government; but he soon put an end to all disturbances. The captainship of Pernambuco threw so well that in 1849, when the general government was established in Brazil, taking away the special privileges of grantees, those of Duarte were accepted. After conquering more than 50,000 square miles of land, and founding several towns and cities, Duarte died, leaving his command to his wife, Brites de Alburquerque, his direct heir being absent in Portugal.

DU DDS, Joseph Henry, clergyman, b. in New York, 5 Oct., 1888. He was graduated at Franklin and Marshall College, Lancaster, Pa., in 1895, and at Mercersburg theological seminary in 1896. After holding various pastorates in the German Reformed church, he became in 1873 professor of history and archeology in Franklin and Marshall college. He has discovered many documents relating to the history of the German churches in Pennsylvania, and published review articles on "Early German Hymnology in Pennsylvania," and "Otterbein and the Reformed Church," and a volume entitled "Historic Manual of the Reformed Church" (Lancaster, 1899).

DU BOIS, Charles E., artist, b. in New York about 1840. He studied in Paris under Gleyre and Français, and afterward painted in Venice and Rome. At the Paris salon of 1873 he exhibited "Cottages of the Served" and "Vieux pays de l'Ami;" to that of 1876 he sent "Mill near Dor- drecht;" in 1878, "Morning on the Prairie;" to the Philadelphia exhibition, "Willows at East Hampton" and "The Palisades of the Hudson;" to the Paris exposition of 1878, "Morning in Venice;" "View on the Hudson;" and "Autumn;" to the exhibition of the Society of American artists in 1878, "Evening at East Hampton."

DU BOIS, Guatereus, clergyman, b. in Streetf- kerk, Holland, in 1668; d. in New York city in October, 1761. He was the son of Rev. Peter Du Bois, a clergyman in Amsterdam. Du Bois came to New York in 1699 as a colleague of Henricus Selyns, whom he succeeded. The services of the Reformed church at that time were conducted entirely in the Dutch language. Rev. A. Laidle being the first clergyman that preached in English. His contemporaries were Rev. J. P. Van den Berg (1713-54), Johannes Rittenia (1744-96), and Lambertius De Ronde (1751-93). Du Bois lived in a quiet and peaceful spirit, prudent, judicious, and consistent, of high character, and greatly beloved. He was so unassuming that some persons are said to have been more like a bishop among the Dutch churches of that day than the pastor of a single organization. His correspondence with the classis of Amsterdam is voluminous, and marked by a spirit of moderation and kindness. He left a large amount of manuscript, including commentaries on different books of the Bible.

DU BOIS, Henry Augustus, physician, b. in New York city, 9 Aug., 1808; d. in New Haven, Conn., 13 Jan., 1884. He was educated at Columbia in 1827, and at the College of physicians and surgeons in 1830. In 1831 he was house physician to the New York hospital. In 1831 he visited Europe, and there pursued studies under the masters in surgery and medicine. During his stay in Paris he became a member of the Polish committee there, holding weekly meetings at the residence of J. Fredrich Cooper. It was his intention to join the Polish army, but he was finally dissuaded from that purpose. In 1834 he was one of the few Americans who followed the body of Lafayette to the grave, and was exposed in the attack made by the "red republicans" to seize the body. He returned to New York in November of that year, and entered on the active practice of his profession, becoming one of the physicians to the New York dispensary. In 1835 he married a daughter of Peter A. Jay, of the New York bar, and moved to Cleveland, his removal to Ohio, where he had inherited a large tract of land, on which he laid out and in a great measure built up Newton Falls. While residing in the west he withdrew from active practice, but continued to act in consultation. In 1852 he returned to New York, and was president of the New York medical association in health, and became president of the Virginia canal company, and later of the Peyton's canal company. Two years later he removed to New Haven, where he has since resided. Dr. Du Bois is a member of scientific societies. Although he has published no contributions to medical science, he has largely influenced the opinions of his protection brethren, especially in reference to scarlet fever. He contended more than forty years ago that this disease is an epidemic and not amenable to medicines until it has run its course. In 1864 he received from Yale the degree of LL. D. for his reply to the seven English essays-ists, which was republished in London—his son, Augustus Jay, civil engineer, b. in Newton Falls, Trumbull co., Ohio, 25 April, 1849, was educated at the Sheffield scientific school, where he received the degrees of Ph. B. in 1869, C. E. in 1870, and Ph. D. in 1872, after which he devoted two years to special study in mechanics at the Freiburg. Saxony, mining-school. On his return to the United States he was made professor of civil and mechanical engineering in the Lehigh university.
Bethlehem, Pa., holding that chair from 1874 till 1876, when he became professor of mechanical engineering in the Sheffield scientific school, succeed-ning in 1884 to the chair of civil engineering in that institution, made vacant by the death of Prof. William A. Norton. Prof. Dubois is a mem-er of numerous scientific societies, and has lectured on “Science and Faith,” “Science and the Supernatural,” “Science and the Spiritual,” and similar subjects. Besides frequent contributions to the engineering press he has published “Elements of Graphical Statics” New York, 1877, Weyranck’s “Calculations of Strength and Dimensions of Iron and Steel Construction,” edited and translated (1877); “Hydraulics and Hydraulic Motors” (1877) and “Theory of Steam Engine (1878), being two volumes of Weisbach’s “Mechanic,” translated and edited; Bouchard’s “Principles of Thermodynamics,” translated and edited (1880); “The Strains in Framed Structures” (1883); and “Tables for Bridge Engineers” (1885).

DUBOIS, John, R. C. bishop, b. in Paris, 24 Aug., 1754; d. in New York, 26 Dec., 1849. His father died when John was a child, and he received his early education from his mother. He afterward entered the College of Louis le Grand, where the Abbé Delille was one of his professors, and Robespierre and Canard, who were his classmate.
He studied theology in the Oratorian seminary of St. Magoire, and on 22 Sept., 1772, though still under the canonical age, was ordained by special dispensation. He was then appointed as-istant rector of the parish of St. Sulpice and chaplain to the insane asylum called the Hospice des pets-mauvais. At the beginning of the League, he joined the Revolution he was forced to fly from Paris. Obtaining a passport and letters of introduction from Lafayfette, he escaped to Havre de Grace and sailed for Norfolk, Va., where he arrived in August, 1791. He was warmly received by Bishop Carroll, who appointed him presbyter and afterward in Richmond, Va. Father Dubois was sold. He was taught English by Patrick Henry, and lived in the house of James Monroe, the future president. He also, by invitation, used the state capitol in Richmond, for some time, for religious services.
He was next summoned by Archbishop Carroll to Frederick, Md., exercised the duties of pastor in western Maryland and Virginia, and was for a long time the only priest between Baltimore and St.
Louis. In 1808 he began the building of a college and church at Mount St. Mary’s, Emmettsburg, Md., and the former, under his care, was developed into one of the most important ecclesiastical institutions of the country. He acted as president of Mount St. Mary’s until 1856, when he was appointed bishop of the See of New York, his see embracing also a portion of New Jersey. He wasinstalled, soon after his consecration, in difficulties with the trustees of his churches, who refused to pay a salary except to such priests as they had selected.
Although hampered by their opposition, he succeded in erecting new churches in Albany and Buffalo. Finding that he could not obtain the funds necessary for his projects, he visited Europe in 1829, returned with some French priests, and, having received a grant of money from the Society for the propagation of the faith, built a college at Nyack. This was hardly finished, however, when it was burned to the ground, its presence in the neighborhood having excited an intense feeling of religious bigotry. During his administration, a plan to destroy St. Patrick’s cathedral, New York, was also frustrated.
Another unsuccessful attempt to turn the college at Brooklyn, he purchased an estate in Jefferson county and built St. Vincent de Paul’s seminary at Lafargeville. In 1838 his failing health obliged him to take a coadjutor. When he entered New York there were only a few priests in the state; there were now near one hundred; with twenty-six churches, a college, two academies, five asylums, and several parochial schools. See “Discourse

DU BOIS, William Ewing, numismatist, b. in Doverstown, Pa., 15 Dec., 1810; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 14 July, 1881. He was assistant assayer at the U. S. mint in Philadelphia in 1836, and held the office until he succeeded his chief, Jacob R.
Eckfeldt, on the death of the latter in 1872. The extensive numismatic collection in the mint at Philadelphia formed the nucleus of the numismaty of Mr. Du Bois. Besides other contributions to the science of numismatics, he wrote “A Manual of Gold and Silver Coins of all Nations” (1842–51); and also had a large share in writing “A Description of Ancient and Modern Coins” (1860).

DUBOIS, Catherine Ann, d. in Hook When she was about five years of age her father, the Rev. William Richards, a Baptist clergyman, emigrated to the United States, settling first at Hudson, N. Y., and subsequently making his home in Georgia. Her education was begun in New York city and completed at Midway, Ga. On 20 June, 1848, she married Charles W. Dubose, a lawyer of Sparta, Ga. Her contributions to literature have been chiefly in the form of tales and poems, appearing in journals and magazines, usually over the pseudonym of “Carolina,” but the best efforts were published in the “Southern Literary Gazette” (Charleston, S. C.), of which her brother, the Rev. William C. Richards, was editor.
In the “Orion Magazine,” of Georgia, was published a prize poem by her, entitled “Wachhula,” the following year. In 1856 she published “The Pastor’s Household,” a prose story for the young. She completed a second story, called “The Elliot Family,” but the manuscript was destroyed in a fire in New York. She is a sister of the artist, T. Addison Richards of that city.
DU BOSE, Dudley McVeY, lawyer, b. in Shelby county, Tenn., 28 Oct., 1854. He was educated at the University of Mississippi, and studied and practised law. At the beginning of the civil war he entered the Confederate army and rose to the rank of brigadier-general. After the war he represented Georgia in congress, serving from 4 March, 1871, till 3 March, 1873.

DUBOST, mother superior, b. in Paris, France, in 1818, and died at the age of nineteen, and after her novitiate as a Sister of Charity was sent to labor in an asylum for foundlings at Versailles. Since that time she has worked in orphanages and hospitals in Brazil. She introduced the Sisters of Charity into Brazil in 1848, and has since made fifty voyages to France, her last being in 1866. She holds the office of visitor of the Sisters of Charity of Brazil.

DUBOURL, William Louis, R. C. bishop, b. in Cape Francois, Santo Domingo, in 1768; d. in Besancon, France, in 1836. He was sent to the seminary at St. Sulpice, Paris, for his education, and was attending lectures at the Sorbonne when the Revolution began, and he had to take shelter with his family at Bordeaux. Thence he escaped to Spain, and embarked for the United States in 1790. He entered the seminary of St. Sulpice, Baltimore, Md., and was ordained a priest and appointed a member of the order in the following year. He was appointed president of Georgetown college in 1796, and spent the next three years in extending the interests of that institution. He was sent to Havana in 1809 with the object of founding a Sulpician college in Cuba. He was not successful in his immediate purpose, but many of the inhabitants intrusted him with the education of their children, and on his return to Baltimore he opened a college, which was soon crowded with students from the West Indies. In 1825, however, the Spanish government sent a frigate to take back his pupils, being alarmed at so many sons of Cuban planters being educated under republican influences. In 1806 he succeeded in having St. Mary's college, which he had founded, raised to the rank of a university by the Maryland legislature. Father Dubourg had so much to do with the establishment of the Sisters of Charity in America that he is in a certain sense their founder. He persuaded Mrs. Seton to remain in the United States when she was about to join a religious order in Europe, invited her to Baltimore, assisted her in forming a home for her community, and was appointed ecclesiastical superior of the Sisters by Archbishop Carroll. When Mrs. Seton decided on removing to Emmetsburg, he purchased the land on which she built her convent. In 1812 he was appointed administrator apostolic of the diocese of New Orleans. His efforts to animate the patriotism of the people of Louisiana on the advance of the British troops received the warm commendation of Gen. Jackson, and on the repulse of the enemy he was introduced with the guard of honor as the victor of the city. In 1815 he went to Europe in order to lay the waste of his mission before the pope, and on his arrival in Rome was consecrated bishop. In France he persuaded several students and priests to volunteer for the American mission. In 1850 he was named lieutenant-general in the Association for the propagation of the faith at Lyons. In 1817 a war-vessel was placed at his disposal by Louis XVIII., and he embarked for America. He landed at Annapolis, and went to St. Louis, which he made his episcopal residence. He founded a college and an ecclesiastical seminary at the Barrens, in Missouri, which were confided to the care of the Lazarist fathers, and shortly afterward he opened a college in St. Louis. He next directed his attention to the Indians occupying the southern territory, and created an establishment at Florissaint, which supplied missionaries for the Indians. He visited Washington in 1823, and procured the transfer of the Indian tribes in his diocese to the care of the Jesuits, obtaining a sum of money from the government for this purpose. He spent several schools for the education of girls under the care of the Sisters of Loreto, and also introduced the ladies of the sacred heart from Paris, for whom he founded convents and schools in Florissaint and in St. Louis. He also erected a new cathedral in St. Louis. In 1824 he took up his residence in New Orleans, but in 1826 went to Europe, and never returned, being transferred to the diocese of Montauban, in France. In 1833 he was elevated to the archbishopric of Besancon. Bishop Dubourg was the author of "The Sons of Saint Dominick," and of a volume entitled "Saint Mary's Seminary and the Catholics at large," besides other controversial writings.

DUBREUL, Joseph Paul, clergyman, b. in St.-Etienne, France, in 1814; d. in Baltimore, Md., in 1878. He was educated at Monistrol, Alix, and Lyons, entered the Society of St. Sulpice in 1836, and was ordained in 1841. He was the first bishop of New Orleans, and was appointed superior of his order in the United States, and filled in succession the offices of master of novices, rector, consultor, and provincial.

DUBUC, Joseph, Canadian jurist, b. in St. Martinique. Quebec, 26 Dec., 1820. He was educated as B. C. L. at McGill university in 1869, went to Red river in June, 1870, and was for a year a correspondent of "La Minerve" of Montreal. He was one of a commission appointed to investigate the right to the bay privilege claimed by the settlers on Red and Assiniboine rivers. He was elected to the council of the University of Minnesota in 1875, and president of the University of Minnesota in 1877, and was also his superior. He was a member of the executive council and attorney-general, in Mr. Girard's administration, from 8 July till 2 Dec., 1874, when the government resigned. He was a member of the Minnesota legislature, 31 March, 1875, and represented Baie St. Paul from 1870 until 1874, when he was elected for St. Norbert, which seat he held until 1878, when he resigned, being elected by acclamation to the Dominion parliament. He was appointed a judge of the court of queen's bench in December, 1879.

DUBUIS, Claude Mary, R. C. bishop, b. in France in 1817. After his ordination he emigrated to Texas, and was stationed at Castroville in 1847. Here he lived in a wretched hut until, with the aid of a brother missionary, he was able to build a schoolhouse and school-house with his own hands. In 1850 he was invited to San Antonio, and had charge of the church of San Ferdinand. Here he established a convent and school of the Ursulines. In 1862 he was appointed bishop of Galveston. Bishop Dubuis was so successful in reorganizing his diocese after the civil war that in 1874 it contained 53 churches, 83 priests, and about 100,000 Catholics. He resigned his see in 1880.
DUCHAILLU, Paul Belloni (du-sha'yu), traveller, b. in Paris, France, 31 July, 1835. He early went to live in the French settlement at the mouth of the Gaboon, on the west coast of Africa, where his father held a consular appointment, and was at the age of twenty-three admitted to the Royal Asiatic Society, Paris, and in 1857 he was elected a fellow of this society, and in 1860 became a member of the British Association for the Advancement of Science. He was elected a fellow of the Royal Geographical Society, and in 1858 he was appointed a commissioner to assist in the reduction of the map of the Cape Colony, and in 1860 he was appointed a member of the British Association for the Advancement of Science. He was elected a fellow of the Royal Geographical Society, and in 1858 he was appointed a commissioner to assist in the reduction of the map of the Cape Colony, and in 1860 he was appointed a member of the British Association for the Advancement of Science.
1855, from New York for Africa, with the intention of making a thorough exploration of the region on the west coast, lying between latitude 2° N. and 2° S. He spent nearly four years in the task, penetrating to about longitude 14° 15' E., travelling on foot, unaccompanied by any white man, upward of 8,000 miles. During this time he shot or killed over 2,000 birds, of which 60 were previously unknown, and killed over 1,000 quadrupeds, among which were several gorillas, never before shot and probably never before seen by a white man, and 20 other species of animals previously unclassified. He returned to New York in 1859, bringing a large collection of native arms and implements, and numerous specimens in natural history, which were published in a work, the title of which was afterward purchased by the British museum. The history of this expedition was published under the title of “Explorations and Adventures in Equatorial Africa” (New York and London, 1861; new ed., enlarged, 1873). This volume is valuable on account of the geography, ethnology, and zoology of western Africa, but many of its statements were received with distrust, because they were inconsistent with the maps of Henrich Barth and August Petermann. A bitter controversy arose concerning the accuracy of Du Chaillu’s statements, Prof. John E. Gray, of the British museum, attacking his veracity with much asperity, while Prof. Richard Owen and Sir Roderick Murchison defended him. As Du Chaillu had made his observations fromcompass bearings only, their correctness was not be definitely proved, and he resolved to vindicate his reputation by a second expedition. For this he prepared himself by a course of scientific study, learned the use of astronomical and other instruments, and acquired the art of practical photography. Meanwhile his accuracy was established by the French travellers Serval and Griffon du Bellay, who, in charge of a government expedition, explored the Ogoab river and the neighboring country. His statements concerning the cannibalistic habits of the Pan tribe were verified by the English traveller, Capt. Richard F. Burton. Du Chaillu, notwithstanding his vindication, determined to prosecute his expedition, for which he had made thorough preparation. He freighted a schooner with goods for presents to the natives, and sailed from England in August, 1861. Early in October he reached the mouth of the Ogoab, and there met with a severe loss by the swamping of the canoe containing his scientific and photographic apparatus. He was obliged to send to England for a new supply, and he occupied his time in hunting excursions, during which he acquired an opportunity of studying the habits of the gorilla. In September, 1864, his instruments having arrived, he set out for the interior, accompanied by ten Commi negroes. He revisited some of the scenes of his former explorations, took many accurate observations, and penetrated among tribes and through portions of country previously unknown.

In September of the following year he was forced to return to the coast in consequence of an unfortunate conflict with the natives, in which he lost four fighting but his journals. These contained all of his natural historical observations which verified his previous statements, and added much to the geographical knowledge of western Africa. He published an account of this expedition under the title of “A Journey to Ashango Land” (London and New York, 1869). After spending some years in the United States, where he lectured, as a public lecturer, he visited Sweden, Norway, Lapland, and Finland, in 1872–3, returning to New York late in 1873. Du Chaillu has published the following: “Stories of the Gorilla Country” (New York, 1869); “Wild Life under the Equator” (1869); “Lost in the Jungle” (1869); “My Apeing Kingdom” (1870); “The Country of the Dwarf” (1871); “The Land of the Midnight Sun” (1881); and “The Viking Age” (1887).

DUCHE, Jacob, clergyman, b. in Philadelphia in 1737; d. there, 5 Jan., 1798. He was the son of a Huguenot who came to America with William Penn. He was graduated from the College of Philadelphia (now University of Pennsylvania) in 1757, afterward studied in England at the University of Cambridge, and was licensed in 1759 by the bishop of London as a missionary and services in the churches of Philadelphia. In 1775 he succeeded to the rectorship of Christ church, in that city, on the resignation of Dr. Peters. At the beginning of the Revolution he espoused the cause of the revolutionaries, and was invited to make the opening prayer on the assembly of the first convocation, 7 Sept., 1774. After reading a Psalm and several petitions from the Book of Common Prayer, he concluded with an impromptu invocation so patriotic in spirit and so reverent in tone that he was given a vote of thanks. On 9 July, 1776, he was chosen chaplain, and served three months, when he resigned. He devoted his stipend of $150 to the relief of the families of Pennsylvanians who had fallen in battle. When the British took possession of Philadelphia, Dr. Duche seemed to despair of the success of the cause, and soon found its way into the newspapers. Consequently, Dr. Duche left this country and went to England, where he was appointed chaplain to the Lambeth orphan asylum, and soon made a reputation as an eloquent preacher. In the mean time his estate had been confiscated, and he himself declared a traitor. He returned to Philadelphia in 1799 in feeble health. Dr. Duche married a sister of Francis Hopkinson, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. He was the master of a polished style, and wrote, among other works, “The Traitor’s Letter” (Philadelphia, 1774; 2d Ed., England, 1776), and “Discourses on Various Subjects” (London, 1770). Of the latter it has been said: “His discourses have great warmth and spirit, and at times are in the strain of our old divines.” The prayer which he wrote during his term as chaplain in congress is a model of that style of composition.

DUCESNE, Phillippa Rose, foundress of the first houses of the Society of the Sacred Heart in America, b. in France in 1769; d. in St. Charles, La., in 1852. She received a better education than most French ladies of her time, having been taught the classics and higher mathematics with her brothers. She has sent a convent of the Visitation to prepare for her first journey, and, in consequence of the good mission work among the Indians of Louisiana, her thoughts were turned to religious work in America. In 1793 she resided at Grenoble, and devoted herself to caring for the prisoners and educating the children of the soldiers. She left in 1796 for New Orleans, where she organized a community of religious women, whose sole occupation was to be teaching. This community was afterward amalgamated with the Society of the Sacred Heart, founded by Madame Barat. In 1816 she sailed for the United States with four companions, and landed at New Orleans. After a stay of two months she went to St. Louis, where she opened a school under circumstances of great difficulty. She next removed to Florissant, where she established a permanent centre of her order. In 1830 she founded a community of the Sacred Heart congregation in Barreins, on the Bois-Brule, and also a boarding-school, and free schools for Indians and for white adults. She next founded the house of Milwaukee, which was devoted to the education of the poor. In 1834 a hurricane damaged some of her houses, but she set to work with renewed energy, and in 1835 established an institution in the parish of St. Michel among the French exiles of Acadian. In 1827 the present house of the order was founded in St. Louis. She closed her ten years' work as a religious pioneer by the foundation of a house in St. Charles. Madame Duchesne governed all her scattered houses with firmness and discretion till 1849, when she was succeeded by the present superior, the Rev. Galitzen, who became a simple nun again. She then petitioned to be allowed to fulfill her original intention of going as a missionary among the Indians. With three companions she joined a Jesuit mission among the Pottawattamies. She was well received, but the hardships of such a life for a woman, over seventy, were considered too great, and she was forced by her superiors to return to St. Charles at the end of a year. She lived to see her order flourish in all the great cities of the United States.

DUCKFIELD, or DUCKFIELD, Sir Nathaniel, bart., d. in England, 1870. He was a member of the council of North Carolina, where he owned large estates, and in 1772, while on a visit to England, was induced to purchase a commission in the British army. When the war began he refused to serve against the Americans, and on his regiment being ordered to this country he contrived to remain behind. This exhibition of patriotism did not avail him, however, as in 1779 his estates were confiscated. He was intimately with James Iredell, afterward one of the judges of the supreme court of the state, and maintained a correspondence with him until the close of 1791. In 1783 he married a niece of Gen. Varde, on whose staff he was serving as aide-de-camp. In 1789 the British government made him an allowance of £3,000 for his losses as a loyalist. He never returned to America.

DU COUDRAY, Philipp, Charles Jean Baptiste Tronson, French soldier, b. in Rheims, France, 8 Sept., 1738; d. in the United States, 11 Sept., 1777. He was educated in the army as a mining engineer, and evinced such unusual talent that he was promoted, over the heads of 399 senior officers, for services in Corsica. He was adjutant-general of artillery, and ranked as one of the best military engineers in France, when, in 1776, he offered his services to Silas Deane and Benjamin Franklin, who were then engaging officers for the American army. A treaty was subsequently entered into by which Du Coudray, on condition of his furnishing certain supplies, was to receive a commission as major-general in the American service, with the command of the artillery. On his arrival in Philadelphia he claimed that the right to command the engineers was included in this arrangement. Gen. Knox (at that time at the head of the artillery), Gen. Sullivan, Gen. Greene, and other American officers, were greatly dissatisfied with the negotiations of Franklin and Deane, and threatened to resign in case congress should ratify this. This was not done, and the matter finally dropped. Du Coudray was appointed inspector-general, with the rank of major-general, 11 Aug., 1777, and placed in charge of the works on the Delaware. While he was hastening as a volunteer to the battle of the Brandywine, his horse becoming restive on a ferry-boat as he was crossing the Schuylkill, plunged with him into the river, and he was drowned.

DUCRUE, Bennon Francis, clergyman, b. in Munich, Bavaria, in 1724; d. in Bavaria in 1779. He was a Jesuit and was sent to Mexico, where he performed missionary duty for over twenty years. He returned to Europe after the Jesuits were expelled from the Spanish colonies. He wrote in German a "Relation of the Society of Jesus of the Province of Mexico, and particularly of California in 1767, with other documents worthy of being known." This relation is found in vol. xvi. of the journal of Mur. Independent of what concerns the Jesuits in California, it contains interesting notices on the geography and the Indian languages, and added notes to the relation, and some specimens of the Californian language, which were communicated to him by Ducrue.

DUDLEY, Benjamin Winslow, surgeon, b. in Spottsylvania county, Va., 12 April, 1759; d. in Lexington, Ky., 20 Jan., 1829. He was a graduate of the Pennsylvania university, and was graduated at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1806, presenting a thesis on the "Medical Topography of Lexington." From 1810 till 1814 he was in Europe, where he studied under Sir Astley Cooper and Dr. Abercrombie. He was also under Paul A. Dubois and F. H. Larrey in Paris. On his return to the United States he settled in Lexington, Ky., remaining there in successful practice till 1854, and achieving the reputation of being the most successful surgeon west of the Alleghenies. He operated for stone in the bladder two hundred and twenty-five times, losing only six patients, and had occasion to repeat the operation in but one instance. He performed the lateral operation exclusively, and almost always with the goret, an instrument now becoming obsolete. His success was so great that in England he was declared to be "the lithotomist of the nineteenth century." Dr. Dudley published several medical essays, was active in the organization in 1817 of the medical department of Transylvania university, long the leading school in the South, and for some time there the professorships of anatomy and surgery.

DUDLEY, Charles Benjamin, chemist, b. in Oxford, N.Y., 14 July, 1842. He was graduated at Yale in 1871, and then pursued a course in the Sheffield scientific school, receiving the degree of Ph. D. in 1874. In 1875 he became instructor of physics in the University of Pennsylvania, but resigned at the end of the year. He became chemist to the Pennsylvania railroad. company in November, 1875, and has remained in that capacity since that time. His work has been important and has consisted of chemical researches in the field of analysis, used by the corporation. His investigation on the composition of steel rails is one of the best contributions to the literature of the subject. Dr. Dudley is a member of scientific societies, and has twice been vice-president of the American institute of mining engineers, and has transactions he has published papers of technical value.

DUDLEY, Charles Edward, senator, b. in Johnson Hall, Staffordshire, England, 23 May, 1786; d. in Albany, N. Y., 28 Jan., 1841. In 1794 he came with his mother to Newport, R. L., where his father, Charles Dudley, who had died in 1790, had been the king's collector of customs. The son first became a clerk in a counting-room, but soon entered into trade, and went to the East Indies as supercargo. Subsequently he removed to New York, and then to Albany, where he became a prominent merchant. He was a member of the state senate from 1820 till 1823, and mayor of Albany from 1821 till 1828. He was elected to the U. S. senate as a democrat in 1829 to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Martin Van Buren, and was re-elected in 1835. He was well skilled in the art of politics, particularly in the art of managing elections. He was a man of scientific taste, and contributed largely to the advancement of astronomical science. His wife, Blandina, b. in New York in 1788; d. in Albany in January, 1868, was the daughter of Rutgers Bleecker. In her later years she was lavish in the expenditure of her wealth, and contributed largely to scientific as well as benevolent and religious objects. In 1856 she gave $75,000 toward the endowment and erection of Dudley observatory in Albany, in memory of her husband. At the time of her death she had given more than $100,000 toward its completion.

DUDLEY, Domin, antiquarian, b. in Kingsfield, Me., 23 May, 1823. He is descended from Thomas Dudley, one of the first colonial governors of Massachusetts. He studied at Waterville liberal institute, Me., Greenleaf school in Bradford, Mass., and at Waterville academy, New Haven, Conn., but was mostly self-taught. He then studied law, was admitted to the Suffolk bar in 1854, and practised for several years in Boston. During this time he procured the enactment of several important state laws. He afterward abandoned the law, on account of failing health, and devoted his attention to the publication of biographical and genealogical works. He has compiled a history of the United States, which he has compiled one hundred. In 1849 he visited England, and spent a year in making antiquarian and genealogical researches. During this time he wrote for the Boston newspapers letters afterward published with the title "Pictures of Life in England and America." (Boston, 1851). His other publications are "The Dudley Genealogies" (Cambridge, 1848); "Social and Political Aspects of England and the Continent." (1862); "History of the First Council of Nice" (Boston, 1860); "Officers of our Union Army and Navy" (Boston, 1892); and "History of the Dudley Family" (Wakefield, Mass., 1866). He compiled a "History and Genealogy of the Swift Family," which has not been printed. From 1863 till 1874 he compiled the census of school-children in Boston, and has made large collections of historical and genealogical works in England and America, which are still in manuscript.

DUDLEY, Edward Bishop, governor of North Carolina, b. in Onslow county, N. C., 15 Dec., 1757; d. in Wilmington, N. C., 80 Oct., 1835. He was the son of a wealthy planter, who represented Onslow county in the state legislature. Mr. Dudley grew up on his father's estate and succeeded to its ownership. From 1811 till 1813 he was a member of the North Carolina house of commons, and in 1814 of the state senate. From 1816 till 1817, and again in 1818, he represented Wilmington in the legislature. He was chosen a member of the 21st congress as a Jackson Democrat, serving from 7 Dec., 1829, till 3 March, 1831, but declined a re-election. In 1836 he was the first governor of the state elected by the people under the amended constitution of 1833, the governors having previously been chosen by the legislature. He was also the first president of the Wilmington and Raleigh (now Wilmington and Delaware) railroad. He was one of the most public-spirited and benevolent citizens of his state.

DUDLEY, Thomas, colonial governor of Massachusetts, b. in Northampton, England, in 1576; d. in Roxbury, Mass., 31 July, 1632. He was an officer in the service of Holland before joining the Puritans, and afterward retrieved the fortunes of the Earl of Lincoln by the faithful stewardship of his estates. In 1630 he came to Massachusetts with the commission of deputy governor, which office he held from 1634 till 1640, and again from 1645 till 1650. After residing in Cambridge, Ipswich, and Boston, he finally settled in Roxbury, where his estate was long the subject of particular interest and the object of much research. In 1644 he was appointed major-general. He was a man of talent and integrity, was bold and energetic, but intolerant and narrow in his religious views, and was even more unforgiving and arrogant than Winthrop, with whom he was closely associated. His son, Joseph, colonial governor of Massachusetts, b. in Roxbury, Mass., 23 Sept., 1647; d. there, 3 April, 1720, was graduated at Harvard in 1665 and studied theology, but, preferring a political career, became a representative in the general court and a magistrate in his native town in 1675. From 1677 till 1681 he was one of the commissioners for the united colonies of New England. He was in the battle with the Narragansetts in 1675, and was one of the commissioners that negotiated the treaty with that tribe. In 1682 he went to England as agent for the colony, and being unable to obtain a confirmation of the old charter, served himself, and became a candidate for the chief magistracy. He was appointed president of New England in 1685, and made chief justice of the supreme court in 1687. He was arrested as one of the friends of Andros, with whom he was sent to England, where he was received with favor. He was chief justice of New York from 1690 till 1698, in the latter year again visited England, became deputy governor of the Isle of Wight, and was elected to parliament from Newtown in 1701. In the following year he returned to this country, and was made captain-general and governor of Massachusetts, serving until 1714, when he retired to his rural home in Roxbury. He carried the doctrine of submission to royal and ministerial authority to extremes, and was said to be a "philosopher and a scholar, a divine and a lawyer, all combined."—His son, Paul, acq'd, 3 Sept. d. in Roxbury, 21 Jan., 1751, was graduated at Harvard in 1690, and studied law at the Temple in London. He returned to Massachusetts in 1702 with a commission from Queen Anne as attorney-general of the province, which he held until his promotion to the bench in 1710. In 1745 he represented Roxbury for several years in the legislature. He was a learned naturalist, a fellow of the Royal society of London, and bequeathed £100 to Harvard for the support of an annual lecture to be delivered on one of the four subjects treated in presbyter-natural religion, the Christian religion, the errors of the Roman Catholic church, and one to explain and to maintain the validity of the ordinance of ministers according to the ancient custom of New England. He published essays on the natural history of America, particularly of New England, in the "Transactions" of the Royal society (1720-1735), and a work against the church of Rome.

DUDLEY, Thomas Underwood, P. E., bishop, b. in Richmond, Va., 28 Sept., 1837. He was graduated at the University of Virginia in 1858, and soon afterward became a professor in that institution. During the civil war he held a commission in the commissioner department of the Confederate army. Having studied theology in the Virginia theological seminary at Alexandria, he was ordained deacon in Bishop Johns, 26 June, 1862, and priest by Bishop Whittle, 26 June, 1868. While in deacon's orders he was in charge of Harrisonburg, pa., in January, 1869, he became assistant minister of Christ's church, Baltimore, Md., and, on the death of the rector in 1870, was elected to the rectorship of the parish. The place occupied by the time he was chosen to be assistant bishop of Kentucky. He was consecrated in Christ's church, Baltimore, 27 Jan., 1875, and, on the death of Bishop Smith, 31 May, 1884, he became bishop of the diocese. He received the degree of S. T. D. from Westminster college in 1884, and from the University of the South in 1888. He has published "A Nice Discrimination the Church's Need" (New York, 1881), being the "Bohien Lectures" for 1881; "A Sunday-School Question-Book" (Baltimore) and occasional sermons and addresses.

DUDLEY, William, 1st baronet, of Roscrea, Tipperary, Ireland, 7 Oct., 1811; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 9 Oct., 1886. He received a classical education, and was graduated at the Royal college of surgeons, Dublin, in 1833. In 1834 he sailed for Jamaica, where he was elected a fellow of King's college of physicians and surgeons, and where he practised his profession until 1841, when he settled in Brooklyn, N. Y. In 1842 he received a diploma from the College of physicians and surgeons of New York, and in 1851 was elected curator of the New York medical college, holding the office for several years. He was one of the founders of the Long Island college hospital, the first of its kind in this country, with which institution he had been connected from its incorporation as a member of its council. He also acted as its treasurer, until 1869. He was described by the board of regents. In fact, but for his untiring labors, his counsel, and his generous pecuniary support, it is doubtful whether the college hospital could have been established or its permanence secured. In 1849 Dr. Dudley was elected a member of the New York academy of medicine. He was also a member of the Kings county medical and other societies.

DUDLEY, William Lofland, chemist, b. in Covington, Ky., 16 April, 1838. He followed a special course in chemistry and natural science at the University of Cincinnati, after which he became demonstrator of chemistry in 1870-’78, and professor of chemistry and toxicology from 1880 till 1886 in Miami medical college, Cincinnati. In 1886 he became professor of chemistry in Vanderbilt university, Nashville. Prof. Dudley was commissioner of the Cincinnati chemical institute during its session in 1885, and a director of the Ohio mechanics' institute from 1884 till 1886. He is a member of several scientific societies, and received the honorary degree of M. D. in 1885 from Miami medical college. He has made a reputation through his success in producing iridium, he devised a process for obtaining this metal, and in consequence its application in the arts has been greatly extended. The electro-metallurgy of iridium has been principally developed through his work. He has published scientific papers in various journals, and wrote the article "Iridium" in "Mineral Resources of the United States." (Washington).

DUDLEY, William Russell, botanist, b. in Guilford, Conn., 1 March, 1849. He was educated at Cornell in 1871-72, and read the United States geological history under Agassiz on Penikese island in 1875, and in the Harvard summer school in 1876. In 1873 he became instructor of botany at Cornell, and in 1884 assistant professor of cryptogamic botany, and also professor of botany in the Martha's Vineyard summer institute during its session in 1878-9. Prof. Dudley has contributed articles to botanical journals and cyclopedias, and has published "The Cayuga Flora, Part I.: A Catalogue of the Phanogamia growing without Cultivation in the Cayuga Lake Basin." (Ithaca, 1886).

Duell, Robert Holld, lawyer, b. in Warren, Herkimer co., N. Y., 20 Dec., 1824. He was educated in the common schools of New York and at Syracuse academy. He studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1843, and began to practise in Cortland in 1846. From 1850 till 1857 he served as district attorney for Cortland county. He was made judge of the district, which office he held until 1859, when he was elected to congress as a Republican. He was re-elected in 1870, serving until 1873, and in that year was made commissioner of patents, which office he held one year.

Dueñas, Francisco, d. 15 May, 1830, of Salvador, b. about 1830. He was educated for the bar, and figured at an early age in the politics of his country, on the conservative side, but, on account of his constant opposition to the liberal government of the president, Gerardo Barrios, was obliged to emigrate to Guatemala. When, early in 1863, Gen. Rafael Carrera; president of Guatema, suspecting Barrios of favoring a re-establishment of the Central American union, with himself as president, declared war against Salvador, Dueñas joined the invading forces, and when the enemy was defeated at Coatepeque, 25 Feb., he soon raised a new army, and, after defeating a Salvadorian army under Gen. Santiago Gonzalez at Santa Ana, 30 July, he besieged and on 26 Oct. occupied the capital, San Salvador, deposed Gen. Barrios, and in-DUER, Edward Louis, physician, b. in Crosswicks, N. J., Jan. 19, 1836. He is descended from an old Scottish family long resident in the United States. He was graduated at A. & C.C. in 1857, and received his degree of M. D. from the University of Pennsylvania in 1860. During the years succeeding his graduation he practiced with his father, Dr. George S. Duer, at Crosswicks. In 1861 he entered the U. S. army as surgeon of volunteers, and served throughout the war. He was a physician of Philadelphia hospital from 1860 till 1862, surgeon from 1862 till 1863, obstetrician from 1861 till 1884, gynecologist of Presbyterian hospital in 1880, and lecturer on diseases of women and children in Philadelphia polyclinic from 1883 till 1885. He has published "Post-Mortem Discoveries" and "Treatment of Diphtheria."

DUER, William, statesman, b. in Devonshire, England, 18 March, 1747; d. in New York city, 7 May, 1799. He was the third son of John Duer, a planter of Antigua, who had a villa in Devonshire. His mother was Frances Frye, daughter of Sir Frederick Frye, who held a command in the West Indies, where she married John Duer. After being sent to Eton, and while still under age, he was put into the army as ensign, and accompanied Lord Clive as aide-de-camp on his return to India, as governor-general, in 1748. As he suffered severely from the climate, Lord Clive sent him back to England, where he remained five years until his father's death. Having left the army, he went to Antigua, and thence to New York, for the first time in 1768, to arrange for a regular command over the plantations in Antigua and Dominica. This brought him into contact with Gen. Schuyler, by whom he was induced to buy a large tract of land at Fort Miller, on the upper Hudson, including the falls, and here he erected large saw-mills. He was appointed colonel of militia, judge of the county courts, member of the New York provincial congress, and member of the committee of safety. In 1773 he went again to England, and obtained a contract to supply the Royal navy with timber for masts and spars. He was one of the committee that drafted the first constitution of New York in the convention of 1777. In 1777-'8 he was a delegate to the Continental congress, and in 1789 secretary of the treasury board, until the organization of the finance department under the National convention. He was a member of the state legislature, and assistant secretary of the treasury under Gov. Hamilton. Mr. Duer's failure in 1799 produced the first financial panic caused by speculation that New York had ever witnessed. The loss was estimated at $3,000,000, and impoverished many in all classes. On 27 July, 1790, he married Catharine, second daughter of Gen. William Alexander, the claimant of the Scottish earldom of Stirling. The marriage took place at his country seat, "The Buildings," near Backingbridge, N. J., which was designed to improve the city of New York and, after the residence of an English nobleman, with all the appointments of an English country seat. She was descended from James Alexander, the Peysters, Livings- stons, and Schuylers, and occupied a brilliant place in the society of the period.

His eldest son, William Alexander, jurist, b. in Rhinebeck, N. Y., 8 Sept., 1780; d. in New York, 30 May, 1858, studied law in Philadelphia, and with Nathaniel Pendleton in New York. During the war of the Revolution, he was a resident physician of Philadelphia hospital from 1860 till 1862, surgeon from 1862 till 1863, obstetrician from 1861 till 1884, gynecologist of Presbyterian hospital in 1880, and lecturer on diseases of women and children in Philadelphia polyclinic from 1883 till 1885. He has published "Post-Mortem Discoveries" and "Treatment of Diphtheria.

Cath.Duer

Mr. Duer shortly afterward joined Livingston at New Orleans, formed a professional partnership with his brother-in-law, Beverley Robinson. About this time he contributed to a partisan weekly paper called the "Corrector," conducted by Dr. Peter Irving in support of Aaron Burr. Mr. Duer was appointed chairman of a committee on colleges and academies, and succeeded in passing a bill, which is the original of the existing law on the subject of the common-school income. He was also chairman of the committee that arranged the constitutionality of the state law vesting the right of navigation in Livingston and Fulton, and throughout his whole career bore a prominent part in promoting canal legislation. He was judge of the supreme court from 1822 till 1823, when he was elected president of Columbia college, where he remained until at a time of his death; he signed in 1842. During his administration he delivered to the senior class a course of lectures on the constitutional jurisprudence of the United States (published in 1833; revised ed., 1836). He delivered a eulogy on President Monroe from the porch of the college. After his retirement he resided in Morristown, N. J., where he wrote the life of his grandfather, Lord Stirling (published by the Historical society of New Jersey). In 1847 he delivered an address in the college chapel before the literary societies of Columbia, and in 1846 an historical address before the St. Nicholas society, which gives early reminiscences of New York, and describes the scenes connected with the inauguration of President Washington, both of which were published. He was the author of two pamphlets addressed to Cadwallader D. Colderan on the "Steamboat Controversy," and the "Life of William Alexander, Earl of Stirling." (New York, 1847).

—Another son, John, jurist, b. in Albany, N. Y., 7 Oct., 1793; d. on Staten Island, 8 Aug., 1858, entered the army in his sixteenth year, but after two years of active service in the Philadelphia district of the United States army, began practice in Orange county, N. Y., and removed to New York city about 1820, where he acquired reputation as an insurance lawyer. He was a delegate to the State constitutional convention in 1821, and in 1825 was appointed one of the commissioners to revise the statutes of the state, and afforded valuable assistance in the preparation of the first half of the work. He was elected an associate judge of the superior court, and, on the death of Judge Oakley in 1837, became chief justice. He has published "A Lecture on the Law of the Sea," (New York, 1844); "A Treatise on the Law and Practice of Marine Insurance," which has become a standard authority in the United States (2 vols., 1845-6); "A Discourse on the Life, Character, and Public Services of John Shore, the late Governor of New York," delivered by request before the judiciary bar of the city and county of New York (12 April, 1848); "Three of the Revised Statutes of the State," in connection with Benjamin F. Butler and John G. S. Ponce, evidence of the decisions of the superior court, the sixth volume of which he left incomplete.

—William, son of William Alexander, lawyer, b. in New York city, 25 May, 1803, was graduated at Columbia in 1824, studied law, and removed to Oswego in 1828. In 1832 he was an unsuccessful candidate for the legislature, and in that year returned to New York, and went thence to New Orleans. In 1835 he again resided in Oswego, and was a member of the New York legislature in 1840, and district attorney for Oswego county from 1845 till 1847. He was twice elected to congress as a whig, serving from 1847 till 1851.

DUERINK, John Baptist, missionary, b. in St. Giles, near Lernonde, Belgium, in 1809; d. in Kansas in 1837. He was educated in the Episcopal seminary of Ghent, and, having long desired to visit the countries of North America, he embarked for the United States in 1833. He entered the Society of Jesus in Missouri, beginning his novitiate at St. Stanislaus, near Florissant, in 1834, afterward teaching for several years, and serving as treasurer of the colleges of Cincinnati, St. Louis, and Bardstown. He was an accomplished botanist, and traversed a great portion of Illinois and Ohio in search of rare plants and flowers, discovering several new varieties, one of which is known as the prunus Duerrinkiana. In 1849 he sailed for China, with a view of promoting the mission of the Pottawattamies, which he conducted, and which was his great success. These savages had already been converted, but he civilized them, and induced them to prefer agriculture to the chase. He established schools for the youth of the tribe, and succeeded in delivering them from the habit of cannibalism. He died in 1849. His last work is "A Discourse on the Negroes of the United States," and the "American Negro," a work which he published in 1850.

—John, a. d. in Philadelphia, Pa., in April, 1831. Before coming to the United States he was prominent as an actor at the Theatre Royal in his native city. He made his first appearance in this country at the Federal street theatre, Boston, 8 Nov., 1810, as George Gossamer in "Laugh with You," and his first appearance in New York was at the Park theatre, 14 Jan., 1814, as Octavian in "The Mountaineers," and the "Three Singles." Mr. Duff was for many years the most popular actor in the old theatre in Philadelphia. He left the stage in 1811 as a "stock star," and attracted far better houses than many who claimed the highest honors. His versatility seems to have been unbounded. He could act Richard or Jeremy Diddler, sing a comic song or take a part in an opera, with equal acceptability. In 1829, when the real Mrs. Duff, b. in London, England, in 1795; d. in New York, 5 Sept., 1857, was the daughter of an Englishman named Dyke, who had held an office in the service of the East India company, and died, leaving her and her sisters with small support. They received instruction in dancing from the miss of D'Egville, and made their first appearance as professional dancers at the Dublin theatre. While playing with a party of amateurs at Kilkeny, Mary attracted the attention of Thomas Moore, who, though be could not afford to purchase her freedom, "Jane's Folly," but, receiving no encouragement, he transferred his attentions to her sister, Elizabeth, whom he soon married. After her marriage Mrs. Duff came to Boston with her husband, in 1810, where she made her first appearance on the American stage as "Juliet," but without success. Subsequently she appeared in characters of minor importance, and also in serious pantomimes. In 1817 she began to develop great ability. In 1823 she visited New York for the first time, and appeared in the Park theatre as Hermione in the "Distressed Mother," adapted from Racine's "Andromache." This was the character in which her talents were first asserted and in which she first became known. About this time she played leading Shakespearean parts with Edmund Keen, who considered her the equal of the foremost British actresses of that day. She visited this country in 1825, and made her first appearance in London as Isabella in the "Fateful Marriage." Her beauty and talent made her a great favorite throughout the United States. While she was travelling from Cincinnati to New Orleans upon the Mississippi river the Asiatic cholera broke out there. Fearless for her own life, she administered to the sick and dying, and upon her arrival in New-leans received a vote of thanks from the survivors. She made her last appearance in New Orleans in 1888 for the benefit of the orphan boys' asylum. After the death of Mr. Duff she married Mr. Seevir, a lawyer in that city, and retired from the stage.

Duff, Peter, educator, b. in the province of New Brunswick, Canada, 18 Feb., 1802; d. in Pittsburg, Pa., 13 Sept. 1869. His parents emigrated from Scotland in 1802, and settled on a large farm in New Brunswick. Filled with the desire for an active life, he left the farm without the knowledge of his family and went to Edinburgh, where he was educated. His intention was to become a physician, but he finally decided to enter business, and returned to New Brunswick, settling in St. Johns, here he soon became prominent, owning many ships and extensive warehouses. Owing to a large fire in 1835, he became bankrupt and went to Pittsburg, Pa., where, in 1840, he founded "Duff's mercantile college," one of the first institutions of the kind in the country, which was very successful, and was carried on by his sons after his death. He published the "North American Accountant" (1847; enlarged ed., 1867; 20th ed., 1885).

Duffie, Mary Gordon, author, b. in Alabama about 1840. She lived on a large farm in Blount county, Ala., dresses in ancient and eccentric style, and writes under the pseudonym of "Mary Duff Gordon." In May, 1874, she delivered the address of welcome to the visiting Press association of New York to Alabama. She has written a series of papers in aid of the development of southern industries, and numerous poems, among which "Cleopatra" is the best known. Miss Duffie is a member of the American historical and biographical society, of the North American geographical society, and of the New Orleans academy of sciences, and is also the author of a "History of Alabama," "Guide to the Mammoth Cave, Kentucky," guide-books to Blount Springs, Ala., and to various interesting places along the southern railways.

Duffin, Frederick Temple Hamilton Blackwood, Earl of, British statesman, b. in Florence, Italy, 24 June, 1826. His father was Price, fourth Baron Dufferin and Claneboye, and his mother, Helen Selina, a granddaughter of Richard Brinsley Sheridan, was well known as a writer of prose and verse. He was educated at Eton, and at Christ Church, Oxford, but left the university without taking a degree. He was elected to the British House of Commons by his father's title in 1841, and was for some years subsequently lord-in-waiting to the queen. In 1856 he was appointed viceroy of India in 1884, an office that he now holds (1857). He is the author of "Narrative of a Journey from Oxford to Skibbereen during the Year of the Irish Famine" (London, 1847); "Letters from High Latitudes" (London, 1860); "Contributions to an Inquiry into the State of Ireland" (1866); "Irish Emigration and the Tenure of Land in Ireland" (1867); and "Mr. Mill's Plan for the Pacification of Ireland examined" (1886). A collection of his "Speeches and Addresses" was published in 1882 by the Earl of Aberdeen. "History of the Administration of the Earl of Dufferin in Canada" was published by William Leggo (Montreal, 1878).

Duffie, Alfred Nattie, soldier, b. in Paris, France, 1 May, 1845; d. in Cadiz, Spain, 1 Nov., 1880. He studied at several military academies in Paris, and was graduated at the military college of St. Cyr in 1854 as 2d lieutenant. He served in Algiers and Senegal, and in the Crimea during the war with Russia, where he was promoted to 1st lieutenant of cavalry. He afterward took part in the campaign against Austria, and was awarded the medals of honor. He came to the United States in 1860, accepted a captaincy in the 1st New Jersey cavalry at the beginning of the civil war, and was DUFFIELD, George, clergyman, b. in Lancaster county, Pa., 7 Oct., 1732; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 2 Feb., 1790. About 1732 his father, George Duffield, emigrated from Ireland to Pennsylvania, where he bought extensive lands. The son was partly educated at Newark, Del., and subsequently entered Princeton, where he was graduated in 1753. He studied theology under Dr. Robert Smith, of Pequea, and, after officiating for two years as tutor in Princeton, was ordained in September, 1761, and took charge of the united Presbyterian churches in the frontier towns of Caroline, Big Spring, and Morgan, Pa. In 1766 Mr. Duffield made a missionary tour through the valleys of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, the object of which was to administer the offices of religion to families scattered throughout that region, and to establish churches. He warmly expressed the sentiments of the "New Lights" in opposition to the "Old Side" party, and encountered much opposition, which was continued after his removal in 1771 to the 3d Presbyterian church in Philadelphia, and increased by the fact that for a time he was the only Presbyterian in the city. On one occasion his church was barred against him, and there was such a disturbance that a magistrate was called to read the riot act, but he was finally allowed to govern his church unmolested. During the Revolution he served as chaplain and fearlessly shared the dangers of the service with the rank and file of the army; he was so hated by the enemy that a reward was offered for his head. He was also associate chaplain with Bishop William White of the 1st Continental congress. He took an active part in the organization of the Presbyterian church after the Revolution, and was a member of the general assembly, which place he held till his death. The degree of D.D. was conferred upon him by Yale in 1785. His only published works are: "An Account of a Missionary Tour through Western Pennsylvania in 1780," by order of the Presbytery of the Northern district; delivered 11 Dec., 1783. His son, George, b. 28 July, 1767, was a merchant in Philadelphia, and was register and comptroller of the state of Pennsylvania for many years. He was the father of George, b. in Strasburg, Lancaster co., Pa., 4 July, 1794; d. in Detroit, Mich., 26 June, 1868. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1811, studied theology in New York city under Dr. John M. Mason, and was licensed to preach in 1815, when he accepted a call to the Presbyterian church in Carlisle, Pa., where his grandfather had been pastor. He afterward held pastorates in Philadelphia, New York city, and Detroit, Mich., where he remained till his death. Dr. Duffield was a careful student of science, as well as a distinguished linguist. During his residence in Michigan he was in close contact with all educational and religious interests, and was twice regent of the State University. In the civil war he was conspicuous for his patriotism, striving to increase the number of troops sent from Michigan and helping to provide for wounded soldiers, among the families with whom he worked are: "Reformation" (New York, 1832); "Claims of Episcopal Bishops Examined" (New York, 1842); "Travels in the Holy Land"; and various discourses and addresses. — His wife, Isabella Graham Bethune, was a sister of Dr. George Bethune, and granddaughter of Isabella Graham, the philanthropist. — Their eldest son, George, b. in Carlisle, Pa., 12 Sept., 1816, was graduated at Yale in 1837, studied at Union theological seminary, New York city, and was ordained 27 Dec., 1840. He has held important pastorates in Brooklyn, N. Y., Philadelphia, and Michigan, where he has resided since 1861. His reputation depends chiefly upon the hymns which he has written and published, and which are held in much esteem by his church. — Another son, Divie Bethune, lawyer, b. in Carlisle, Cumberland co., Pa., 28 Aug., 1831, after studying at Dickinson, was graduated at Yale in 1846, and at the law-school in 1842. He was admitted to the bar in Detroit, Mich., in 1843, and has since practised his profession in that city. He has been a member of the board of education of Detroit for thirteen years, and is active in all educational interests throughout the state. He has delivered various public addresses, and has contributed to current literature both in prose and in poetry. He possesses a large and valuable library. — Another son, William Ward, soldier, b. in Carlisle, Pa., 19 Nov., 1833, was graduated at Columbia in 1852. He served in the Mexican war, was wounded at Cerro Gordo, 18 April, 1847, and also at Contreras, 18 Aug., 1847, while acting adjutant of the 2d Tennessee infantry and on Gen. Gideon J. Pillow's staff. After the close of the war he became a civil engineer. He was resident engineer of the Hudson river railroad in 1851, chief engineer of the Oakland and Ottawa railroad, Michigan, and located that line from Pontiac to Grand Haven; chief engineer of the Central military tract railroad, Ill., in 1854; and located and built line of the Grand trunk railroad, and built the line from Detroit to Port Huron. He served as lieutenant-colonel of the 4th Michigan infantry in 1861, and was in the first battle of Bull Run, and on 19 Sept., 1861, he was appointed colonel of the 9th Michigan infantry. He joined Gen. Sherman at Louisville, Ky., and was sent by him to occupy and fortify the pass through Muldraugh Hill, West Point, Ky., 22 Jan., 1862. He was appointed by Gen. Buell commander of the 3d brig. of the 14th corps, Army of the Cumberland, 22 April, 1862, and brigadier-general and president of the examining board under the act of congress to test the efficiency of volunteer officers, 2 May, 1862. He overtook the Confederate forces under Col. John Morgan at Lebanon, and captured the place after a sharp fight. He was assigned by Gen. Buell to command all the forces in Kentucky, 8 May, 1862, and was relieved of this post on 10 Sept. He rejoined the 4th corps, Army of the Cumberland, under Gen. Thomas, and served with it until the battle of Murfreesboro', in which he was disabled by two severe wounds and captured. Unable to take the field at the time required by the act of congress, he resigned, and was appointed chief engineer of the Hudson river railroad. He was employed in 1869 to survey lands in Colorado, in 1871-2 was chief engineer of the Philadelphia and Mt. Kiffrd him; in 1872 he located that line from Paris to Hazard. He was elected to the Michigan state senate in 1880, and in 1882 was employed in surveying government land in Dakota. In 1885 he was re-appointed chief engineer of the Kentucky union railroad. He has published "School of his First Talks" and "The Great Line" (Philadelphia, 1882). — Another son, Samuel Pearce, physician, b. in Carlisle, Pa., 24 Dec., 1833, was graduated at the University of Michigan. in 1854, and remained there studying chemistry and anatomy till the following year, when he went to the University of Pennsylvania and studied medicine. He went to Berlin in 1856 to be treated for failing eyesight, and after obtaining relief studied physics and chemistry there and in Liebig's laboratory in Munich, finally receiving the degree of Ph. D. at the University of Giessen, Hesse. In 1858 he began to practice medicine at Detroit, still continuing his chemical investigations and giving special attention to toxicology and medical jurisprudence. He soon became known as an analytical chemist, and has been frequently called upon to testify in the courts as an expert. For 1892 he worked with his friend E. George Dragendorff in the laboratory of the Imperial university of Russia, at Dorpat, and is now (1887) engaged in writing a work describing his investigations there. Dr. Duffield arranged the chemical laboratory for the Detroit medical college, and delivered the opening address there in a volume entitled "Hand Poems" (Boston, 1844), which had a large sale. He was one of the founders of the American or "know-nothing" party. During the civil war he joined the 176th regiment of New York volunteers, and was commissioned colonel. He was captured by the Confederates, and confined in the Libby prison. After the war he resumed editorial and literary work, and became connected with the "New York Tribune." He delivered an oration on the heroic success at the Cooper institute (6 April, 1867) on the second anniversary of the death of Abraham Lincoln (New York, 1867). His publications are "A Comprehensive Summary of General Philosophy" (1845); "The Iron Harp" (Philadelphia, 1847); "The Lyndian Queen," a tragically, produced at the Walnut street theatre, Philadelphia (1849); "MIXCXXLVIII, or the Year of the People" (1849); "Parnassus in Pilory, a Satire, by Motley Manners, Esq." (New York, 1851); "The Mission of Intellect," a poem read in New York (1852); "Art's True Mission in America" (New York, 1867); "The Gospel of Labor," a poem read in New York (1864); "The building of the Garfield statue in Washington, in May, 1887. He was an unsuccessful Republican candidate for congress in 1870, and has been corporation counsel for Detroit since 1878. He is also president of the state military board of Michigan. — Senator George, b. in Brooklyn, N. Y., in 1843, was graduated at Yale in 1863, and in 1866 entered the Presbyterian ministry. He is now (1887) pastor of a church in Bloomfield, N. J. He has contributed to "The Evangelist" under the pen-name of "Anselmus." His publications are "The Heavenly Land," in English verse, from the "De Contemptu Mundi" of Bernard de Moraia (New York, 1868); "Warp and Woof" (1870); and "English Hymns, Their Authors, and History," a learned and exhaustive work (1880).

DUFFIELD, John Thomas, clergyman, b. in McNellisburg, Pa., 19 Feb., 1828. He is a descendant of George Duffield, an early settler of Pennsylvania. He graduated at Princeton in 1841, and assumed charge of the mathematical department. He afterward studied in the Theological seminary at Princeton, was appointed tutor of Greek in Princeton college, and served as adjunct professor of mathematics from 1847 till 1850. He was licensed to preach in 1840, and in the following year was elected president of the Methodists of Princeton, and was ordained by the Presbyterian New Brunswick in 1851. During the two years that he had charge of that church, in connection with his duties in college, he published the "Prince- ton Pulpit," a volume containing a sermon by each of the Presbyterian clergymen of Princeton. He was professor of mathematics in Princeton from 1850 till 1871, and also professor of mechanics from 1862 till 1871. He was chosen moderator of the New Jersey synod in 1865. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by Princeton in 1872. His publications include a sermon on the "Second Advent" (1866); a "History of the Second Presbyterian Church of Princeton"; and a review articles on "The Philosophy of Mathematics" (1866) and "Evolution as it Respects Man and the Bible" (1875).

DUGANNE, Augustine Joseph Hickey, author, b. in Boston, Mass., in 1832; d. in New York, 20 Oct., 1884. While quite young he wrote patriotic songs and poems, which were published in newspapers and became popular. These were collected and published in a volume entitled "Hand Poems" (Boston, 1844), which had a large sale. He was one of the founders of the American or "know-nothing" party. During the civil war he joined the 176th regiment of New York volunteers, and was commissioned colonel. He was captured by the Confederates, and confined in the Libby prison. After the war he resumed editorial and literary work, and became connected with the "New York Tribune." DUGASE, Louis Alexander, physician, b. in Washington, Ga., 8 Jan., 1866. His parents were of French ancestry, and emigrated from Santo Domingo, W. I. He was educated at home, studied medicine with Dr. John Dent, and in 1887 was graduated at the medical department of the University of Maryland. After attending lectures in Baltimore and Philadelphia, and spending several years in study of the law, he settled at Augusta, Ga., in 1881. In 1892 he united with five others in founding the Medical college of Georgia, in which he still holds the professorship of surgery. In 1889 the degree of LL. D. was conferred upon him by the University of Georgia. For many years he was president of the Medical society of Augusta, and he has been president of the Medical association of Georgia. During the civil war he was volunteer and consulting surgeon of military hospitals. From 1851 till 1855 he was editor of the "Medical and Physical Journal." Among his most important contributions to the literature of his profession are those on "Rheumatism," "Ophthalmia," "Colica Pictorum," "Convulsions," "Surgical Operations during Mesmeric Insensibility," "Use of Quinine in Fever," "Diagnosis of Shoulder Dislocation," "Fracture of the Acetabulum," "Transactions of the Medical Association of Georgia" (1874-7), and "Pathological Peculiarities of Negroes."

DUGDALE, Richard L., political economist, b. in Paris, France, in 1841; d. in July, 1883. His father was engaged in business in France, but, owing to pecuniary losses, returned to England in 1848. Here the son developed artistic talent, which led to his being placed in the government drawing-school at Somerset House. In 1851 his family came to New York. At the age of fourteen he was employed by a sculptor to do some artistic work, which he accomplished with much credit. For a time he resided in Indiana, but returned to New York, where he entered into mercantile business and attended the night-schools at Colony Hall. In 1861 he was first selected for the ministry of the New York City Young Men's Church, and two years after he was ordained to the bar. He was secretary of the section on sociology of the New York association for the advancement of science and the arts, of the New York social science society, of the New York sociology club, and of the Civil service reform association; treasurer of the New York Young Men's Liberal Club, and vice-president of the Society for the prevention of cruelty to animals. He became a member of the New York prison association in 1868, to whose work he gave his first attention. His aim was to improve prison discipline and the treatment of convicts, and to obtain practical aid for them after their release. He visited many prisons, learned the histories of criminals, and published "The Jukes, Hereditary Crime" (New York, 1877), which attracted much attention both in this country and in Europe. In "Parsons New York of Animals" he brevly draws the lessons learned from his investigations. He also published essays on sociological subjects in various periodicals.

DUGGAN, James, R. C. bishop, b. in the county Dublin, Ireland, in 1825. He came to the United States when very young, studied for the ministry in St. Louis, was ordained in 1847, and was immediately afterward appointed rector of the ecclesiastical seminary of the diocese. In 1850 he was made assistant pastor of the Cathedral of St. Louis, and in 1854 created vicar-general of the diocese and pastor of the Church of the Immaculate Conception. He was consecrated coadjutor archbishop in 1857, with the title of Bishop of Antigone, and was afterward nominated bishop of Chicago, but failing health soon compelled him to travel abroad. His administration had given great dissatisfaction, and several priests complained of it to the court of Rome, on learning which he hastened home and removed those who had accused him. But it soon became evident that his mind was giving way, and in 1869 his symptoms developed into insanity and he was removed to an asylum in Missouri. He has never recovered.

DUGGAN, Peter Paul, artist, b. in Ireland about 1810; d. in Paris, 15 Oct., 1861. He came to the United States at an early age, and qualified himself for an art professorship, which he obtained in the New York free academy soon after its opening. He devoted himself principally to crayon-drawing, and occasionally painted in oils. His crayon portraits were delicate and truthful. One of his best was his picture of the poet Bryant. He was compelled to resign his office and to abandon all work of a worldly nature. He spent the last years of his life in Europe, traveling about the continent, and rose to the rank of major; but, having been placed on half-pay, he retired to Martinique, where he had inherited a large estate, on which he lived for nearly twenty-five years. He supported the doctrines of the French revolution, and was elected commander of the national guard of the island, which office he held for three years; but being placed between the white colonists, who were almost unanimously opposed to the new ideas, and the excited negroes, who were impatient to revenge their former masters, he was forced to resign, and sailed in 1792 for France as deputy to the National convention for Martinique. But he soon resigned his seat and re-entered the army, was commissioned general of brigade, and soon rose to the rank of division-general in the army which had been sent to subdue the peasants of Toulon, where he was conspicuous for his ability and courage, as also for his humanity after the surrender. During the siege a young artillery officer, Bonnarte, laid before the general a plan to expel the British fleet from the bay, which would lead to the capture of the city, and Dugommier, recognizing the genius of the young officer, approved the plan with the warmest praise. Dugommier commanded afterward the French army of the eastern Pyrenees, repeatedly defeated the Spanish armies, and captured from them Fort St. Elie, Collauzure, Port-Vendres, and Bellegarde. He finally crossed the Pyrenees, and during the siege of San Sebastian was killed by the burning of a shell.

DUGÉ, Charles Oscar, poet, b. in New Oreleans, La., 1 May, 1821. His parents were Americans of French descent. He was educated in Avugne, and at the college of St. Louis, in Paris, and while a student wrote verses that Cha-teaubriand commended for their "noble and natural expression, without affectation or extravagance." In 1852 he became editor of a daily paper in New Orleans, "L'Orphelin," for which he was the only member of the bar. He has published "Essais poétiques" (1847), consisting of descriptions of southern scenery, and occasional poems; two dramatic works on subjects drawn from the romantic legends of Louisiana, "Mila au Mort de La Salle" and "Le Cygne, ou Mingh"; an Indian plot, in which Tecumseh is one of the characters (1852); and "Philosophie morale," which was published in French and English.

DUHAMEL, Joseph, Canadian lawyer, b. in Montreal, 26 Jan., 1806. He was educated at the colleges of tier, St. Paul's and St. Hugues, at the Jesuit college in Montreal, where he completed his classical education. He then studied law in Montreal, and was called to the bar in April, 1837.
He first formed a partnership with the late Cyrille Archambault, then with Godfroy. After his retirement, he became head of the legal firms of Duhamel, Rainville, Rinfret & Rainville (now Duhamel, Rainville & Maceau). Mr. Duhamel is a liberal in politics, and was unanimously elected president of the Reform association of the province of Quebec in April, 1867. After his retirement, he became head of the largest practices of the Montreal bar.
DUHAMEL, Joseph Thomas, Canadian R. C. archbishop, b. in Connaught, county of Vercheres, Canada, 6 Nov., 1841. He studied at the College of Ottawa, prepared for the priesthood under the direction of the Oblate Fathers, was ordained priest in 1863, and was immediately appointed curé of Buckingham. Here his administrative qualities attracted the notice of his superiors, and as the parish of St. Eugene was in need of a church he was sent to build one. In 1869 he accompanied his bishop to the Vatican council in the capacity of theologian. In 1874 he was consecrated bishop of Ottawa. He devoted himself especially to the advancement of education in his diocese, developing and improving the College of Ottawa, invited the Jesuits to open establishments, and founded several Christian Brothers' schools. In 1878 he made his first visit to Rome as bishop, and in 1882 revisited it to make arrangements for the division of his diocese. In 1886 Bishop Duhamel was created first archbishop of Ottawa. In 1889 he was constituted a count of the Holy Roman empire, and is also assistant at the pontifical throne, a knight grand cross of the order of the holy sepulchre, and an advocate of St. Peter's.

DUHAMEL, William, physician, b. in Maryland in 1827; d. in Washington, D. C., 15 Aug., 1883. He was educated at St. Mary's, Md., graduated at Maryland university of medicine in 1849, and practised near Washington, D. C., for several years in partnership with Dr. Bayne. In 1852 he was appointed adjunct professor of surgery in Georgetown medical college. Dr. Duhamel was called to attend the president of the United States in 1859, and continued to visit all the occupants of the White House during three presidential terms. He also served as chief physician for ten years to the U. S. prisons in the District of Columbia, and was a member of several learned societies, in which he occupied important offices. He contributed valuable articles on the use of chloroform and other professional subjects to the "Stethoscope," of Virginia, and to the "New Jersey Medical Journal," and wrote a treatise on the "National Hotel Disease." (at Washington.)

DUHRING, Louis Adolphus, physician, b. in Philadelphia, 23 Dec. 1845. His father emigrated from Germany in 1818, and became a successful merchant. The son was graduated at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1867, and became one of the resident physicians to the Philadelphia hospital. He made a special study of cutaneous diseases, spending at the end of fifteen months in Europe, where he spent two years in acquiring a knowledge of dermatology in the hospitals of Paris, London, and Vienna. He returned to this country in 1870, and opened in Philadelphia a dispensary for skin diseases. He was also, in 1871-2, one of the editors of the "Photographic Review of Medicine and Surgery." In 1871 he was chosen clinical lecturer upon his specialty in the University of Pennsylvania, and in 1876 professor of diseases of the skin. In 1878 he was elected dermatologist to the Philadelphia hospital. He acted as physician to his dispensary until 1880, and has since been the consulting physician. He published "An Atlas of Skin Diseases" (1876); "A Practical Treatise on Diseases of the Skin," the latter translated into French, Italian, and Russian (1877); and "Epitome of Skin Diseases" (1879). The author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 23 Feb., 1836, was educated partly in her native city and partly in Europe, and has travelled extensively in the United States, Europe, Asia, and Africa. Miss Duhring has published two volumes of critical essays on social life, and has prepared a third, which is soon to be issued. The titles of the volumes that have already appeared are "Philosophers and Fools" (Philadelphia, 1874), and "Gentlefolks and Others" (Philadelphia, 1876).

DUKE, William, clergyman, b. on Patapsco Neck, Md., 15 Sept., 1757; d. in Elkton, Md., in 1840. He was licensed as an exhorter when only sixteen years of age, and continued preaching until the spring of 1780, when, his health failing, he devoted the following summer to study, taking lessons in Latin and 726. Methodists had been regarded as a branch of the Episcopal church, and Mr. Duke had always considered himself an Episcopalian. When, therefore, at Christmas of that year, the Methodist conference constituted itself a separate church, Mr. Duke at once severed his connection with it. In 1785 he was admitted to holy orders by Bishop Seabury, and in 1787 was called to preside over St. Paul's parish in Prince George county, Md. His salary being small, and not easily collected under the new voluntary system, Mr. Duke was again compelled to resort to teaching, and so continued in all probability until the time of his death, which occurred in 1840.

DUKE, William, physician, b. in Maryland in 1827; d. in Washington, D. C., 15 Aug., 1883. He was educated at St. Mary's, Md., graduated at Maryland university of medicine in 1849, and practised near Washington, D. C., for several years in partnership with Dr. Bayne. In 1852 he was appointed adjunct professor of surgery in Georgetown medical college. DUKES, Joseph, missionary, b. in what is now the state of Mississippi in 1811. His parents were half-breed Choctaw Indians, and Joseph was born in the Choctaw nation. At the age of ten he was placed in one of the missionary schools at New Orleans. After the sale of the Choctaw lands to the United States, Mr. Dukes remained several years in Mississippi, assisting Rev. Cyrus Byington in the preparation of a grammar and lexicon of the Choctaw language. He afterwards went to New Orleans, and served as interpreter, was chosen an elder in one of the churches, and was licensed to preach by the presbytery in 1833. He was an excellent preacher in the Choctaw language, and was highly esteemed among the tribe. He also served as captain, or “head man” of the tribe, translated the Choctaw laws, was some time judge of the supreme court, repeatedly chosen a member of the general council, and acted for five years as...
DULANY, Daniel, statesman, b. in Maryland in July, 1732, at Baltimore, Md., 19 March, 1777. He was a lawyer of Annapolis, Md., and served many years as commissioner-general, secretary of state, attorney-general, and councillor of Maryland, before the Revolution. Few details regarding his career have been preserved, but he ranked high in his profession, and was considered one of the most distinguished men of his time. Although a loyalist, in which character he engaged in a warm newspaper discussion with Charles Carroll, he was earnestly opposed to the stamp-act, being credited with the following sentiment: "There may be a trial, redress may be obtained. Till then I shall recommend a legal, orderly, and prudent resistance to be expressed in a zealous and vigorous industry. A garment of linen-woolsey, when made the distinction of patriotism, is more honorable than an armament of an emperor without it. Let the manufacture of America be the symbol of dignity and the badge of virtue, and it will soon break the feters of distress." Josiah Quincy, of Massachusetts, while on a journey to the southern states in 1773, speaks of having spent "three hours with the celebrated Daniel Dulanay." He was the author of "Considerations on the Propriety of Imposing Taxes on the British Colonies," etc. (London, 1766).

DULANY, Lloyd, loyalist, d. in London, England, in 1785. He was a resident of Annapolis, Md., in 1774, the year of the death of the last British governor of the province. He was a member of the committee of correspondence of the province, and was a delegate to the Virginia convention. He was a horseman and officer of marines, d. in Beltsville, Md., 4 July, 1808. He was appointed from Virginia as 3d lieutenant, 10 June, 1817, became 1st lieutenant, 19 June, 1819, and captain, 1 July, 1834. He was promoted to a brevet majorship, for meritorious conduct in the Florida war, 3 March, 1843, and made full major, 17 Nov., 1847. He served in the Mexican war, and succeeded to the command of a battalion on the death of Maj. Twiggs. He was made brevet lieutenant-colonel, 14 Sept., 1847, for "gallantry at Chapultepec, the capture of the Bexar, and the city of Mexico," and colonel, 26 July, 1846.

DULCÉY GARAY, Domingo (dool-thay), Marquis of Castel Florite, governor-general of Cuba, b. in Rioja, Spain, in 1808; d. in Madrid, 28 Nov., 1869. He entered the army in 1823, took part in the first Carlist war, where he distinguished himself by the bravery of his conduct. He became famous for his gallant defence of the queen's palace with 48 men against 1,000 insurgents under Diego Leon. Isabella made him brigadier-general in 1847, and in 1849 he was promoted to field-marshall. In 1858, while commanding the cavalry in Brazil, he took part with Marshal O'Donnell in the Vicalvaro insurrection, and was afterward made a lieutenant-general. In 1862 Sorzano made him governor-general of Cuba, where he became popular. He took stringent measures against the slave traffic, founded free schools, and introduced useful reforms in every department. During his administration occurred the famous extradition case of Col. Arguelles, who, having sold as slaves 141 African negroes who were entitled to their freedom by the law, fled to the United States to avoid punishment. The government asked for his extradition, and, although there was no treaty between the two countries at that time, Sec. Seward, after a long diplomatic correspondence, ordered Arguelles to be surrendered to the governor-general of Cuba. In 1866, after the fall of the liberal government, Gen. Dulce returned to Spain and made a report, in which he suggested a measure whereby all children born thenceforth of slave mothers should be declared free from birth. He was shortly afterward arrested on suspicion of being engaged in a conspiracy to depose the queen, but was soon released. The Revolution of 1888 restored him to influence, and in January, 1889, he was again appointed governor of Cuba, under very trying circumstances. A great part of the island was in open revolt, and Gen. Dulce tried to bring about a union of both the liberal and conservative sections to the insurgents, but failed. After a short though eventful administration, Gen. Dulce was compelled to resign by the Spanish vantage at Havana, on account of his desire to deal mercifully with captured insurgents. He returned to Spain in June, 1890, in broken health, and died during the same year.

DU LHUT, or DULUTH, Daniel Greysolon, explorer, b. in Lyons, France; d. near Lake Superior in 1709. He belonged to the numerous class of lesser French nobles, many of whom found their way to America. He obtained command of one of the small vessels then operating on the lakes, and by this method arrived at the scene of his famous labors. In 1696, on the expedition of the Sieur de la Vaugelas and a detachment of the company, he explored for the king the territory on the left bank of the Mississippi, in the summer of 1678, to the mouth of the Mississippi, and from there to the mouth of the Missouri. He then continued his explorations on the St. Croix. He was born in 1823, took part in the first Carlist war, where he distinguished himself by the bravery of his conduct. He became famous for his gallant defence of the queen's palace with 48 men against 1,000 insurgents under Diego Leon. Isabella made him brigadier-general in 1847, and in 1849 he was promoted to field-marshall. In 1858, while commanding the cavalry in Brazil, he took part with Marshal O'Donnell in the Vicalvaro insurrection, and was afterward made a lieutenant-general. He returned to Spain in June, 1890, in broken health, and died during the same year.
Father Hennepin and his companions, with whom he joined forces, and to whom he was of great assistance. In 1684 he caused two Indians, who had murdered the first Jesuit missionary on Lake Superior, to be shot, undaunted by the crowd of excited savages that surrounded him and his small band of white men. In 1686 Denoville ordered him to fortify the "deport," or strait, between Lakes Erie and Huron. He returned with fifty men and built a palisade fort, which he occupied for some time.

The year following, with Tonty and Durantaye, he joined Denoville in his campaign against the Senecas, bringing with him a body of Indians from the upper lakes. During the panic among the colonists that followed the Iroquois invasion of Montreal in 1689, Du Lhut, with twenty-eight Canadi ans, attacked twenty-two Iroquois in canoes, received their fire without returning it, and bore down upon and killed eighteen of them, capturing three and allowing but one to escape. In 1689 he was in command of Fort Frontenac, and in 1697 succeeded to the command of a company of infantry. For twenty-five years Du Lhut was a martyr to the gout, although he thought himself cured at one time by the intervention of an Iroquois saint. Parkman says that "while an habitual breaker of the fast, he was singularly noted for his patience and his services were great to the colony and crown, and his name deserves a place of honor among the pioneers of American civilization."

DULLES, John Welsh, editor, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 4 Nov., 1819; d. there, 17 Oct., 1892. He was graduated at Yale in 1844, and was Union theological seminary, New York city, in 1848, after spending two years in the study of medicine. He was a missionary in southern India in 1849-53, and in the latter year took charge of the missionary work of the American Sunday School Union. He became secretary of the publication committee of the Presbyterian general assembly in 1856, and, on the union of the two branches of the church in 1870, was chosen editorial secretary of the united board of publication, editing the tracts, books, and periodicals issued by that body. Princeton gave him the degree of D.D. in 1871. Dr. Dulles visited Europe in 1874, travelled in Egypt, Syria, Asia Minor, and Greece in 1878-9, and journeyed through Spain and Algeria in 1884. He was a nephew of John Welsh, late minister to England. H. W. Fuller, in St. James, New York, 4 Feb., 1893, and der, b. in Stendal, Prussia, 30 April, 1807; d. in Rochester, N.Y., 12 April, 1889. He studied theology and philosophy in the University of Halle, and became rector of a school at Werben in 1831. He accepted pastorates at Flossau, near Osterbarg, in 1830, and Magdeburg in 1843, and soon gained a reputation as a pulpit orator and a fearless exponent of liberal Christianity. In 1848 he received a call to the Liebfraukirche in Bremen, and while there entered enthusiastically into the political agitation of that time, strenuously opposing the illiberal measures of the Eichhorn ministry. He became pastor of the Emmanuel Church, "Daily Chronicle," a social-democratic sheet, which was suppressed in 1851, and "The Alarmist," a religious weekly. In 1832 the Bremen senate removed him from his charge; but sixteen years later this judgment was reversed by the appellate court of the free state. Besides the "Biedermann," or "The Exile," Dr. Dulon died, in 1853, first to Helgoland, and, in November following, to the United States. He became the pastor of an independent congregation in New York city, and at the same time issued a series of "Sabbath Leaves" in the interest of free education. He subsequently devoted himself to the cause of education, and opened in the city of New York the first German-American school established in the United States, which the civil war finally compelled him to abandon. In July, 1866, he was chosen director of the new German-American "Realschule" in Rochester, N.Y., where he remained until his death. Gen. Franz Sigel, also a Prussian, taught in Dr. Dulon's New York school, and subsequently married one of his daughters. Dr. Dulon's works include "Die Gelung der Bekenntnisschriften der reformirten Kirche" (Magdeburg, 1847); "Von Vampf um Völkerfreiheit" (1849); "Der Tag ist angebrochen," the sale of which was forbidden by the authorities (1853); and "Aus Amerika," a review of educational work in this country (1865).

DUMARESQUE, Philip, loyalist. He was a merchant of Boston, and was married to a daughter of Dr. Sylvester Gardiner. He was one of those who presented an address to Govs. Hutchinson and Gage in 1774 and 1775. In 1776 he went to Halifax with his family, and in 1778 was proscribed and banished. He was a Pennsylvania government collector of customs at New Providence, Nassau, residing there until his death. DUMAS, Alexandre Dary (de la Pailletiere), b. in Jeremie, Hayti, 25 March, 1782; d. in Villers-Cotterets, near Paris, 26 Feb., 1806. He was the son of the Marquis de la Pailletier. He was an officer in an African woman, Tienne Dumas, whose surname the boy adopted when he enlisted in 1770 in the queen's dragoons. In 1793 he had risen to the rank of general of division, and as such commanded for some time the army of the Eastern Pyrenees, served in the Army of the Alps, and took possession of the Great Saint-Bernard and Mont-Cenis. In 1794 he was commander-in-chief of the Army of the West. Assigned to service under Bonaparte in 1796, he assisted at the siege of Mantoa, and at the battle of Brientzen in 1798 he alone defended a bridge against a small force of cavalry till the French could come to the rescue. For this deed Bonaparte presented him to the directory as the "Horatius Cocles of the Tyrol." Gen. Dumas accompanied Bonaparte to Egypt in May, 1798, and in August suppressed the mission of the Philadelphia Merchants. On account of the climate and a disagreement with Gen. Berthier, he applied for a furlough, and sailed for France in 1799. A storm obliged the vessel to put into Taranto, and he was arrested by the Neapolitan government and detained for twenty-eight months as a prisoner. After his release the first consul declined to give him an appointment on account of his republican principles. Gen. Dumas was the father of the well-known French novelist, Alexander Dumas, the elder.

DUMAS, Mathieu, Count, French general, b. in Montpellier, 23 Nov., 1759; d. in Paris, 16 Oct., 1837. He entered the army in 1773, served as aide to Rochambeau in America in 1780-3, and distinguished himself at the siege of Yorktown. He was afterward sent on missions to Turkey and Holland, was a member of the legislature of Paris in 1791, and the friend of Lafayette. He was condemned to death, but fled to Switzerland, entered the military service of Napoleon, and was a general at Waterloo. He was active in the Revolution of 1830, and aided Lafayette in placing Louis Philippe on the throne of France. Besides the "Biedermann," or "The Exile," he wrote "Memoirs of my own Time" (1773-1826), which were published after his death by his son.
DUMMER, William, lieutenant-governor of Massachusetts, b. in Boston in 1677; d. there, 10 Oct. 1751. When Samuel Dummer was afterward governor of the colony in 1716, Dummer was commissioned lieutenant-governor, and after Shute left, 1 Jan., 1723, he acted as governor and commander-in-chief till the arrival of Gov. Burnet in 1728. He conducted the war with the Indians with skill, and with the New Englanders with ability and regard for the public good. After the death of Gov. Burnet he was commander-in-chief again till the arrival of Belcher. After 1730 he lived in retirement. When he died he left his valuable farm and the mansion-house, which is still standing, to endow Dummer academy in Byfield parish, in the town of Newbury, the earliest academy in New England, which was opened on 27 Feb., 1763, with twenty-eight pupils.—His brother, Jeremiah, scholar, b. in Boston, Mass., about 1695; d. in Plaistow, England, 19 May, 1750, was graduated at Harvard in 1769, was for a time in practice as a lawyer. He studied theology, and afterward spent several years at the University of Utrecht, where he obtained his doctor's degree. Soon after his return to America he was sent to England in 1710 as agent of Massachusetts, and remained in London in that capacity till 1721. He was a benefactor of Yale college, to which he presented 800 volumes. He was intimate with Bolingbroke, and adopted some of his views. He published theological and philosophical disquisitions in Latin while at Utrecht, and a "Defence of the New Englanders' Colonial Rights" in 1729; it was reprinted, 1765, in which he argued that the New England colonists held their charters by compact, in consideration for redeeming the wilderness and annexing it to the British dominions, and that their land-titles were not derived from the crown, which only held them for the sovereignty, but were based on purchases from the natives and on occupation and their own courage and enterprise. The proposal of the Board of trade to unite the colonies under a single vicecy and one assembly would produce, in his opinion, the result that it was chiefly intended to, that of encouraging the colonies to throw off their allegiance and constitute themselves a free state.

DUMONCHEL, John Baptist, Canadian merchant, b. in Sandwich, Ontario, in 1784; d. in Saint-Benoît, Canada, in 1820. He came in his youth to Canada, and studied at the college of Montreal. After serving some time as a clerk, he opened a commercial establishment in Saint-Benoît in 1810. Although he filled several public offices, he took the part of the people in their conflict with the British authorities, and, in consequence of having presided over some public meetings, was dismissed from the magistracy and deprived of his commission as mayor of militia. He took part in the insurrection of 1837, and fled after the defeat of the Canadians at Saint-Eustache, but was betrayed and given up to the soldiers of Gen. Colborne. He was brought to Montreal and imprisoned, being shortly after joined by his two sons, who had also been taken prisoners. He was treated with great severity, and when Lord Durham offered to liberate him and his companions, he declined the offer, insisting that they had been guilty of high treason, he consented to do so. He was set at liberty however, without the execution of this penalty.

DUMONT, Julia Louisa, author, b. in Waterford, Ohio, in October, 1794; d. in Vevay, Ind., 2 Jan. 1870. She was the daughter of John David and Martha Carey, who were among the earliest settlers of Marietta, Ohio. Her mother was herself an author, having published a book entitled "The Mountain Mourner." While Julia was an infant, her parents returned to their native state of Rhode Island, and, after her father's death she accompanied her mother to Greenfield, Saratoga co., N. Y. She attended the Milton academy, taught school in 1811-2, and in the latter year married John Dumont, afterward a well-known citizen of Indiana. She went with him to Ohio in 1818, and in 1814 to Vevay, Ind., where she spent the rest of her life, becoming eminent as a teacher. Mrs. Dumont was the earliest woman of the west whose writings have been preserved. She contributed largely to western periodicals, both in prose and verse, and published a little book of 142 pages, and entitled "A Child from Common Paths" (New York, 1856).—Her son, Ebenzer, soldier, b. in Vevay, Ind., 23 Nov., 1814; d. in Indianapolis, Ind., 16 April, 1871, was educated at Indiana university, but was not graduated, and, after studying law, was admitted to the bar, and began practice in his native town. He was chosen to the legislature in 1838, where he was speaker of the house, was treasurer of Vevay county in 1839-45, and was for many years president of the state bank. He fought in the Mexican war as a lieutenant-colonel, and afterward, as a colonel, distinguished himself at the battle of Huamantla. He was an elector on the democratic ticket in 1852, and again a member of the legislature in 1850 and 1853. At the beginning of the civil war he became colonel of the 7th Indiana regiment, and served with distinction in 1861 and 1862, as a captain, and in 1862, as a colonel, commanding the 15th brigade of the Army of the Ohio in January, 1862. He attacked and routed John Morgan at Lebanon, Ky., on 5 May, 1862, and in October of that year commanded the 12th division of Gen. Buell's army. On 28 Feb., 1863, he resigned his commission on account of failing health, and was elected as a unionist, serving from 1863 till 1867. Gen. Dumont was appointed governor of Idaho a short time before his death.

DU MOTAY, Cyprien Tesselé, chemist, b. in France in 1810; d. in New York city, 6 June, 1880. He was born at Vierzon, and studied at Nantes, and then removed to Paris, where he devoted himself to literature. His poems gained him admission to the salon of Madam Recamier, and he became intimate with the foremost writers of the day, including De Musset, Chateaubriand, Victor Hugo, and Dumas. Financial troubles drove him to Germany, where, turning his attention to chemistry and metallurgy, he secured several patents, one of which, for bleaching and dyeing fabrics, was bought by an English manufacturer for 80,000 francs. He then returned to Paris and became consulting chemist in a large laboratory, but was exiled for opposing the second empire, and saved himself from poverty by selling a process for bleaching wax to a London apothecary for £2,000. Napoleon III. recalled him to Paris in 1869, and appointed him commissioner of industrial chemistry, receiving medals at the exhibitions of 1865 and 1878 for his invention. During the siege of Paris he directed the ambulance service. Among his many important inventions in Europe were a process for etching glass, improvement of the method of preparing oxygen on a large scale, and a method of illumination by its use, known as the “oxy-carbureted light,” which has been successfully used for lighting mines and large public places, in New York early in 1879, and was consulting engineer and chemist of the Municipal gas company till his death. While in this country he patented small rotary motors, improvements in steam condensers (1879), and a new method of artificial refrigeration (1880). He left in manuscript a philosophical drama, “The Expiation of Faust.”

DUNBAR, Duncan, clergyman, b. in the northern highlands of Scotland about 1791; d. in New York city, 28 July, 1884. When about twenty years old he removed to Aberdeen and engaged in business, occupying preaching as his avocation. He settled in the province of New Brunswick in 1817, where he became a Baptist, and was immersed in the harbor of St. John, 31 Oct., 1818. He was soon afterward ordained, removed to the United States in December, 1823, and held pastorates in Philadelphia and elsewhere. Most of his ministry was spent in the McDougall street Baptist church in New York city. He was for twenty years a member of the board of managers of the American and foreign Bible Society. See his life by his son-in-law, Rev. Jeremiah Chaplin (New York, 1879).

DUNBAR, Major, soldier, b. Plymalth, Conn.; d. in Hartford, Conn., 19 March, 1777. He was a resident of Bristol (or, as some say, of Waterbury), and was convicted by the superior court in January, 1777, of holding a captain's commission under Sir Du Moulin, and of enlisting men for the British army. While under sentence of death he knocked down the sentries and escaped, but was apprehended, and on the day appointed, after listening to a sermon at the jail, from Rev. Abraham Jarvis, of Middletown, was hanged in presence of “a considerable number of people.” It is charged by Thomas Jones, in his “History of New York,” that there was no existing law in the colony making Dunbar's offence punishable with death, and that he was condemned under an ex-post-facto law. His young wife is said to have been treated inhumanly, being compelled to ride in the cart with her husband to his execution, and afterward expelled from Middletown, where she had taken refuge in a loyalist family. Four express were sent to Howe by Dunbar’s friends urging him to stop the execution by threatening retaliation, but he declined, and thereafter lived in several parts of the United States. He was a member of the Virginia conference of the Methodist church. For many years he was editor of “The Richmond Christian Advocate.”—His brother, William Wallace, clergyman, b. in Ashland, Va., 20 Dec., 1829, was graduated at Randolph-Macon college in 1850, and was a leader in the councils of his church. For many years he was editor of “The Richmond Christian Advocate.”—His brother, William Wallace, clergyman, b. in Ashland, Va., 20 Dec., 1829, was graduated at Randolph-Macon college in 1850, and was a leader in the councils of his church. For many years he was editor of “The Richmond Christian Advocate.”

DUNBAR, Thomas, British soldier, d. in 1767. He became colonel of the 48th foot, 29 April, 1752, was stationed in Nova Scotia, and joined Braddock’s expedition against Fort Duquesne. Braddock, by Washington’s advice, pressed on with 1,200 chosen men on 19 June, 1758, leaving Dunbar behind with the residue of the army. After the defeat of 9 July, Dunbar destroyed his remaining artillery, burned stores and baggage worth £100,000, pretending that it was done by Braddock’s orders, and ignominiously retreated. Dunbar was made lieutenant-governor of Gibraltar in 1756, and promoted to lieutenant-general, 18 Dec., 1760.

There he established, at New Orleans, the "Southwestern Baptist Chronicle," a religious weekly, to which he contributed largely. He was ordained in 1848, but, although preaching constantly, accepted no pastoral charge, devoting his entire time to his paper. In 1851, his health entirely failing him, he sailed for Europe, and spent nearly a year in Italy. On his return to New Orleans, convalescent, he was elected to the professorship of Greek and Latin in the University of Louisiana. Three years later he became pastor of the Coliseum place Baptist church in New Orleans, where he continued for six years, although twice compelled to visit Texas for his health. In 1861 his outspoken loyalty to the national government alienated the feelings of his people, and he was forced to go to the north, leaving his family. In the summer of 1862, after the occupation of the city by the Union forces, Dr. Duncan returned to New Orleans and engaged in secular occupations, especially as a newspaperman. He later promoted the return of Louisiana to the Union. Though suffering from consumption, which resulted fatally, he labored, with pen and voice, for this result, and before his death had the satisfaction of seeing its accomplishment. Columbia gave him the degree of Doctor of Laws in 1882, which was conferred on him by John the Baptist," based on a monograph by Von Rohden (New York, 1853); "History of the Baptists for the First Two Centuries of the Christian Era" (1857); and "The Tears of Jesus" (1859).

Here he continued preaching at intervals till 1682, when he returned to Scotland, and was appointed by King William principal of Glasgow university, where he remained until his death, supporting its interests with dignity and zeal. — His son, Alexander, b. in Carolina in 1684; d. in Scotland in 1742, became professor of mathematics in Glasgow university, and afterward published a grammar of that language (1736) that was long held in esteem.

DUNLOP, William, Canadian physician, b. in Greenock, Scotland, about 1785; d. in Canada in 1848. He was educated as a physician, served as a regimental surgeon in the war with the United States in 1812—5, and in India; published a book, founded a newspaper, lectured, and engaged in other enterprises before he came to Canada in 1826 with John Galt, the Scottish novelist. He was a contributor to "Blackwood's Magazine," and had been intimately known to Sir Walter Scott. He was a son, Maginn, Hogg, and others mentioned in "The Recreations of Christopher North." After arriving in Canada he contributed to this magazine "The Autobiography of a Rat," and wrote much for the local literature of political topics. In 1836 he founded the Toronto literary club, before which he frequently lectured. The first parliament after the union of Upper and Lower Canada met in 1841 at Kingston, and Dunlop was returned to it for Huron, which he represented until his resignation in 1847. He was a member from DUNMORE, John Murray, Earl, royal governor of Virginia, b. in 1732; d. in Ramsgate, England, in May, 1806. He was descended, in the female line, from the house of Stuart; succeeded to the peerage in 1759; was appointed governor of New York in 1770, and of Virginia in July, 1771. On his arrival at Williamsburg in 1772 he dissolved the Virginia assembly; and in May, 1774, he again dissolved the same body, because it resolved to keep the first of June, the day for closing the port of Boston, as a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer. On 9 April, Lord Dunmore caused the removal of the powder from the magazine at Williamsburg, on board an English ship. This incensed the people, and they took arms under Patrick Henry. Lord Dunmore, becoming alarmed at this action, convened the council, but nothing changed Henry's purpose. Lady Dunmore was sent on board the "Fowey" man-of-war, and the governor issued a proclamation against "a certain Patrick Henry" and his "deluded followers," but upon the receipt of the news from Lexington he fled to Fort Johnston, sending his wife to New York. In 1776, when the British army arrived in New York, Lord Dunmore was joined by a few loyalists, and carried on a petty warfare, plundering the inhabitants on the James and York rivers, and carrying off their slaves. On 9 Dec., his followers suffered a severe defeat at the battle of Great Bridge, and shortly afterward he burned Norfolk, then the most populous and flourishing town of Virginia. He was afterward obliged to take refuge on board his fleet, which was driven by well-placed batteries from one place to another, till he anchored near the mouth of the Potomac. Continuing his predatory warfare, he established himself early in June on Gwynn island, in the Chesapeake, there vainly awaiting aid, but was dislodged by the Virginians in July, being wounded in the leg. Washington said, in December, 1775, "I do not think that forcing his lordship on shipboard is sufficient. Nothing less than depriving him of life or liberty will secure peace to Virginia, as motives of resentment actuate his conduct to a degree equal to the total destruction of that colony." Lord Dunmore with his retinue continued during a part of 1776 on the coasts and rivers of Virginia, but, after various distressing adventures, he burned the smaller vessels, and sent the remainder to the West Indies. In 1779 his name appears in the confiscation act of New York. He returned to Great Britain, and was appointed governor of the Bermudas. — His wife, Elizabeth, d. at Southwood house, near Ramsgate, England, in 1818, was the daughter of the Earl of Galloway.

DUNN, John Henry, Canadian statesman, d. in London, England, 21 April, 1864. He came to Canada in 1829, and, having been appointed receiver-general and a member of the legislative and executive councils of Upper Canada, retained those offices till the union of the provinces in 1840. — His son, Alexander Roberts, b. in Canada; d. about 1867, entered the army, and served in the Crimean war. He was a lieutenant of horse in the 11th, Lord Cardigan's, hussars, rode in the celebrated charge of the light brigade at Balaklava, and was specially selected by his surviving comrades as the most deserving of them all to receive the Victoria crosses. In 1856 he went to Toronto, Canada, and in June, 1859, together with Baron de Rotenburg, became attached to the 100th, or Prince of Wales's, royal Canadian regiment. Subsequently he was stationed with his regiment at Gibraltar, and, on the retirement of the commander, was appointed lieutenant-colonel.

DUNN, Oscar, Canadian journalist, b. in Côteau du Lac, Quebec, in 1844; d. in the city of Quebec, 15 April, 1885. He studied law, and was admitted to the bar, but never practised, drifted into journalism, and wrote articles for all Canadian papers. His brother St. Hyacinthe, of which paper he became editor. Subsequently he resided in Paris, France, and contributed to the editorial columns of the "Journal." On his return to Canada he became editorially connected with "La Minerve," of Montreal, and also edited "L'Ouest Canadien," a weekly paper, for a time one of the editors and directors of "La revue Canadienne." He became librarian to the department of public instruction of Quebec, and held the office of secretary of that department at the time of his death. He wrote primarily on national, religious, and political topics, which were widely read, and was the author of a "Glossaire Franco-Canadien," a second edition of which he was preparing at the time of his death.

DUNN, Oscar James, lieutenant-governor of Louisiana, b. in Louisiana in 1820; d. in New Orleans, 20 Nov., 1871. He was born a slave, and as soon as he was old enough to do manual labor was purchased by a firm in the plastering trade, but after reaching his majority ran away from his owners. When Gen. Butler entered New Orleans he enlisted in the 7th Mississippi, a conscripted regiment, and was raised in Louisiana, and reached a captaincy, the highest rank then permitted to his race. When an incompetent person was promoted over him to the rank of major, he resigned his commission. After the war Capt. Dunn was active in promoting the reconstruction of his state. He had acquired wealth, and in 1868 became lieutenant-governor of Louisiana. John R. Lynch, then secretary of state of Mississippi, in an oration delivered at his funeral, said: "There now lie before us the remains of the first colored man who ever held an executive office in this country."
DUNN, Thomas, Canadian legislator, b. in 1750; d. in Quebec, 15 April, 1818. As a senior member of the Executive council of Lower Canada he assumed the administration of the government on the departure of Sir R. S. Milnes in 1805, and again became president on the recall of Lord Craig, performing this function until the arrival of Sir George Prevost in 1811. During the time that he held office he permitted Monsieur Panet to be elected to the codutiorship, and both then and afterwards to bend his best efforts to the disabilities which the Roman Catholic clergy suffered. He was also a puissie judge of the court of king's bench, and a Lower Canadian seigneur.—His son, William, British soldier, b. in London, England, in 1787; d. 24 July, 1863, entered the army in 1803, served in the campaign in Italy, at the battle of Maida and capture of Scylla Castle in 1806, in the expedition to Egypt in 1807, and the campaigns in the Peninsula in 1810 and 1811. He served in Canada in 1814 during the war with the United States, and was present at the taking of Moose island and the occupation of Castine. In 1857 he retired from active service with the rank of major-general on full pay.

DUNN, Williamson, pioneer, b. near Danville, Ky., 25 Dec., 1781; d. in Hanover, Ind., 11 Nov., 1854. He removed to Indiana territory in 1809, settled as an early speaker. While in the state legislature he was appointed justice of the peace, and judge of the court of common pleas of Jefferson county, in 1811, by Gen. Harrison, then governor of the territory. During the war of 1812 he was commissioned by President Madison captain of a company of rangers, an organization provided by congress for the protection of the frontier settlements, which he had in charge for two years. In 1814 Gov. Posey commissioned him an associate judge of the circuit court of Jefferson county. He held this office until 1816, when he entered the first legislature under the state constitution. He was one of the original members and first ruling elders of the Presbyterian church, organized in 1820 at Hanover, a village laid out on his farm. He was a representative in the first three legislatures of the state of Indiana, and was twice speaker. While in the state legislature he was virtually offered a seat in the U.S. senate, but declined. In 1833, having been appointed by President Monroe as register of the land office, he removed to the wilderness, and, in connection with Maj. Whitlock, the receiver, laid out the town of Crawfordsville. He was re-appointed register in 1837, retaining the office till 1899. He returned to Hanover in 1829, was one of the founders of Hanover college, to which he donated fifty acres of land, and served as one of its trustees for many years. He also gave to Wabash College the tract of land on which it was erected, and was a member of its first board of trustees. These colleges are indebted to him for their establishment. After his return to Jefferson county he was elected to the state senate, to fill an unexpired term, and in 1849 was a defeated candidate for the senate. He also served another term on the bench, to which he was re-elected, and held the office till the court was abolished. Judge Dunn began the movement that culminated in the election of Zachary Taylor to the presidency by the Whigs in 1848. Judge Dunn's unyielding devotion to conviction and to cost him his seat in the state senate. He was prominent in the councils of the Presbyterian church, and widely known as connected with the early history of Indiana.—His son, William McKee, lawyer, b. in Hanover, Jefferson co., Ind., 13 Dec., 1814. He was graduated at the Indiana state university in Bloomington in 1833, and was for three years principal of the preparatory department and professor of mathematics at Hanover college, Indiana. After a graduate course at Yale, where he received the degree of A. M. in 1838, he studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1841, and practiced for many years in Madison, Ind. He was a member of the legislature in 1848, a delegate to the State constitutional convention in 1850, and was then chosen to congress as a Republican, serving from 1859 till 1863. It is said he broke out he was offered a colonelcy by Gov. Morton, a brigadiership by President Lincoln, but declined both. During his second term he was chairman of the committee on patents. He was defeated in the election for the following congress, and on 13 March, 1863, was appointed major and judge-advocate, U.S. volunteers, in the department of Missouri. On 22 June, 1864, he became colonel and assistant judge-advocate-general, U.S. army, and was brevetted brigadier-general, U.S. army, in March, 1865, for faithful, meritorious, and distinguished services in his department. On the retirement of Judge-advocate-general Holt, he was elected to the place. He was a delegate to the Philadelphia loyalists' convention of 1866. Gen. Dunn became judge-advocate-general, with the rank of brigadier-general, on 1 Dec., 1875, and on 22 Jan., 1881, was appointed judge of the United States district court. On the retirement of Judge-advocate-general Holt, he was elected to the place. He was a delegate to the National Republican convention at Philadelphia. He began the practice of law at Portland, Ore., in 1830, and served in the Union army as colonel of the 5th Maine infantry, and in 1862 was U.S. consul at Vera Cruz, Mex. He removed to Minnesota in 1863, was a member of the legislature there in 1867, and in 1867–70 was state superintendent of public instruction. He was the author of a number of important educational books. He was a member of the legislature there in 1867, and in 1869–70 was state superintendent of public instruction. He was the author of a number of important educational books.

DUNNELL, Mark Hill, congressman, b. in Buxton, Me., 2 July, 1823. He graduated at Waterville college (now Colby university) in 1849, and for five years was the principal of Norway and Hebron academies. He was a member of the lower house of the Maine legislature in 1854, and in 1855 of the state senate, and from that time till 1859 was state superintendent of common schools. In 1856 he was a delegate to the National Republican convention at Philadelphia. He began the practice of law at Portland, Ore., in 1830, and served in the Union army as colonel of the 5th Maine infantry, and in 1862 was U.S. consul at Vera Cruz, Mex. He removed to Minnesota in 1863, was a member of the legislature there in 1867, and in 1867–70 was state superintendent of public instruction. He was the author of a number of important educational books. He was the author of a number of important educational books.

DUNNING, Annie Ketchum, author, b. in New York city, 2 Nov., 1881. She is a daughter of Hiram Ketchum, a politician of some distinction; was educated in private schools in New York, and was for several years a pupil of John S. C. Abbott. She married Rev. Andrew Dunning, pastor of the Congregational church in Thompson, Conn., and to supplement his small salary wrote her first story, "Clementina's Mirror" (New York, 1867). She then became a writer for the Presbyterian board of publication, by which means part of the full number, and about fifty in number, have been published. Most of her books have been written under the pseudonym of "Nelie Grahame." Her books include "Whispers from Dreamland" (Philadelphia, 1861); "Mistaken" (New York, 1866); "First Glass of Wine" (Boston, 1860); "Betty's Jests" (1866); "Only a Penny" (Philadelphia, 1867); "Miss Latimer's Meetings" (1869); "Fred Wilson" (1870); "Mary's New Friends" (1871); "A Story of Four Lives, or Mistaken" (Boston, 1871).

DUNNING, Edward Osborne, Congregational minister, b. in 1810; d. in New Haven, Conn., 23 March, 1874. He was graduated at Yale in 1832, and at its theological department in 1835, and was settled as a pastor in Rome and in Canajoharie, N. Y., till 1846. He then accepted an.
appointment from the American Bible society as their agent in the southern states, in which he continued till the civil war, when he became a champion in the army until, receiving his appointment on 28 June, 1862, and was stationed at Cumberland, Md., but returned to his work after the war.
He had become interested in exploring ancient mounds in various parts of the south, and continued his explorations till a few months before his death.
DUNNING, Francis Patterson, chemist, b. in Baltimore, Md., 3 March, 1831. He was graduated at the University of Virginia in 1873, became adjunct professor of analytical chemistry in that year, and in 1885 was made professor of analytical and agricultural chemistry. He was elected secretary of the chemical section of the American association for the advancement of science in 1885, and is a member of the American chemical society and other scientific bodies. Prof. Dunington is the author of numerous chemical investigations, accounts of which have appeared in the "Chemical News," "American Chemical Journal" the transactions of various societies, and elsewhere.

DUNSTER, Edward Swift, physician, b. in Springvale, York co., Me., 2 Sept., 1834. He is a lineal descendant of Henry Dunster, the first president of Harvard, was graduated from the institution of 1636. He received his medical degree from the Yale College of physicians and surgeons in 1859, beginning practice in that city in 1860. He entered the army as assistant surgeon in June, 1861, and served in West Virginia and in the peninsular campaign, acting as medical inspector and medical director of hospitals while being ordered to Philadelphia, Washington, and West Point, he resigned on 1 Feb., 1866, and resumed the practice of his profession in New York, making a specialty of obstetrics and the diseases of women and children. He was editor of the "New York Medical Journal" in 1866-'72, resident physician in charge of hospitals on Randall's island in 1869-'73, and professor of obstetrics and the diseases of women and children in the University of Vermont in 1869-'71.
He subsequently held the same chair in Long Island medical college, the medical school of Dartmouth college, and since 1873 in the University of Michigan. Among his contributions to professional literature are papers on "Relations of the Medical Profession to Modern Education": "Logic of Medicine": "Notes on Double Monsters": "History of Americanism": "The Comparative Mortality in Armies from Wounds and Disease": and "History of Spontaneous Generation."

DUNSTER, Henry, educator, b. in Lancashire, England, about 1612; d. in Scituate, Mass., 27 Feb., 1659. He was educated at Cambridge, England, in 1630-'4. Jeremy Taylor and John Milton being among his fellow-students. He emigrated to this country to escape persecution for nonconformity, and was, soon after his arrival, chosen to be the first president of Harvard college, that institution having previously been under the charge of Nathaniel Eaton, who bore the title of "professor," or "master." Eaton had been appointed to the office about 1637, but was removed on account of the severity of his discipline. "President Dunster," says Quincy in his "History of Harvard University," may have been his real name, and he himself a patron and president, for, poor as he was, he contributed, at a time of the utmost need, 100 acres of land toward the support of the college, "besides rendering it for a succession of years a series of official services well directed, unwearyed and altogether inestimable." He procured for the charter of 1642, and undoubtedly secured that of 1650, through his own petition. By his personal efforts and sacrifices he built the president's house, and used his influence with the general court for the relief of the college in its dire necessity. After laboring for fourteen years, he was induced to resign in October, 1654, the college authorities having taken exception to his public proclamation, in the Cambridge church, of which he was also pastor, of certain doings that had arisen in his mind as to the ritual of infant baptism. He was indicted for the same offence by the grand jury, sentenced to a public admonition, and laid under bonds for good behavior. He was subsequently presented by the same body for neglecting the baptism of one of his children. After his resignation he removed to Scituate, where he was employed in the ministry till his death. By his last will he ordered that his body should be buried in Cambridge, and magnanimously bequeathed lega-ces to the very persons who had been instrumental in his removal from the presidency. He was greatly esteemed for his extensive learning, his sincere piety, and his modest and unobtrusive deportment. His knowledge of the oriental languages, especially Hebrew, was remarkable, the new version of the Psalms by Elliot, Weide, and Mather having been submitted to him for revision. The "New England Psalm-Book" (1640) was thus greatly enriched by his scholarship. Under his influence Harvard took a high stand, and through his intellgent administration of its interests, as well as his thorough educational methods, received an impulse which is doubtless felt in the present day. President Dunster's life has been written by Rev. Jeremiah Chaplin, D. D. (Boston, 1872).

DUNTON, John, author, b. in Graffham, Hunt-ingdonshire, England, 14 May, 1659; d. in New England in 1736. He was apprenticed to a bookseller in London, and emigrated to New England in March, 1686, with a cargo of books. This venture was unsuccessful, and he only remained eight months in the colony. But he returned subsequently, established himself in the bookselling business, and, after twenty years devoted to this pursuit, turned his attention to the authorship. In 1701 he was employed in the office of the "Post Angel" newspaper. Later he began the publication of the "Athenian Mercury," republished under the name of the "Athenian Oracle" (4 vols.). In 1766 appeared the "Life and Errors of John Dunton," by himself, in which he is to be found.
Their lives and characters of more than 1,000 contemporary characters of literary eminence, and a description of many of the ministers, booksellers, and other citizens of Boston and Salem. His "Letters from New England" were published by the Prince society (1807).

DUPARQUET, James Diel, colonist, b. in France about 1600; d. in Martinique, 8 Jan., 1658. He was a nephew of Enambuc, founder of the French colonies in the Antilles. The latter, feeling his end approaching and wishing his wealth and fame for the colony in Martinique, which he regarded as his own work, sent Duparquet there in 1637. The affability of the new governor gained the affection of all the inhabitants, and his prudence brought about a good understanding between the Caribs and the French. Yr. of the French government, ruining under his government, serious troubles arose in the part of St. Christopher that belonged to the French. The governor-general of the Antilles, recently sent out by the king, found that Poincy, who occupied this post, refused to surrender his authority to him. Duparquet went to Guadeloupe in 1646 to take out a commission from the new governor-general, who authorized him to show the orders of the king to Poincy. He endeavored to enforce his claim by arms, but was defeated and obliged to take refuge among the Tonicas, who surrendered him to Poincy, and he was kept a prisoner until the following year. He then set about founding a colony in Grenada, where the West India company had made several vain attempts at a settlement. The fame of his just dealing with the natives of Grenada had reached those of Grenada, who begged him to come among them. He arrived in Grenada in June, 1850, and Kaikrkan, a Carib chief, said that if he wanted to make himself master of their island he must consent to trade with them. Duparquet received the proposal joyfully, and agreed to give the inhabitants a certain quantity of glass beads, crystals, knives, and other wares in exchange for the island. When the bargain was concluded, he made the necessary arrangements for establishing the colony, and returned to Martinique. But the savages forgot their agreement, and attacked the French, who quickly reduced them to submission. Some time afterward the English of St. Lucia, whom Duparquet had vainly warned of the plots that the natives of that island were forming against them, were massacred, and so turned against the French, that a colony there, which rapidly became prosperous. Then he went to France and purchased the proprietorship of the three islands, the king appointing him his lieutenant-general. In 1854 he received hospitably and settled in Martinique a number of Dutch families who had been banished from Brazil. In 1856 he averted a famine in Guadeloupe, which had been devastated by a hurricane, by a seasonal supply of provisions. The expenses of his colony in Grenada absorbed a large part of his income and he was forced to a proposal for its purchase from Father Dutertre, who acted as agent in the matter for a M. de Cerrilac. The rest of his life was devoted to the people of Martinique, who repaid his zeal for their welfare with ingratitude during his life, but appreciated the qualities of the great

DU PERREY, Louis Isidore, French naval officer, b. in Paris, 21 Oct., 1780; d. there, 10 Sept., 1865. He entered the French navy in 1802, was promoted 2d lieutenant, and sailed in 1817 for a voyage round the world in the corvette " Uranie," which vessel was wrecked on the Malouine islands, and Duperré, picked up by an American vessel, returned to France, and was promoted to 1st lieutenant. In 1822 he received his commission as captain, and, in command of the corvette " La Coquille," sailed on a scientific expedition to the South American coasts and the Pacific ocean, from which he returned on 24 March, 1825. During that time he visited repeatedly the coasts of Chili and Peru, whence he sent to the navy department interesting reports upon the geology and institutions of those countries, and brought home more than a thousand zoological and botanical specimens. The observations of the pendulum taken during this voyage at many different points proved the flattening of the earth at the poles, and Duperré also determined the position of the magnetic poles and the Fig. 12. maps of the designations of the coast South American which are valued, especially one showing the bifurcation of the current at the mouth of the Plate. Duperré in 1836 was appointed officer of the Legion of Honor, and in 1843 a member of the French academy. He published "Voyage autour du Monde, etc., pendant les années 1823-3-4-5" (Paris, 1826-30).
ure, du commerce, et des finances” (1763-6), and from May, 1768, the “Éphémérides du citoyen,” the organ of the economists. To a minister of the questionable expediency of the Abbé Terray a man like Du Pont could not fail to be obnoxious, and in 1772 the publication of the “Éphémérides” was forbidden. Though persecuted at home, its editor received various tides and decorations from foreign princes, and in 1774 went to Poland, at the instance of King Stanislas-Augustus, to organize a general system of national education. Later in the year, when Turgot sowed his emer-ray as comptroller-general of the finances, Du Pont was named inspector-general of the new institution and ordered to return forthwith to France. At the head of the bureau in the ministry of finance, to which all affairs of importance were referred, he took a prominent part in all the measures of reform that Turgot instituted. The famous “Report on the Municipalities,” which was really the draft of a liberal constitution, was the work of Du Pont, though Turgot did not remain long enough in office to submit it to the king. Upon Turgot’s disgrace in 1776, Madame, his successor, placed Du Pont upon the retired list and banished him to the country, where he busied himself with agricultural and literary pursuits until recalled to active duty in 1778 by Vergennes, who employed him in the task of negotiating with the English envoy, Dr. Hutton, the treaty of 1782 by which Great Britain formally recognized the independence of the United States, and later in the still more delicate undertaking of arranging the terms of the commercial treaty that France and England signed in 1786. In recognition of these services he was appointed secretary-general of the assembly of notables in 1787, and drew up the various mesures of reform that Calonne presented, the personal interference of Louis XVI. alone saving Du Pont from a second banishment after the fall of that minister. From 1772 till 1789 Du Pont’s principal works were a translation into French verse of a portion of Aristotel’s “Orlando Furioso” (1781); a memoir of Turgot (1782); and his “Lettre à la chambre du commerce de Normandie” (1786), in which he refuted the attacks on the Treaty of 1786. He was a member of the states-general from Nemours at the beginning of the Revolution, and later of the constituent assembly, of which he was twice elected president, and was one of the leaders of the moderate party that advocated a constitutional monarchy. His participation in the issue of an irredeemable paper currency nearly cost him his life at the hands of the mob, 10 Sept., 1790. After the dissolution of the assembly he edited the “Correspondance patriotique,” and published various pamphlets in the interest of law and order, among others his “Memorial” denouncing Péron, mayor of Paris. Du Pont was marked for destruction after 10 Aug., 1792, when he and his son were at the Tuileries among the armed defenders of the king, but escaped to the country being hidden in the observatory for several weeks by the astronomer Balande, and while in concealment wrote his “Philo-osophie de l’univers.” He was finally arrested and imprisoned, and only the death of Robespierre, 28 July, 1794, saved him from the guillotine. As soon as he was he was under constant pressure of the Jacobins, appearing in print with his “Plaidoyer de Lycias,” which compared the enormities of the “terror” with an episode in Athenian history, and with his “Constitution pour la républque Française” (1785), and other productions. He was also founded and edited the “Historian,” a political journal. He was elected to the council of ancients in 1795, and became its president in 1797; but, when the Jacobins broke up the councils with Augereau’s troops, Du Pont was again imprisoned, his house and property being pillaged and destroyed. In 1798 he emigrated with his family to this country, where he was received with much consideration, and at Jefferson’s request prepared a work on national education in the United States (2d ed., 1813). The author’s plan, though not carried out in the country for which it was intended, has been posthumously completed, the work turning to France in 1802, Du Pont de Nemours was instrumental in promoting the treaty of 1803, by which Louisiana was sold to the United States. He was strongly opposed to Napoleon, refusing to hold office under his government, but became president of the Paris chamber of commerce and of several charitable institutions. Besides numerous scientific and literary papers for the French institution, of which he was a member, he published “Sur le droit de marque des cuirs” (1804); “Sur la banque de France” (1806), and “Les droits et bénéfices de la propriété; ou, Recueil des différends sujets” (1807). In 1814 he became secretary of the provisional government that prepared the return of Louis XVIII., but when Napoleon escaped from Elba in 1815 Du Pont de Nemours rejoined his son in America. His last work was “Examen des altérations qui se sont opérées en l’histoire” (Paris, 1817).—His son, Victor Marie, b. in Paris, France, 1 Oct., 1767; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 30 Jan., 1827, entered the diplomatic service in 1787 as attaché of the French legation to the United States, where he remained for several years. In 1795, when the United States was in a state of war, he was appointed secretary-general of the assembly, and the same year was appointed French consul at Charleston, S. C. He was promoted to consul-general of France at New York in 1798; but the president refused him an appointment on account of the grave difficulties that had arisen with the French republic. Returning to Europe, he left the government service and emigated to the United States, arriving in Newport, R. I., 1 Jan., 1800, with his father and brother. In connection with the former he founded the business house of Du Pont de Nemours, fils et cie., of New York, which was very successful until ruined by heavy advances made to refit and provision the French squadron from Santo Domingo, payment of the drafts on the French treasury being refused by order of Napoleon, who saw a favorable opportunity of stigmatizing opposition. His brother Du Pont went to Angelica, N. Y., and three years later joined his brother near Wilmington, Del., where he established a cloth manufactury, in which, later, he was assisted by his eldest son, Charles Irénée Du Pont. Victor Du Pont was a member of the House of Representatives of the bank of the United States, and lived in Delaware till his death.—Another son, Elenthré Irénée, b. in Paris, France, 24 June, 1771; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 31 Oct., 1834. His tastes turned early toward scientific pursuits, and his father's friend, Lavoisier, the eminent chemist, whom Tur- got had made superintendent of the government powder works, took him under his wing and secured his reversion to that important post. This led to his going to the royal mills at Essonne to acquire a practical knowledge of the manufacture of gunpowder, where he remained until the French Revolution seemingly changed his whole career. He was appointed, in 1791, to take charge of the printing and publishing house that his father had established, and found himself conducting a great business almost alone. He was three times imprisoned, and was in the utmost peril after 10 Aug., 1792, when he and his father were at the Tuileries among the armed supporters of Louis XVI. When the Jacobins, beaten at the polls, called in Augereau's soldiers to overthrow the government, 5 Sept., 1793, his father was imprisoned, and the printing-house was sacked and destroyed. The family sailed for the United States in 1796. Some months after his arrival an accidental circumstance called Irénee du Pont's attention to the bad quality of the gunpowder made in this country, and gave him the first idea of erecting works for its manufacture. He went back to France in 1801, and to Essonne to procure plans and models, returning to the United States in August with some of the machinery. Thomas Jefferson was very anxious that the works should be built in Virginia; but there, as in Maryland, Irénee Du Pont was deterred by the institution of slavery and its effects upon the white race. In June, 1802, he bought a tract of land, with water-power, on the Brandywine river, near Wilmington, Del., arrived there with his family on 19 July, and set to work at once. After many disappointments and losses, his energy and courage surmounted every obstacle. His works, the largest of their kind in the country at the time of his sudden death from cholera, have been greatly increased under the management of his sons, Alfred Victor (1798-1858), Henry, and Alexis Iré- né (1814-1887), and of his grandson, Eléuthérate Iré (1829-1877). Lambert, 1831-1858, Francis Gurney, Henry Alderson, and William. Since 1850 the business has been under the direction of Henry Du Pont, second son of its founder, b. near Wilmington, Del., 8 Aug., 1812, a graduate of the U. S. military academy.—Samuel Franges, naval officer, son of Victor Marie du Pont de Nemours, b. at Bergen Point, N. J., 27 Sept., 1803; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 23 June, 1863. He was appointed a midshipman in the navy from the state of Delaware in December, 1815, his first sea service being on the "Franklin," in the European squadron. In 1821 he served for a year on the "Constitution," after which he was attached to the "Congress" in the West Indies and on the coast of Brazil. He was in the Mediterranean in 1824 on the "North Carolina," of which vessel he became sailing-master, and on the "Lamuse," commanded the "Porpoise," to which he was ordered soon after his promotion as lieutenant, 28 April, 1826. He was attached to the "Ontario" in 1829, made another three years' cruise in European waters, and from 1833 till 1838 was executive officer of the "War- ren," and of the Constellation, and commanding the "Grampus" and the "Warren" in the Gulf of Mexico. In the latter year he joined the "Ohio," the flagship of Com. Hull, in the Mediterranean squadron, his cruise ending in 1841. He was promoted commander in 1842, and sailed for China on the "Perry," but a severe illness forced him to give up his command and return home. In 1845 he was ordered to the Pacific as commander of the "Congress," the flagship of Com. Stockton. When they reached California the Mexican war had begun, and Du Pont was at once assigned to the command of the "Cyane," 23 July, 1846. With this ves- sel he captured San Diego, took possession of La Paz, the capital of Lower California, spiked the guns of San Blas, and entered the harbor of Guay- mas, burning two gun-boats and cutting out a Mexican brig under a heavy fire. These operations cleared the Gulf of California of hostile ships, thirty of which were taken or destroyed. He took part in the capture of Mazatlan under Com. Shubrick, 11 Nov., 1847, leading the line of boats that entered the main harbor. On 15 Feb., 1848, he landed at San José with a naval force, and engaged a large body of Mexicans, marching three miles inland and successfully relieving Lieut. Heywood's detachment, which was closely besieged in the Mission-house and about to surrender. Later he led, or sent out, various expeditions into the interior, which co-operated with Col. Burton and Lieut. (afterward General) Henry W. Halleck, who were moving southward, clearing the country of hostile troops and taking many prisoners. He was or- dered home in 1848, became captain in 1853, and two years later went on special service to China in command of the "Minnesota," witnessing while there the naval operations of the French and Eng- lish forces, notably their capture of the Chinese forts on the Peihó. After visiting Japan, India, and Arabia, he returned to Boston in May, 1859. Placed in command of the Philadelphia navy-yard, 31 Dec., 1860, he took the most prompt and ener- getic measures, on his own responsibility, when communications were cut off with Washington, sending a naval force to the Chesapeake to protect the landing of troops at Annapolis. In June, 1861, he was made president of a board convened by Washington to elaborate a general plan of naval operations against the insurgent states. He was appointed flag-officer in September, and led the expedition that sailed from Norfolk in the following month, no American officer having ever com- manded so large a fleet. On 7 Nov. he success- fully attacked the fortifications defending Port Royal harbor, which were ably planned and skil- fully executed. This engagement is justly regarded as one of the most brilliant achievements of naval tacties. His unarmed vessels, divided into main and flanking divisions, steamed into the harbor in two parallel columns. The flanking division, after engaging the smaller fort and driving back the enemy's ships, took position to enfilade the principal work, before which the main column, led by the flagship "Wabash," passed and repassed in an elliptic course, its tremendous fire inflicting heavy damage. Du Pont actively followed up his victory. Tybee was seized, giving a base for the reduction of Fort Pulaski by the army; a combined naval and land attack on Fort Argus at Pensacola was successful; the sounds and inland waters of Georgia south of the Savannah, and of the eastern coast of Florida, were occupied; St. Mary’s, Fernandina, Jacksonville, and other places were captured; Fort Clinch and the fort at St. Augustine were taken, and all the salt furnaces at Ponte Vedra were established, all thoroughly effective save that on Charleston, where the vessels at command were insufficient to cover the circuit of twenty-three miles from Bull’s Bay to Stone Point. In recognition of his services, Du Pont received the thanks of Congress, and was appointed rear-admiral, to rank from 16 July, 1862. Toward the close of the year several armored vessels were added to his command, mostly of the monitor type, one of which destroyed the Confederate steamer “Nashville,” under the guns of Fort McAllister. Being the first officer to whom the monitors had been assigned, he carefully tested their offensive powers by several attacks upon this work, on which they were unable to make any impression upon the small number of their guns and the slowness of their fire. Assuming immediate command of the three armed vessels mounting thirty-two guns, Du Pont made a resolute attempt, on 7 April, 1863, to take Charleston. Unable to manœuvre in the tortuous channels, filled with obstructions, that led to the harbor, the ironclads were exposed to a terrible cross-fire from a hundred guns on the southern coasts, and, darkness approaching, the ships were wisely withdrawn, one sinking soon afterward and five others being disabled. This action was fought pursuant to express instructions from the navy department, its probable result not having been unforeseen by the admiral, who gave it in his opinion that the co-operation of troops was necessary to secure success. Time has fully confirmed the entire correctness of Du Pont’s judgment; his able successor, with a larger force of armored ships, was no more fortunate, and Charleston only fell on the approach of Sherman’s army, but died under “Atlanta” coming out of Savannah. Du Pont sent two monitors to intercept her, one of which, under Capt. John Rodgers, succeeded in capturing her after a brief engagement. This was the last important action in Admiral Du Pont’s command, from which he was relieved on 5 July, 1863. During the intervals of more than twenty-five years of service at sea he was almost constantly employed on duties of importance. He was a member of the board that prepared the plan of organization for the naval academy, and was one of the officers that in after years revived and extended the system then adopted. He served on the light-house board, took part in two revisions of the rules and regulations for the navy, and was a member of the naval retiring board of 1853. Admiral Du Pont was the author of various papers on professional subjects, including one on corporal punishment in the navy, and one on the use of floating batteries for coast defense, which has been reprinted, and is largely cited by Sir Howard Douglas in his work on naval gunnery. — Henry Algermon, son of the admiral, born at New York, 30 July, 1820, was graduated at the U. S. military academy, 6 May, 1841, at the head of his class, and promoted to 2d lieutenant of the engineer corps. On 14 May he was commissioned 1st-lieutenant, 5th artillery, and became captain 24 March, 1864. He was acting assistant adjutant-general of the troops in New York harbor in 1862-3, and commanded a battery in West Virginia from 1863 until 24 May, 1864, participating in the battle of Newmarket. As chief of artillery of that department from the latter date to the close of the war, he was engaged at Piedmont, Lexington, and Lynchburg during the spring and summer of 1864. Later in the year he took part in the battles of Cedar Creek, Chancellorsville, Opequon, and Fisher’s Hill, in command of the artillery of his corps, being brevetted major and promoted to colonel, 19 Oct., 1864, for services at Cedar Creek. After the war he was a member of the board to assimilate the tactics for the three arms of the service. Col. Du Pont resigned in March, 1875. Since 5 May, 1879, he has been in charge of the Wilmington and Northern railroad company.

DUPORTAIL, Louis Lebègue, Chevalier, soldier, b. in France; d. at sea in 1802. He was educated at the military school of Mézières, and considered an excellent engineer. He was one of four French officers engaged by Dr. Franklin to pass Deane to serve in the American army (see articles Ducoudray and Deane), they being the only ones engaged by the express authority of congress. He was appointed colonel of engineers on his arrival, and promoted to be major of engineers on 17 Nov., 1777, and major-general, 16 Nov., 1781. He had charge of the engineering operations at the siege of Yorktown, and was one of the general officers particularly mentioned by Washington in his despatches after the capitulation. He returned to France, and in 1780 was made a rear-admiral. In 1782, having recourse to his intimate relations with Lafayette, whose political views he approved, he was, on 10 Nov., 1790, appointed minister of war; but, sharing in the misfortunes of his friend and patron, he was deposed in the assembly for maladministration of his office, and resigned 3 Dec., 1791. He was then given a military appointment in Lorraine; but, being warned in 1792 that a serious accusation was about to be brought against him, he left the army, and, after living two years in concealment, retired to America. He was recalled by the events of the 18th Brumaire, but did not return to France. During his service in the American army the Chevalier Dupontail was much impressed by the timidity and bad generalship of the British officers. In 1777 he wrote: “The success of the Americans is to be ascribed to the intrepidity of the army, but to the astonishment conduct of the British forces, to the slowness and timidity of the British general.” Referring to the battle of Brandywine, he writes: “If the English had followed up their advantage that day Washington’s army would have been spoken of no more; since that time, also, Gen. Howe has, in all his operations, exhibited such slowness and timidity as to strike me with astonishment. With 30,000 men, an active, enterprising general must reduce this country.”

DUPRATZ, Le Page, author, b. in Holland about 1603; died 1677. A naval subject during the French army he saw service in Germany, and, having obtained an interest in the French western land company, sailed from La Rochelle in May, 1718, to take possession of the territory ceded to the association near New Orleans. After several unsuccessful attempts at crossing the Gulf, 30 July, 1718, he arrived in 1720 and settled among the Natchez Indians, by whom he was at first well received, but with whom he subsequently became involved in difficulties. These being arranged, he pushed into the interior, visited the region watered by the Missouri and Arkansas, and, after eight years labor as a pioneer, returned to New Orleans to become treasurer. of the company, on the abolition of which office he sailed for France, where he landed, 25 June, 1734. His "History of Louisiana, or of the Western Parts of Virginia and Carolina" (Paris, 1758; London, 1769), is one of the best of its kind. The author having paid especial attention to geology, mineralogy, and other natural sciences.

DUPIUS, Mathias, clergyman, b. in Picardy, France, early in the 17th century; d. in Orleans. He entered the Dominican order in 1641, and was sent as a consulter to exact recompenses of the French possessions in America in 1644. He returned in 1650 and wrote "Relation de l'établissement d'une colonie française dans l'île de la Guadeloupe, et des moeurs sauvages" (Caen, 1652).

DUPIUS, Thomas R., Canadian educator, b. in Ermostown, Ontario, 26 March, 1838. He was graduated at Queen's college, Kingston, as a physician in 1860. In 1864 he passed a summer in the Armory Square hospital, Washington, D. C., as assistant surgeon. He attended Harvard medical school in 1870, and studied diseases of the eye under Drs. Williams and Derby at the Boston eye infirmary. In 1871 he received the diploma of the Royal college of physicians and surgeons at King's, Ontario, and in 1881 that of the Royal college of surgeons in London, England. In 1898 Dr. Dupuis was the first president of the English Church in Kingston, and a member of the Royal medical college of Kingston, which chair he vacated in 1873 to take that of anatomy, which he still holds (1897). He is also a lecturer on clinical surgery, to which chair he was appointed in 1886.

He was elected to the council of Queen's university in 1875, and president of the faculty of medicine in 1888. He was appointed to the chair of pathology in the University of Toronto in 1892, and is a fellow of the Royal medical college of Canada. He has written interesting descriptions of his travels. His brother, Nathan Fallowes, b. in Portland, Ontario, in 1838, received his rudimentary education at a common school, and from his twelfth until his eighteenth year worked at the business of clock and watch making. He then entered Queen's college, Kingston, where he was graduated with honors. In 1867 he was appointed professor of chemistry in Queen's college, and in 1880 was transferred to the chair of mineralogy.

DUPEU, Eliza Ann, author, b. in Petersburg, Va., about 1814; d. in New Orleans in January, 1881. She was descended from Col. Dupuy, who led the band of Huguenot exiles to the banks of James river. At an early age she became a member of the Catholic church in Natchez, and while so employed wrote her first book, "The Conspirators," in which Aaron Burr is the principal character. Her other works include "The Huguenot Exiles;" "Emma Watton, or Trials and Triumphs;" "Celeste;" "Florence, or the Fatal Vow;" "Separation;" "Concealed Treasure;" "Ashleigh;" and "The Country Neighborhood." She wrote in all about forty stories, most of them for the New York "Ledger."

DUQUESNE, Joseph Marie Lazare, Viscount, French naval officer, b. in Havana, Cuba, in 1804; d. in Paris in 1854. He was one of the most celebrated naval officers of the United States, being commander of the famous Naval Duquesne, studied at the naval college of Angoulême, France, was promoted 2d lieutenant in 1821, 1st lieutenant in 1831, and in 1837 commander of the brig "Le Laurier," in the fleet operating against Mexico. He distinguished himself during the Mexican War, and in 1848 he was one of the most celebrated of all the battles and victories of the war. He was appointed commander of the U.S. frigate "Ulysses" in 1844, and contributed greatly toward the capture of Vera Cruz. He was promoted commodore in 1850, and in 1855 reappointed captain of the "Ulysses." He was awarded the medal of honor for bravery at the capture of Vera Cruz. He was appointed commodore in 1859, and in 1861 he commanded the French fleet in the West Indies and the Gulf of Mexico. During a visit to the city of Mexico he died of yellow fever.

DUQUESNE DE MENNEVILLE, Marquis, governor of New France, b. in France early in the 17th century. He was the half-brother of the great French mariner, and became the captain of the royal marine service, and became a captain. In 1702 he was appointed captain of New France, having been recommended to the office by Galissonière. He introduced great reforms into the colony, placed it on a par with the European by constant drilling and study, erected forts in the far west, and resisted the encroachments of the English and colonial troops. Among the forts so erected was the one bearing his name on the present site of Pittsburgh. It was during his administration that the assassination of Jumonville took place, and also the brilliant victory over the English at Coulon de Villiers in 1754. Duquesne solicited his recall, and departed for France in 1755.

DUQUET, Joseph, Canadian notary, b. in Châteauquay, Canada, in 1717; d. in Montreal in 1888. He began his studies in the college of Montreal, and finished them in the college of Chambly. He adopted the profession of notary, and became the partner of his uncle, M. Demersay, in the town of Saint-Jean. He was secretary of the Indian legislature, was arrested in 1837, along with several others. Duquet attempted a rescue, which failed, and then set out for Montreal, to put his friends on their guard, and to organize a force that would secure the release of the prisoners. When he arrived at Louisburg, he learned that his friends had been rescued and that he himself was in great danger from the pursuit of the government troops, he fled to the United States. He returned to Canada after a short stay, taking part in the fight at Moor's Corner, in which the Canadians were defeated. He returned to the United States and remained at Swanton until Lord Durham's proclamation of amnesty, when he returned to his own country. He then learned that the Canadian exiles, who had taken refuge in the United States, were preparing to return to Canada under the command of Robert Nelson, he prepared to assist them. He was one of the most active organizers of the Chasseurs, a secret society, and went from parish to parish, preparing the people for the great rising of the 8th of November. On that date, in conjunction with Cardinal, he arranged all the principal toritos of Laprairie, and set out at the head of a small force to take possession of Caughnawaga and deprive the Indians their arms. He was betrayed by those who were to aid him, arrested, and conducted to the prison of Montreal, where he was hanged.

DURAN, Martin (doo-ran), Mexican priest, b. near Santiago, Tlatelolco, Mexico; d. there in 1584. He was of pure Indian blood, was educated in the Franciscan college established in his native town, and entered the religious order of the Dominicans in his early youth. He was one of the most celebrated pulpits of the time. In 1584 he had permission to preach in the Mexican language in the church of Santiago Tlatelolco; and in his first sermon dared to denounce slavery and to support the doctrines of Barte de las Casas. Duran was arrested and was brought before the bishop, and was accused by the Indians these sermons against the established order of things. Father Francisco de los Rios was then commissioned by the archbishop to hear the succeeding sermons of Duran, and, after listening to one, accused the preacher, before the inquisition, of propagating among the Indians heretical and immoral ideas, and hatred to the Spaniards. Durand was seized by the Inquisition, and his property, which consisted only of beads, was also seized. Among them were found two magnificent works, which had been overlooked by the inquisitors, and the authorities, hearing of the existence of similar works among the Indians, caused Durand to be subjected to the most cruel tortures in order that he should reveal where he had obtained them; but their cruelty was met by the Indian friar with great courage, and he revealed nothing. The torment lasted for several days, and at last Durand was burned alive, on suspicion of being a heretic.

DURAND, Cyrus, engraver, b. in Jefferson village, N. J., 27 Feb., 1787; d. in Irvington, N. J., 18 Sept., 1880. He was descended from Huguenots who came to this country after the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and his father was a watch-maker. Cyrus received a common-school education in his native village, and was for a time occupied in the construction of machinery. In this he was eminently successful, and when, in consequence of the non-intercourse acts passed by England, factories sprang up everywhere, his services were in great demand. In 1814 he settled in Newark, N. J., where he worked as a silversmith, and in the autumn of that year volunteered as a drummer, and served for three months at Sandy Hook. A year later he was employed in the Taurino factory in Rahway, N. J., making machines for spinning and carding hair for the manufacture of carpets. His attention was then directed to bank-note engraving, and he made for Peter Maverick, of New York, a machine for ruling straight and wave-lines for bank-notes. During the next year he made two other machines, one for drawing water-lines, and the other for making plain ovals. These machines, of his own invention, were the beginning of that series of geometrical lathes by which machine-work on bank-notes has been carried to a degree of excellence that rivals the rich effects of the burin and pencil. After this Durand devoted himself to bank-note engraving, and his inventions include many appliances, the principal of which, besides the geometrical lathe, are machines for engine-turning and transfer presses. He was a skilled workman of unusual ability, and was considered capable of working in twenty-two occupations. - His brother, Asher Brown, artist, b. in Jefferson, N. J., 21 Aug., 1796; d. in New York, Sept., 1896, acquired in his father's workshop some knowledge of the elementary processes of engraving. At first he confined his attention to cutting initials on seals and similar objects. His earliest attempts at engraving prints were made on plates rolled out of copper coins and with gravers of his own make. The success of these efforts led to a commission to copy a portrait on the lid of a snuff-box. In 1812 he was apprenticed to Peter Maverick, an engraver in New York city, and five years later he was admitted into partnership with his master. His first original work was a "Beggar," after a paint-by Samuel Waldo, and when John Trumbull painted the "Declaration of Independence," Charles Heath was also seized, but his engraving of it, but, business complications having arisen, the picture was given to Durand. He worked steadily at it for three years, and the best-known engraving in the United States was the result. His reputation was at once established and his work grew in demand; and when he died, in 1828, and "General Jackson," in 1828, are prominent plates of this period. Mr. Durand contributed extensively to the "annuals," which were then fashionable, and some of his best works appear in these, including "The Wife," by S. F. Morse, "A Vestry Party," by Charles H. Leslie, and the "White Plume," by Charles C. Ingham. Many of the heads engraved for the "National Portrait Gallery" were executed by him, and "Ariadne," after John Vanderlyn's painting, was his work. Mr. Durand, who was an admirable draughtsman and possessed an instinctive sense of color, became dissatisfied with the limits of engraving, and aspired to a wider field of art. He studied nature diligently, and became most proficient in landscape painting, which from 1830 became his chosen occupation. W. H. Worthington, Robert Weir, as one of the "fathers of American landscape." A few portraits are among his earlier productions in oil, such as heads of Andrew Jackson, John Quincy Adams, James Madison, and Edward Everett, while those of William Cullen Bryant, James Kent, and Gov. Horace K boss, engraved in 1836, is his "Young America," and "God's Judgment on Gog." His landscapes include "The Return of the Wagons," "In the Mountains," "The Rainbow," "Sunday Morning," "Primavera Forest," "Franconia Notch," and several views of Lake George. His largest canvas, "A Mountain Forest" (1869), now hangs in the Corcoran gallery, Washington. Of his recent works, "Studies from Nature," "The Happy Valley," and "Kauterskill Clove," were sent to the Philadelphia exhibition in 1876. He was one of the founders of the National academy of design in 1896, and after the resignation of Samuel F. B. Morse, in 1856, was its president. His son, John, art critic, b. in New York city, 6 May, 1822; edited for several years a monthly publication called "The Crayon," devoted especially to the interests of the fine arts. He has also translated several of Taine's works, including "Ideal in Art" (New York, 1869); "Italy, Rome, and Naples" (1868); "Italy, Florence, and Venice" (1869); "Philosophy of Art; Art in the Netherlands" (1870); and "Art in Greece" (1871).

DURAND, Elias, botanist, b. in Montz, France (now Germany), 25 Jan., 1794; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 15 Aug., 1838. He studied medicine in Paris, and on his graduation joined the medical corps of Napoleon's army. Dr. Durand was present at the battles of Lutzen, Bautzen, Hanau, Katzbach, and Leipzig, but after the downfall of the emperor he left France and came to the United States. He settled at first in Philadelphia, where he established a drug-store which became the resort of many of the most eminent physicians of the day. He also devoted himself to botany, and became thoroughly familiar with the flora of North America, collecting a herbarium that includes almost every species of North American plants. This, the work of nearly forty years, he presented to the museum of the Jardin des plantés in Paris in 1868. A separate gallery has been devoted to the collection in that institution, and it is called "Herbarium Durand." After the death of the donor, Dr. Durand was a contributor to scientific journals, and a member of scientific societies in the United States and Europe.

DURAND, Marie, singer, b. in Charleston, S. C., about 1850. She was educated in New York, studying music with Miss Simg and Alice Ferrall, and made her first appearance in Chicago as Zerlina in "Don Giovanni." After continuing her musical studies for some years, she appeared at the imperial opera in St. Petersburg, and then sang in French operas in Brussels. Returning to the United States in 1884, she was seen in New Orleans, and went to Italy and sang at Milan and elsewhere. She was induced to leave light soprano parts and devote herself to those great dramatic representations in which she has since achieved distinction, such as Selika in "L'Africaine." Later she became known for her brilliant performances in "Le Huguenots," "Norma," "Robert le Diable," and "Roi de Lahore." In 1886 she made her first appearance at the royal Italian opera in London, in the rôle of La Gioconda, of which she was the first exponent outside of Italy. She was also the first engaged for the entire opera season in St. Petersburg, but in April, 1884, returned to London to sing in Covent Garden.

DURANG, Charles, dancer, b. in Philadelphia in 1796; d. there, 15 Feb., 1870. He made his first appearance in the Chestnut street theatre in 1818, and subsequently performed in almost every theatre in the United States. Mr. Durang was actor, author, stage-manager, prompter, ballet-master, and finally opened a dancing academy. He was the author of a "History of the Philadelphia Stage from 1732-1836," which appeared serially in the Philadelphia "Journal."

DURÁNQUET, Hyacinth, Jesuit, b. in Clermont, Auvergne, in 1800. He studied theology in the colleges of the society in France, became a Jesuit in 1826, and in the same year embarked for the United States, landing at New York in 1827, and subsequently performed in almost every theatre in the United States. Mr. Durang was actor, author, stage-manager, prompter, ballet-master, and finally opened a dancing academy. He was the author of a "History of the Philadelphia Stage from 1732-1836," which appeared serially in the Philadelphia "Journal."

DURANT, Henry Towle, philanthropist, b. in Hanover, N. H., 20 Feb., 1822; d. in Wellesley, Mass., 8 Oct., 1881. His name was originally Henry Welles Smith. He was graduated at Harvard in 1841, and subsequently studied law with Gen. Butlee, and was admitted to the bar in 1843. He entered on the practice of his profession in Boston, and soon became prominent. After changing his name to Durant he was associated with Rufus Choate and other noted lawyers of the time, and was very successful with cases committed to his care. Meanwhile he became connected with John H. Cheever in the formation of the New York belting and packing company, and also in the purchase of iron-mines in northern New York, both of which enterprises proved exceedingly profitable. In 1868 his only son died, and during the boy's illness he determined thenceforth to consecrate his life to the cause of the Christian religion. Finding that "the law and the gospel were diametrically opposed," he disposed of his law business, although it was exceedingly profitable. He made New York city his residence for some time, and, being impressed with the necessity of providing a college where women could obtain a superior education. His plans were put into execution and Wellesley college resulted. This institution, built and equipped at an expense of $1,000,000, was opened in September, 1875, and has since been maintained at an expense of $50,000 annually by the liberality of Mr. Durant. The college buildings are attractively situated in the midst of a park of 300 acres in Wellesley, about fifteen miles west of Boston. While undenominational, the institution is distinctly and positively Christian. After 1884 he became a lay preacher and held a great number of meetings, not only in Boston and its neighborhood, but in many towns of Massachusetts and New Hampshire. Falling health led to his discontinuing public exposition, but his interest in Christian enterprises continued throughout his life. He left a large property at his death, and the work of the college is continued by his widow.

DURANT, Thomas Jefferson, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 8 Aug., 1817; d. in Washington, D. C., 4 Feb., 1882. He removed to New Orleans at the age of seventeen, and was appointed a clerk in the post-office there. After studying law he was admitted to the bar and became prominent in his profession. He was elected state senator, after which he was engaged in private practice. He was a Union man during the civil war and a recognized leader of those who supported the national government. When New Orleans was captured by Farragut in 1862 the office of governor was tendered to Mr. Durant, but he declined it on the ground that he could not be governor and at the same time be subordinate to military authority. In 1865 he left New Orleans and settled in Washington, where he soon took high rank as a lawyer. He practise before the supreme court, and at the time of his death was counsel for the United States before the Spanish and American Claims commission.

DURAO, José da Santa-Rita, Brazilian poet, b. in Infeccionado, a parish of Mariana, province of Minas-Geraes, Brazil; d. in Lisbon, Portugal, in 1788. He studied in the University of Coimbra, Portugal, where he was made doctor of laws, and obtained great distinction as a scholar. He afterward entered the order of the Friars of St. Augustin, and at once became a preceptor as a teacher. His great opinion in favor of the Jesuits excited the enmity of the Marquis of Pombal, the minister of Joseph I., of Portugal, who had been his protector. When the Jesuits were expelled, Durozo took himself in danger, and fled to Andalusia in 1762. Hostilities, however, had begun the same year between Portugal and Spain, and he was imprisoned as a Portuguese spy till the signing of the treaty of Paris, 10 Feb., 1783, when he left Spain for Italy. He took up his residence in Rome, where he enjoyed the acquaintance of Alferi, Cesariotti, and the noted literary men of the period. Here he began to write the poem on which his fame principally rests, "Caramuru, or the Discovery of Bahia," which was completed and published in 1781. In 1771 he returned to Lisbon, and from that time till his death was professor of theology in the University of Catholic population to his poem of "Caramuru" he wrote many other works in prose and poetry, but the only one of them read to-day in Portugal and Brazil is the "Caramuru," and its popularity is constantly increasing. The hero is the Portuguese navigator Diego Alvarens, who was shipwrecked on the coast of Brazil in 1508 or 1509, and who was called by the natives "Caramuru," or "man of fire," from the guns of his followers. In his pictures of Indian manners and customs, and in his descriptions of the splendid scenery of Brazil, Durozo has become celebrated as a preacher. Furthermore, the novelist, Durozo was little known beyond Brazil and Portugal before 1823, when a French translation of the "Caramuru" was published by De Monglaive.

DUREBIN, Eliza J., missionary, b. in Madison county, Ky., in 1810. At the age of sixteen he entered the Roman Catholic seminary of St. Thomas, Ky., and was ordained priest in 1822, afterward becoming professor in St. Joseph's college, Bardstown, and assistant at the cathedral there. In 1824 he was intrusted with the pastoral care of the entire Roman Catholic population of western Indiana and southwestern Kentucky, with headquarters in Morganfield, Union co. After 1828 he was also obliged to visit Nashville several times a year. During forty years of his missionary labors his horseback journeys averaged 200 miles a week. Father Durbun, himself estimates that during sixty-two years he has travelled over 500,000 miles. Within two years after his nomination to the mission of southwestern Kentucky he built the Church of the Sacred Heart, then the only Roman Catholic church west of the Ohio river and county of the Mississinie, and the Church of St. Ambrose in Union county. He erected the Church of St. Jerome in Graves county in 1836, that of the Sacred Heart, Morganfield, in 1853, and St. Agnes' church, Uniontown, in 1850, of which he was appointed pastor. In 1853 Ky. was relieved of its temporal duties in Union county, but insisted on being allotted active work, and was given charge of the Roman Catholics living along the Elizabethtown and Paducah railroad. Here he remained till 1881, when he was persuaded to spend the remainder of his life in St. Joseph's monastery, Bardstown. In 1883 he petitioned his bishop to be restored to active duty, and was assigned to pastoral work.

DURBIN, John Price, clergyman, b. in Bourbon county, Ky., in 1800; d. in New York city, 17 Oct., 1866. At the age of fourteen he was apprenticed to a cabinet-maker, and in 1819 entered the itinerant ministry of the Methodist Episcopal church. He studied at Miami university while preaching at Hamilton, Ohio, was graduated at Cincinnati college in 1825, and soon afterward was appointed professor of languages in Augusta college, Kentucky. He was elected chaplain of the U. S. senate in 1831, and in 1832 was chosen professor of natural science in the Wesleyan university, and became editor of the "Christian Advocate and Journal," New York, in 1834. In 1834 he was elected president of Dickinson college, Carlisle, Pa., and during his incumbency made an extensive tour in Europe and the east. As member of the general conference of 1844 he was a prominent actor in the great contest on slavery which divided the church. After retiring from his office in 1845 he was pastor of churches in Philadelphia, and was also presiding elder of the Philadelphia district. He was secretary of the missionary society from 1830 to 1872, when he retired in consequence of physical infirmity. To his labors was largely due the establishment of missions in India, Bulgaria, Egypt, western and northern Africa, and many isles of the United States, and the reinvigoration of those in China and elsewhere, while through his plans the annual contributions were increased from $100,000 to $900,000. In 1867 he visited Europe in the interest of missions. He distinguished for his piety and active native missionary work. Besides numerous contributions to periodical literature, Dr. Durbin published "Observations in Europe, principally in France and Great Britain" (2 vols., New York, 1844), and "Observations in Egypt, Palestine, and Asia Minor" (2 vols., 1845), and edited, with the notes of H. Wood's "Mosaic History of the Creation" (1831).
source of many family feuds. In 1854–6 he was a member of the common council of New Orleans, and as chairman of its finance committee was the author of several important measures. By sinking an artesian well in Canal street Mr. Durell, in 1856, remedied a remark that New Orleans rests on the bed of the sea. He strenuously opposed the admission of the western district of Louisiana, left the Democratic party on that issue, and for some time afterward lived in retirement. After the capture of New Orleans by Farragut, Mr. Durell was called upon to construct a new municipal government, and drafted the so-called bureau system, which remained in force from July, 1862, till some years after the war. He was president of the city's bureau of finances in 1865–6, and mayor of the freedmen's bureau in 1868, administering the office with great credit. In 1863 he was appointed by President Lincoln U. S. judge for the eastern district of Louisiana, and presided over the entire state after the abolition of the western district in 1866. Judge Durell was president of the State constitutional convention of 1864, and in 1865 declined the office of justice of the U. S. supreme court, tendered him by Mr. Lincoln. In 1867, by a personal visit to Washington, he brought about a discontinuance of legal procedure in Louisiana under the confiscation laws, and in the same year declined the Austrian mission. In 1868 he was mentioned as a candidate for vice-president. He resigned from the bench in 1874, and from 1875 till his death resided chiefly in Schoharie, N. Y., engaged in literary pursuits. He contributed much to periodicals, wrote a translation of Greek literature, and published "Sketches" under the pen-name of "H. Didimus" (New York, 1840). He left in manuscript a translation, made in 1840, of P. C. Roux's "Essay on the History of France, and the Immediate Causes of the Revolution of 1789," and a volume of notes to the same; and had in preparation a "History of Seventeen Years: from 1890 to the Retiring of the Federal Arms from Louisiana and South Carolina."

DURFEE, Bradford Matthew Chaloner, merchant, b. in Fall River, Mass., 15 June, 1843; d. there, 13 Sept., 1872. His father died shortly after the boy's birth, leaving him a large fortune. He entered Yale, but failing health compelled him to leave college during his sophomore year, and he visited Europe in 1865, spending two and a half years in travel. On his return he assumed the management of his affairs, but his health compelled him to be largely on the sea, and he became an ardent yachtsman. For several years he made long cruises on his yacht "Josephine," visiting various countries on the Atlantic ocean. Durfee hale, one of the finest college dormitories in the United States, was his gift to Yale, which honored him with the degree of A.M. in 1871.

DURFEE, Job, jurist, b. in Tiverton, R. I., 20 Sept., 1790; d. there, 26 July, 1847. He was graduated at Brown in 1813, and then, after studying law, admitted to practice. In 1814 he was elected a member of the state legislature, serving continusteel castings. Mr. Durfee is a member of numerous scientific bodies, to whose proceedings he has contributed papers of technical interest.

DURFEED, Zoheth Shearman, manufacturer, b. in Fall River, Mass., 22 April, 1831; d. in Providence, R. I., 8 June, 1880. He was graduated at the New Bedford high school, and finished at the fall of 1848 in the city. In the completion of his studies he learned the blacksmith's trade, after which he was associated with his father and uncle in the same business. In 1853 he was requested by a number of New Bedford capitalists to report on a new process for the making of steel direct from pig-iron, invented by Joseph Dixon. This led to a careful study of the entire subject of the manufacture of steel, and especially of the Bessemer process, then recently invented in England. He discovered that a patent substantially the same as Henry Bessemer's, but claiming priorities over it, had been issued in the United States to William Kelly. After satisfying himself of the validity of this patent, he obtained control of it, and visited England for the purpose of buying Bessemer's rights in the United States, but failed. Meanwhile he accumulated much information that diminished the practical value of the manufacture of steel, and became convinced that the invention of Robert Mushet was an essential feature in both processes. On his return to the United States he organized a company of prominent iron-makers for protecting and introducing into practical use the Kelly patent. In 1863 he again visited England, secured the control of the Mushet patent for the United States, and subsequently experimental steel-works were erected by the Kelly-process company in Wyandotte, Mich., where the ingots from the furnace were made, and from these the steel used in the United States were produced. During the following year Mr. Durfee, after a course of experiments, indicated the desirability of melting the charge in the cupola instead of in the reverberatory furnace. That feature prevails exclusively to-day and demonstrates the correctness of Mr. Durfee's views. In 1866 the conflicting interests of the rival patentees were united in the Pneumatic steel association, of which he became secretary and treasurer, holding that office till his death. Later he was called to superintend the steel-works in Troy, N. Y., but relinquished that appointment and returned to New York, henceforth devoting his entire attention to the steel association, whose business he managed until a short time before his death. He patented various improvements in machinery for the manufacture of iron and steel, and made the first movement and probably did more than any other single person toward introducing cheapened steel into the United States.

DURHAM, John George Lambton, Earl of, English statesman, b. in Lambton castle, county Durham, 12 April, 1782; d. in Lowes, Isle of Wight, 28 July, 1849. He was educated at Eton and Cambridge, served a short time in a regiment of hussars, and in 1813 was returned to parliament, where he distinguished himself by his liberal views. During the reform excitement of 1819 he advocated the bill that abolished the hereditary right of hereditary peers to attend meetings. He was one of the defenders of Queen Caroline, and in 1821 brought forward a scheme of parliamentary reform which, though at that time unsuccessful, was embodied in the reform act of ten years later. In 1828 he was raised to the peerage as Baron Durham; in 1830 he was lord privy seel in Earl Grey's minstry, and in 1843, on his retirement from the cabinet, was made an earl. In 1836-7 he became ambassador to Russia, and in 1838 was sent, with extraordinary powers, to Canada as governor-general. When he arrived there he found the disturbed state of public feeling, consequent upon the rebellion of 1837, still in existence, the constitution practically suspended, and the efficient administration of the law no longer possible. In order to remedy these evils he issued differing dispatches, founded new police, and issued writs for trials in things, an amnesty to all the rebels, save their leaders, who were declared banished to Bermuda. His administration of the duties of his office failed to give satisfaction, either in Canada or Great Britain, and he was in consequence recalled in December, 1839. Soon after his return to England an elaborate report by him on Canadian affairs was published. In it he proposed the scheme of the union of the British North American provinces for legislative purposes, and insisted upon the fullest constitutional freedom for the people. It is supposed that the disgrace of this recall preyed upon his mind and hastened his death.

DURHAM, Milton Jamison, lawyer, b. in Mercer county, Ky., 16 May, 1824. He was graduated at Asbury university in 1844, after which he studied law with Joshua F. Bell and was graduated at the University of Kentucky. After several years he followed his profession with great success, and in 1861-2 was one of the circuit judges of Kentucky. He then returned to his law practice in Danville, which he continued until 1873, when he was elected as a Democrat to congress, serving from 1 Dec., 1873, till 3 March, 1879. Mr. Durham resumed his profession, but in March, 1885, was appointed first comptroller of the national treasury, an office which he now holds.

DURIER, Anthony, R. C. bishop, b. in Rouen, France, in the 18th century. He was ever made in the United States were produced. During the following year Mr. Durfee, after a course of experiments, indicated the desirability of melting the charge in the cupola instead of in the reverberatory furnace. That feature prevails exclusively to-day and demonstrates the correctness of Mr. Durfee's views. In 1866 the conflicting interests of the rival patentees were united in the Pneumatic steel association, of which he became secretary and treasurer, holding that office till his death. Later he was called to superintend the steel-works in Troy, N. Y., but relinquished that appointment and returned to New York, henceforth devoting his entire attention to the steel association, whose business he managed until a short time before his death. He patented various improvements in machinery for the manufacture of iron and steel, and made the first movement and probably did more than any other single person toward introducing cheapened steel into the United States.

DURINGE, Francis Alexander, author, b. in Boston, Mass., in 1814; d. in 1881. He was a contributor of poems, humorous articles, short stories, and sketches to the magazines, under the pen-name of "Old Un." In connection with W. S. Chase he translated Lamartine's "History of the Revolution of 1848." At a later date he issued, with George P. Burnham, who wrote under the pseudonym of "Young Un," "Stray Subjects arrests and bound to the Fugitive Offspring of the Old Un and the Young Un that have been lying around loose, and are now tied up for Fast Keeping" (Boston, 1848). He was the author of several plays, and was for a time co-editor of "Balloon's Pictorial". In addition to the works previously mentioned he has contributed "Bale's Dictionary of History" (Hartford, 1836), and "Life Scenes from the World Around Us" (Boston, 1858).

DURKEE, Charles, senator, b. in Royaltown, Vt., 5 Dec., 1807; d. in Omaha, Neb., 14 Jan., 1870. He was educated in his native town and in the Burlington academy, after which he engaged in business, and later emigrated to the territory of Wisconsin, where he was one of the founders of Southport, now Kenosha. He was a member of the first territorial legislature of Wisconsin, held in Burlington (Iowa and Minnesota being then parts of the territory). In 1847 he was again a member of the territorial legislature, and in 1848 was elected to the first state legislature of Wisconsin. He was elected as a member of the American Anti-Slavery Society of that state, and in the schools of the city of Albany in 1843, removed to the west in 1830, resumed that business at Madison, Wisc., in 1833, and followed it till 1857.
In 1858 he became superintendent of the public schools of New York state, and died in 1862.
He was a member of the American Anti-Slavery Society of Wisconsin. He has been superintendent of public schools at Roxbury, and secretary of the Madison board of education. Among his publications are genealogical histories of the Steele and Holt families (Albany, 1862 and 1864); "Bibliographica Genealogica Americana, or Index to American Pedigrees" (3d ed., 1880); "History of Madison, Wis., and the Four-Lake Country" (Madison, 1874); with W. B. Davis, "History of Missoiri (St. Louis, 1873); and "Wisconsin Bioographical Dictionary."

DURCHESTER, Lawrence, lawyer, b. in the Mission of St. Genevieve, Mo., in 1786; d. in Monroe, Mich., 21 Sept., 1861. His father was a French-Canadian.
Laurent was educated in Montreal, and settled at Frenchtown, on the river Raisin, in 1805. At the beginning of the War of 1812 he enlisted in the Monroe county army, and rendered important services to the government after his surrender. He was clerk of Monroe county from its organization in 1818 till 1838, for six years was in the territorial council, and in 1838 a member of the convention that framed the first constitution of Michigan.
He also served in the state legislature, and was justice of the peace and probate judge at Monroe.
He was the legitimate authority among the French population on the river Raisin.

DURHAM, John, soldier, b. in Windham, Conn., in 1738; d. in Norwich, 29 May, 1782. He served in the French and Indian war, becoming a major of militia, and, from the name of the place of his birth, was known as the "bold bean-biller." In 1776, at the time of the passage of the stamp-act, the county of New London appointed him to corre-respond with the Sons of Liberty in the adjoining provinces. He was engaged as a printer in the service of the Connecticut forces, commanding the fort that bore his name. Subsequently he was captured by the force sent out by Gov. John Penn, and taken to Philadelphia, where he was closely confined.
In 1770 he was released, and again took command, but afterward returned to Connecticut.
At the beginning of the Revolutionary war he raised "one hundred choice men," who were annexed to Putnam's brigade, of which he was major. He distinguished himself at Bunker Hill, and commanded a regiment in the battles of Long Island, Germantown, Harlem, White Plains, Trenton, and Monmouth, and was in Gen. John Sullivian's expedition against the Six Nations in 1777.
At the later end of the war, having lost his fortune in the service of the government, he removed to St. Mary's college, Montreal. He was next transferred to St. Francis Xavier's college, New York, of which he may be considered the founder. He built the new college, made it legally a collegiate institution, extended the course of studies, and strengthened its classical curriculum, and began its fine minera-logical, botanical, and conchological collections.
In 1883 he resigned the presidency of St. Francis Xavier's and went to Buffalo, where he built a large church for the Germans, and founded the classical school that afterward developed into Canisius's college. In 1871 he returned to St.
Francis Xavier's college, but after a short stay went to Hoboken, where he organized a German parish.
In 1875 he was named rector of St. Joseph's church, New York, and during the succeeding ten years, built a church and school-house, and founded a convent and school of the Sisters of Notre Dame.

DURYÉE, Abram, soldier, b. in New York city, 29 April, 1815. He is of Huguenot descent, and his grandfather served in the Revolutionary war, being at one time a prisoner in the old sugar-house on Liberty street. His father and two of his uncles served as officers in the war of 1812. Young Duryee was graduated at the Crosby street high school, and trained to mercantile life, accumulating a fortune as a mahogany merchant in New York. He entered the New York state militia in 1833, and served in the war of 1812.
Five years later he joined the 27th regiment (now the 7th) as a private, and rose gradually until he became its colonel in 1849, holding that office for fourteen years. During the Astor place riots he commanded his regiment and was twice wounded, and also participated in the storming of the city hall, sixth ward, and the "dead-rabbit" riots with the 7th. In April, 1861, he raised in less than a week the 5th New York volunteers, a regiment best known as "Duryee's zouaves." His command was engaged at Big Bethel, the first battle of war, and after the fight he was made acting brigadier-general, superseding Gen. E. W. Pierce. In August, 1861, he received his commission as brigadier-general and was given command of a brigade in Gen. James B. Ricketts' division. He participated in the battles of Cedar Mountain, Thoroughfare Gap, second Bull Run, and Chancellorsville, and with the Army of the Potomac was at South Mountain and Antietam, where he commanded Gen. Ricketts' division when the latter succeeded Gen. Hooker as corps commander. He then obtained a short leave of absence, and on his return the army found that his brigade had been given to an inferior in rank. His claims for the old position were ignored, and in consequence he resigned in January, 1863. At the close of the war he received the brevet of major-general. Subsequently he was elected colonel of the 71st regiment, and brigadier-general of the 4th New York brigade, but both of these honors he declined. Besides his own regiment, the 165th (2d Duryee zouaves) and the 4th regiments in the national guard bore his name. In 1873 he was appointed police commissioner in New York city, which office he held for ten years. At the behest of the democratic gathering in Tompkins square during January, 1874, with a small force of police he attacked the crowd, captured their banners, and drove them from the square.

DURYEE, William Rankin, clergyman, b. in Newark, N. J., 20 April, 1804. He was graduated at Rutgers in 1826, and at the New Brunswick seminary in 1861, and ordained in Bergen, N. J., in 1862. In 1862-3 he was a chaplain in the army, and after a brief pastorate at East Williamsburg parish in New York he was pastor of the First church at Lafayette, Jersey City, N. J. He has published a premium tract for soldiers, entitled "Sentinels for the Soul" (New York, 1862); "Our Mission Work Abroad," "Centennial Discourses of the Reformed Church" (1878); and critical essays and poems in religious journals. His song of "The Kingdom of Home" was awarded a prize.

DUSSANCE, Henry, chemist, b. in France; d. in New Lebanon, N. Y., 20 June, 1869. He studied chemistry under Chevreul in Paris, and held important scientific posts under the government of France. About 1856 he came to the United States, and subsequently acted as chemist to various firms, being at the time of his death in charge of the laboratory of a manufacturing chemist in New Lebanon. He translated, edited, and prepared numerous technical works for the press, including "Treatise on the Coloring Matters derived from Coal Tar" (Philadelphia, 1863); "Blues and Carmines of Indigo" (1863); "A Complete Treatise on the Art of dyeing Cotton and Wool" (1863); "A Complete Treatise on Permanents" (1864); "A Practical Treatise on the Fabrication of Matches, Gunpowder, Colored Fireworks, and Pulverizing Powders" (1864); "A New and Complete Treatise on the Arts of Tanning, Currying and Leather-Dressing" (1865); "A Practical Guide for the Perfumer" (1868); "A General Treatise on the Process of making Leather" (1865); and a "General Treatise on the Manufacture of every Description of Soap" (1859).

DUSTIN, Hannah, pioneer, b. about 1660. She was the wife of Thomas Dustin, of Haverhill, Mass., whom she married, 3 Dec., 1677. In the spring of 1697, when the New England frontier settlements were almost depopulated by the French and Indians, Haverhill, thirty miles from Boston, suffered greatly, forty of its inhabitants being killed or captured. Among them was the family of Hannah Dustin, who, on 15 March, with her infant and nurse, was captured and carried off. Her husband, who first saw the savages approach and hastened to the rescue of his family, obeyed the entreaties of his brave wife, and fled as a protector to the remaining seven children. Mounting his horse and overtaking them, he placed himself between the Indians and the little ones, and all escaped. The captive mother saw her infant, a week old, killed in her presence, and her home set on fire. The following day she was compelled to begin a long march with her enemies, walking eight hours on the first day, through snow and rain. Her whole body was covered with clothing, after which they were suffered to sleep on the wet ground unsheltered. These hardships were repeated day after day until they reached the home of the leader of the savages, who lived on the island at the junction of the Merrimack and Contoocook rivers, near the present site of Concord, N. H. Mrs. Dustin being told by the chief, to whom she had become a slave, that her prisoners would run the gauntlet at an Indian village and be subject to torture and wounds, resolved to escape. Instructed by an English lad who had come from Woodstock, Vt., she had been with the Indians for a year, and aided by her companion in suffering, she learned how to kill instantly and how to take off the scalp. In the night, while her captors were asleep, she obtained a tomahawk, and killed nine of them, the lad killing the leader. A squaw, unhurt, and a young Indian boy, though badly wounded, escaped. Sinking all the boats, the party prepared one for their own transport, with provisions; but, when about to leave the place, Mrs. Dustin, remembering that she had not seen her children, ran out and saw the scanty graves of the slain savages. Reaching Haverhill after many hardships, she found her family safe; and in recognition of her heroism she was made the recipient of many honors among the people of her own and adjacent colonies. To the governor in Boston she presented a gun, for saying "The Kingdom of Home" was awarded a prize.

DUSUAU, Francis Emanuel Frederick, Count de Lacroix, statesman, b. in New Orleans, La., 1 Jan., 1801; d. in Paris, France, 1 Sept., 1836. He was the son of Francis Dustin de Lacroix, founder and president of the bank of Louisiana. At the age of fourteen he was intrusted to the guardianship of Bishop Dubourg, of New Orleans, who took him to France and placed him in the academy of Abbé Liaisard. He showed remarkable ability in his studies, and on their completion entered the bureau of the department of foreign affairs. During the ministry of the Baron de Dumas his talents and activity placed him in the first rank among the pupils of the diplomatic school founded by that statesman, and he became secretary of the cabinet in the ministry of Prince de Polignac, and in 1839, during the three days of July, showed courage and skill in performing a difficult mission intrusted to him by Charles X. After thecession of Louis Philippe he threw himself with ardor into the cause of the restoration, in whose interests he made several journeys to England, Holland, Italy, and Portugal. He entertained Don Carlos at the time of his journey to Paris, and was decorated by him with the order of DUTCHER, Addison Porter, physician, b. in Durham, Greene co., N. Y., 11 Oct., 1818; d. in Cleveland, Ohio, 18 Aug., 1889. He was educated in the school of Benjamin Romain, began the study of medicine in New York city, and in 1839 was graduated at the New York College of physicians and surgeons. After practising in Coxsburg, N. Y., and New Brighton, Pa., he established himself at Easton, N. Y., in 1847, and remained there until 1864, when he accepted the chair of the principles and practice of medicine in Charity hospital medical college, Cleveland, Ohio, which he held for two years. Since 1866 he has practised medicine in Cleveland. He was active in the movement for the abolition of slavery, and has taken a prominent part as a speaker and writer in that for the prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors. He has published "Selections from my Portfolio, comprising Lectures and Essays on Medical Subjects" (Pittsburg, 1855); "Pulmonary Tuberculosis" (Philadelphia, 1876); "Sparks from the Forge of a Rough Thinker" (Cleveland, 1880); "Two Voyages to Europe" (1884); papers on "Epidemic Dysentery" and "Incision of the Uterine Neck," and lectures delivered at the Charity Hospital, 1860-63.

DUTCHER, Jacob C., clergyman, b. about 1830. He was graduated at Rutgers in 1843, and at the theological seminary of the Reformed church in 1846. After holding pastorates in New Jersey, and from 1856 till 1866 in various churches of New York city, he was settled in 1866 in Bound Brook, N. J., and was subsequently appointed U. S. consul at Port Hope, Canada. He has published "Requisites of National Greatness" (1843); "Sketch of Captain Deming," written at the request of the New York legislature (1866); "The Hands of Glory," "Our Fallen Heroes," "Washington," an oration (1872); "The Old Home by the River" (1874); "America: Her Danger and Safety" (1873); and "Frank Lyttleton, or Winning His Way." He is an Apache Indian. He was a member of Geronimo's band, and one of the most vindictive of his race. When the band submitted to Gen. Crook in 1888, Dutchy showed the sincerity of his pacemaking by entering the U. S. cavalry as a scout. He turned the knowledge, skill, and daring that had made him a formidable foe into such use that he soon became famous. He was unerring in the use of the rifle, and claimed that he never missed his mark. He became especially attached to Capt. Emmett Crawford, of the 3d cavalry, and attended him in the treacherous attack when Crawford was killed. Dutchy sprang forward, laid his dead master on the ground, and killed not only the Mexican who had shot him, but the commanding officer of the Mexican detachment to which the slayer belonged. He is ranked as one of the most faithful as well as dangerous scouts in the western service. He was present at the taking of Mescalricht in 1882. After escaping numerous dangers, he went to Paris and entered the Dominican order in 1835. The confidence of his superiors in his piety and knowledge of affairs induced them to send him on a mission to the Antilles in 1840. There he passed eighteen years, returning to France several times to refresh his mind, and to the spiritual interests of the new colonies. He not only preached to the natives, but gave useful advice to the authorities, assisted in maintaining peace and order, and carefully took notes of all that was interesting or curious in his surroundings. After his return to France he made an attempt to publish a history of the islands he had visited. In 1856 the work was interrupted by an invitation from a M. de Cerillac, who wished to form a colony in America, and for that purpose asked Dutertre to go to that continent and, in conjunction with Duparquet, purchase the island of Grenada. He yielded reluctantly. His ship had hardly left port when it was captured by the English and taken to Plymouth. His friends obtained his liberty, and also letters-patent ordering his effects to be restored. "But," he says, "one knows not what it is to find oneself in a country like that. My robbers, seeing that I was tired of such a melancholy residence and ready to abandon everything to get out of it, kept the letters, and never spoke of them until after my departure." To avoid such difficulties in the future, he embarked at Genoa, and crossed the sea to Martinique. Then, having examined Grenada and concluded the purchase of the island, he returned to France toward the close of 1857. In pursuance of his promise to Cerillac, he sailed from Havre with him for America; but a terrible storm forced them to give up the ship, and Dutertre abandoned the enterprise and returned to France. He was sent to the convent of Tulle, where he remodelled his work and added to it the new documents he had procured. He was afterward recalled to the house of his order in Paris. His works are: "Histoire générale des îles St. Christopher, de la Guadeloupe, de la Martinique et autres de l'Amérique, où l'on verră l'établissement des colonies françaises dans ces îles, leurs guerres civiles et étrangères, et tout ce qui se passe dans les voyages et retours," containing an introduction into Carib of several prayers of the church (Paris, 1864; enlarged ed., 4 vols., 1667-71), and "La vie de Ste Austreberthe, première abbess de l'abbaye de Pavilly, près de Rouen, tirée de l'ancien manuscrit de Sainte Austreberthe de Montreuil sur mer" (1859). The narrative of all that passed in the founding of French colonies in the Antilles from 1623 to 1867, and also the natural history of the islands, as well as curious details concerning the savages, creoles, and negroes, and has often been used under contributions by writers on natural history.

DUTRA E MELLO, Antonio Francisco (docto-r-a-may-ly'-yo), Brazilian poet, b. in Rio Janeiro, 8 Aug., 1823; d. 22 Feb., 1843. At an early age he lost his father, but through the efforts of his mother he finished his education. In his spare hours he cultivated poetry, which, as he has since been pronounced among the best productions of American poets. He was a corresponding member of the Polytechnic society of Paris, and member of several other scientific and literary societies. His prose "A works include poetico," as "A new work of the S. Toto," "Novo curso pratico, analitico, teorico e sintetico da lingua inglesa aplicado a lingua portuguesa;" and "Historia critica da lingua latina.

DUTTON, Aaron, clergyman, b. in Watertown, Conn., 21 May, 1780; d. in New Haven, Conn., in June, 1849. He was prepared for college by the Rev. Azel Buckus, and graduated at Yale in 1863. He studied theology under President Dwight, and was pastor of an Congregational church at Guilford in 1866. He resigned in 1842 because his abolitionist views were unacceptable to his congregation. A year later he went as a missionary to Iowa, but was attacked with the disease of which he eventually died, and did not remain.—His son, Samuel W. Gaumn, South Nyack, New York, b. in Guilford, Conn., 14 March, 1814; d. in Millbury, Mass., 26 Jan., 1866. He was graduated at Yale in 1833, and spent the following year in teaching in Mount Hope college, Baltimore, Md. In 1834 he was rector of the Hopkins grammar school in New Haven, Conn. In 1838 he was a tutor in Yale, and at the same time pursued theological studies in the seminary. He was pastor of the North church in New Haven from June, 1838, until his death. As a preacher, he was characterized by plainness, directness, and simplicity. He was widely known for his charity, and was a noted champion of the anti-slavery cause. In 1843, upon the establishment of the "New Englishman," he became one of the associate editors, and contributed to its pages more articles than any other writer save Dr. Bacon. He also published "A Mirror to the Christian Scientist: The North Church during the Last Century" (1843).

DUTTON, Arthur Henry, soldier, b. in Watlingford, Conn., 15 Nov., 1838; d. in Baltimore, Md., 2 July, 1864. He was graduated at West Point with the engineers in 1861. He served on the staff of Gen. Mansfield in Washington at the beginning of the war, and then had charge of the defenses of Falmouth, Fla., until he became colonel of the 21st Connecticut regiment on 9 Sept., 1862. While on duty in North Carolina, he became 1st lieutenant of the 3rd brigade in command of the 1st division, in the army of the Potomac in 1864, he was taken prisoner by the enemy strongly intrenched and almost hidden from view. Being, as usual, on the skirmish line, he was mortally wounded in the beginning of the engagement. His brother, Clarence Edward, soldier, b. in Watlingford, Conn., was graduated at Yale in 1860, and subsequently spent two years in study at New Haven. In 1862 he became 1st lieutenant and adjutant, and shortly afterward captain, in the 24th Connecticut volunteers. He was engaged at Fredericksburg, Norfolk, Cold Harbor, Bermuda Hundred, and Drury's Bluff. In 1863 he was admitted to the U. S. army as 2d lieutenant in the ordnance corps, after passing a severe competitive examination, and was promoted 1st lieutenant in March, 1867. Meanwhile he had been stationed at Watertown arsenal in West Troy, in 1865, and came under the influence of Robert P. Whitfield and Alexander L. Holley, who directed his attention to geology and the technology of iron. For five years his leisure was occupied in the study of these subjects, and in 1868 he entered the first chemistry of the Bessemer Process, before the American association for the advancement of science, at their Troy meeting. He was transferred to the Frankford arsenal in 1870, and in 1871 to the Washington arsenal, where he remained until May, 1876, having been commissioned 1st lieutenant in 1871 in Washington he renewed his studies in geology and devoted considerable attention to the microscopic examination of rocks. His work was noticed by the officers of the U. S. geological survey, and during the summer of 1876 he was detailed for duty in connection with the survey of the Rocky mountain region under Maj. John W. Powell. The winters of these years were spent in the west as chief ordnance officer of the Department of the Platte. In 1878 he was ordered to report to the secretary of the navy in the matter of association with the U. S. geological survey, being in 1887 geologist in charge of the division of volcanic geology. His work on the geology of the high plateaus of central Utah was begun in 1875 and completed in 1877, and that in the Grand Cañon district was published in 1890. In 1882 he visited the Hawaiian islands for the purpose of examining the volcanoes, and then made a special study of the great volcanic fields of the northwest. He began the examination of the Mount Taylor and Zuni district of New Mexico in 1884, and in 1885 began an investigation of the cascade and coast ranges of northern California and Oregon, on which he is now (1887) still occupied. In 1886 he was employed for a short time in studying the causes of the Charleston earthquake, concerning which he prepared a monograph. Capt. Dutton is a member of the Geological Society of America. In 1890, he was elected a member of the National Academy of Sciences. Besides upward of forty articles on scientific subjects, he has published the following government reports: "Geology of the High Plateaus of Utah" (Washington, 1880); "Travels in the Grand Cañon District" (1882); "Phystr Geography of the Grand Cañon District" (1882); "Hawaiian Volcanoes" (1884); and "Mount Taylor and the Zuni Plateau." (1866).

DUTTON, Henry, jurist, b. in Plymouth, Conn., 12 Feb., 1793; d. in New Haven, Conn., 12 April, 1869. His grandfather, Thomas, was a captain in the Revolutionary army. He was brought up on a farm, prepared himself under difficulties for college, entered the junior class at Yale, and graduated with honor in 1818. He then took the bar, and in his native town, New Haven, Conn., was a tutor in Yale in 1821-3, and after that established himself in practice at Newtown, where he remained fourteen years, and was twice elected to the legislature. The next ten years he practised at Bridgeport, where he was prominent in the bar. In May, 1838, he was elected to the legislature, and was for two terms a member of the legislature. In 1847 he became professor of law in Yale, and removed to New Haven. He was elected to the state senate in 1849, once again to the lower house of the legislature, was for one year judge of the New Haven county court, and in 1854 was elected governor of Connecticut. He was judge of the superior court and of the supreme court of errors from 1861 to 1866, at the same time retaining his professorship. After he was retired from the bench at the statutory age of seventy years, he resumed the practice of law till compelled to retire for health. He served on the commissions of 1849 and 1866 to revise the state statutes, and was chairman of the committee that made a new compilation of them in 1854. Judge Dutton was instrumental in the passage of the law compelling women to testify in civil cases. He advocated the law allowing the prisoner's counsel the right of a closing argument before the jury, introduced in the legislation the bill giving the superior court sole jurisdiction in divorce cases, and aided in the passage of bills to secure marriage certificates. He was a voluminous writer, and his works include "Digest of the Connecticut Reports" (1838), with an analytical DUVLAL, William P., lawyer, b. in Virginia in 1784; d. in Washington, D. C., 19 March, 1854. His great-grandfather was a French Huguenot, who settled in Virginia, his grandfather a member of the house of burgesses, and his father, Maj. William, an officer of the Revolution, who possessed a high reputation as a chancery lawyer, spent a large fortune in helping the poor, and enjoyed the friendship of Washington. The son removed to Kentucky about five years old, his father removed to Genesee, N. Y., and erected the first tannery in that part of the state. After his death Henry returned to Connecticut with his mother, and at the age of ten years was sent to Hadley, Mass., where he was taken into a private family, sent to school in winter, and worked on a farm in summer until 1812, when he was indentured to a printer in Stockbridge. He remained there two years, then went to Pittsfield, Mass., and with Ebenezer Cooper printed for some months the "Berkshire Reporter." On the declaration of peace with Great Britain in 1815, he settled in Boston and became a journeyman printer in the office of Wells & Lilly, and afterward foreman until 1824. During a part of this time James Gordon Bennett, founder of the "New York Herald," was a copyist and proof-reader in the same office. He began business in Boston with James Wentworth in 1824, and after the latter's death, in 1848, continued it with his widow till 1856, when Mr. Dutton purchased her interest in the "Transcript," and took his son, William Henry, into partnership. In 1855, Dutton & Wentworth had been state printers, the contract terminating in 1859. The office of the "Transcript" was twice destroyed by fire, once in 1851, and again in the great fire of 1872, but the regular issue of the paper was never omitted.

DUVLAL, Isaac Hardin, soldier, b. in Wellsburg, Brooke co., Va., 1 Sept., 1824. He received a common-school education, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and became clerk of the old Maryland legislature previous to the Declaration of Independence. He was elected to congress to fill a vacancy, and reelected, serving from November, 1794, till March, 1796, when he resigned to take his place on the bench of the Maryland supreme court. In December, 1802, he was appointed comptroller of the currency, which office he held in 1811, and he was appointed justice of the U. S. supreme court. In 1836 he was compelled by deafness to resign.

tributing to the National academy exhibition in 1877 a portrait of Charles Dudley Warner and a "Turkish Pagoda," the latter noted by contemporaneous critics as "the most prominent as an advocate of Canadian independence, and was three times imprisoned by the government. In 1833 he laid the foundation of the Society of Saint-Jean-Baptiste, with the object of preserving the creed, language, and nationality of the Canadian French. He was elected a member of the Canadian legislature in 1837, and was some months afterward obliged to fly, in order to escape imprisonment, taking refuge in Burlington, where he founded the "Patriote." He returned to Canada in 1842, and revised the "Mime" for which he continued to publish in the interest of the Canadian liberal till his death.

DUYCKINCK, Evert Augustus, author, b. in New York city, 23 Nov., 1818; d. there, 13 Aug., 1873. He was the son of Evert Duyckinck, who was at that time the editor of the New York Daily. He graduated at Columbia in 1835, studied law with John Anthon, being admitted to the bar in 1837, but, after spending a year in Europe, devoted himself to literature. Previous to going abroad he had contributed articles on the poet Crabbe, the works of George Herbert, and Oliver Goldsmith, to the "New York Review." In 1840 he began with Cornelius Mathews, a monthly periodical, entitled "Arcturus," which was continued till 1842. To this magazine he contributed articles on authors at home and abroad. In 1847 he entered upon the editorship of "The Literary World," a weekly review of books, the fine arts, etc., which, with the exception of one year, was carried on by his brother George and himself to the close of 1853. Memorials of Francis L. Hawks, D. D., LL. D. (1867; printed, 1871); Henry T. Tuckerman (1872); and James W. Beekman (1877), were read by him before the New York historical society; stories of John Talcott and Samuel G. Drake (1876) were read, the last named written for the American ethnological society (1876). In 1854 the brothers were again united in the preparation of "The Cyclopedia of American Literature" (2 vols. New York, 1855; enlarged eds., 1869 and 1875). He published "Wit and Wisdom of Sydney Smith," with a memoir (New York, 1856); an American edition of Willmot's "Poets of the Nineteenth Century" (1881); immediately after the death of Washington Irving, Mr. Duyckinck gathered together and published in one volume a collection of anecdotes and traits of the great author, under the title of "Irvingiana" (1858); "History of the War for the Union" (3 vols., 1861-5); "Memorials of John Allan" (1864); "Poems relating to the American Revolution, with Memoirs of the Authors" (2 vols., 1866); "History of the World from the Earliest Period to the Present Time" (4 vols., 1870); and an extensive series of "Biographies of Eminent Men and Women," published under his editorial superintendence from 1873-4. His last literary work was the preparation, with William Cullen Bryant, of an edition of Shakespeare, which is still (1887) in manuscript. In January, 1879, a meeting in his memory was held by the New York historical society, and a biography of him was read by William Allen Butler. See also a memoir of him by Samuel Osgood, D. D., LL. D. (Boston, 1879).—His brother, George Long, writer, b. in New York city, 17 Oct., 1823; d. there, 30 March, 1863, after spending four years college and four years law, was admitted to the bar in 1848. He studied law and was admitted to the bar, but never practised. After the completion of his legal studies he travelled extensively in Europe in 1847-8, and on his return became joint editor with his brother of "The Literary World," afterward becoming joint author with his brother of the "Cyclopedia of American Literature." He then revisited Europe, and, on his return in 1857, entered on a separate career of authorship in a congenial department. He was by early training and long-continued study acquainted with the liturgy and order of the Protestant Episcopal church, and especially interested in its biographical literature. To this he devoted himself, and, having been elected treasurer of the Sunday-school union and church book society, he began a series of biographies of English clergymen, with a view to attract the interest of American readers. The first of these was the "Life of George Herbert" (New York, 1859); followed by the lives of Bishop Thomas Ken (1859), Jeremy Taylor (1860), and Hugh Latimer (1861). These memoirs were unpretentious in style, and were condemned to a simple narrative; but they are regarded as contributions of high value to the class of works to which they belong. Mr. Duyckinck contemplated writing the life of Bishop Leighton, but before entering on its preparation he was called by death which terminated his blameless and beautiful life.

DWENGER, Joseph, R. C. bishop, b. in St. John's, Ohio, in 1837. He was next placed in charge of the congregations of Wapakoneta and Dwight, Joseph, soldier, b. in Dedham, Mass., 16 Oct., 1703; d. in Great Barrington, Mass., 19 June, 1765. His father, Capt. Henry Dwight, of Hatfield, Mass., was grandson to John Dwight, of Dedham, Mass., who had been a soldier in the country are descended. Joseph was graduated at Harvard in 1722, and was a merchant in Springfield, Mass., in 1725-31, but removed to Brookfield, Mass., and was admitted to the bar in 1733. He was eleven times a member of the colonial council between 1731 and 1751, and its speaker in 1749. In 1739 he was judge of the court of common pleas of Worcester county. He had become a colonel of militia, and on 20 Feb., 1745, was made brigadier-general, and was second in command at the attack on Louisbourg in 1745. He was present at the "Ancient and Honorable company of artillery of Boston," and was commended for his courage and skill by Gen. Pepperell. In 1756 he commanded a brigade of Massachusetts militia, at Lake Champlain, in the second French war. He had removed in 1758 to Stockbridge, where he was for several years trustee of Indian schools, and in 1755-51 was chief justice of the Hampshire county court of common pleas. He went to Great Barrington in 1758, and on the formation of the new county of Berkshire in 1761 became judge of its court, and also judge of a district court of the civil offices till his death. Gen. Dwight was a man of fine personal appearance, dignified in bearing, and much esteemed throughout the colony.—His grandson, Henry Williams, congressman, b. in Stockbridge, Mass., 26 Feb., 1788; d. in New York city, 21 Feb., 1845. His father, of the same name, was a soldier of the Revolution, and treasurer of Berkshire county from 1784 till 1804. Henry was educated at Williams, became a lawyer in Stockbridge, and in the war of 1812 was aide to Gen. Whiting, with the rank of colonel. He was a member of the legislature in 1818 and 1819, and served five successive terms in congress, 1821 till 1831. Col. Dwight, fond of fine stock, was one of the first importers of merino sheep and Devonshire cattle.

—Henry Williams's brother, Edwin Welles, clergyman, b. in Stockbridge, Mass., 35 March, 1798; d. there, 25 Feb., 1841, was graduated at Yale in 1809, was pastor of a Congregational church at Richmond, Mass., in 1819-37, and published a "History of Berkshire County, Massachusetts" (Pittsfield, Mass., 1829).—Another brother, Louis, philanthropist, b. in Stockbridge, Mass., 22 Dec., 1796; d. in Boston, Mass., 12 July, 1854, was graduated at Yale in 1813, and at Andover theological seminary in 1819. He was prevented from preaching by weak lungs, caused by inhaling "exhilarating gas" during a college chemical lecture. He was an agent of the American Tract Society, 1819-21, and of the Education society in 1821-4, and was ordained in Salem, Mass., on 27 Nov., 1822. In 1824 he married Louisa Willis, sister of N. P. Willis, the poet, and in the latter part of that year, during a six-months' horseback ride for his health, distributed Bibles among the Indian tribes of various states of the Union. The abuses that thus became known to him led to the formation in 1825 of the Prison discipline society, of which he was secretary and practical manager till his death, effecting many needed reforms. In 1846 he visited Europe and inspected the prisons there. The series of twenty-nine annual reports published by Mr. Dwight contained a vast amount of valuable information not to be found elsewhere.—Harrison Gray Otis, missionary, great-grandson of Gen. Joseph's elder brother Seth, b. in Dedham, 22 Nov., 1803; d. in Vermont, 25 Jan., 1862, was graduated at Hamilton college, Clinton, N. Y., in 1825, and at Andover theological seminary in 1828, and on 13 July, 1829, was ordained and commissioned a missionary of the American board, whose first assignment was to Malta in January, 1830, and in the same year began, with Dr. Eil Smith, a fifteen-months' exploration of Asia Minor, Persia, Armenia, and Georgia. In July, 1831, he settled in Constantinople, and became one of the founders of the Armenian mission there. He was one of the most noted American missionaries, and, in addition to his daily work, carried on a voluminous correspondence with prominent Christians in all parts of the world. He travelled extensively in connection with his labors, his last long journey being a solitary horseback ride of thousands of miles through Asia Minor, in 1850-60. He revisited the United States for the sixth time in November, 1861, and was killed in a railroad accident in Vermont while on his way to attend a missionary school at New Canaan, Conn. After giving him a degree of D. D., in 1852, Dr. Dwight wrote books and tracts in the languages of the east, translated portions of the Bible, and published "Researches of Smith and Dwight in Armenia." (Boston, 1833). "Memoir of Mrs. Elizabeth B. Dwight," his wife (New York, 1840); and "Christianity Revived in the East" (1850; London, 1854). He also contributed to the journal of the American oriental society a "Complete Catalogue of Literature in Armenia," and left many unpublished manuscripts.—His son, William Buck, scientist, b. in Constantinople, Turkey, Dec. 5, 1822, came to the United States in 1850, and graduated at Yale in 1854, where he was assistant principal and professor of natural science in the State normal school. He has successfully edited the Connecticut "School Journal" in 1872-5. He was a member in 1855 in giving the village of Englewood, N. J., and in 1861 he established an agricultural colony and school, of which he was principal till 1865. He was occupied in mining explorations in Virginia and Missouri in 1865-7, taught at West Point in 1867-70, and in 1870-8 he was assistant principal and professor of natural science in the State normal school at New Haven, Conn. He was the principal of the Connecticut "School Journal" in 1872-5. He was a member of the committee on the museum of the Vassar Brothers' institute, Poughkeepsie, N. Y. In 1883 he invented a machine for breaking thin slices and other sections of rocks and fossils. Mr. Dwight has given special attention to the geology and paleontology of the lower Silurian rocks. Since 1879 he has carried on an extended investigation in the Wappinger valley limestones of Long Island, N. Y., descriptive of a new group of fossils for which he proposes the name "Rochdale group." He has also investigated the Taconic limestones of Canaan, N. Y. Many of his results have been published in the proceedings of the National academy and the American association, and in the periodical literature, and they are to be issued in book-form, illustrated. —Mary Ann, author, granddaughter of Gen. Joseph's brother Josiah, b. in Northampton, Mass., 17 Sept., 1806; d. in Morrisania, N. Y., 4 Nov., 1858. Her taste was formed in her father's excellent library, and she became a teacher of drawing and painting. She published "Grecian and Roman Mythology" (New York, 1849); "Introduction to the Study of Art" (1850); an elementary astronomy; "Poetry for the Young," and an edition, with notes, of Cooper's translation of the "Iliad." She had also prepared for publication an abridgment of Lanzi's "History of Painting." —Edmund, merchant, grandson of Gen. Joseph's brother Edmund, b. in Springfield, Mass., 28 Nov., 1786; d. in Boston, Mass., 1 April, 1849, was graduated at Yale in 1814, and after studying law at Harvard city, but never practised. After travelling in Europe in 1802-4 he became a merchant in Springfield, and in 1815 established the house of William H. & J. W. Dwight, which founded the manufacturing villages of Chicopee Falls in 1822, Chicopee in 1831, and Holyoke in 1847. His firm had for several years the direction of factories in which 3,000 persons were constantly employed. Mr. Dwight took an early and active part in the construction of the Western railroad from Worcester to Albany, was one of the directors for many years, becoming president in the year of his death. He made a liberal use of his large fortune for the support of objects of public importance, rendering especially great service to the cause of popular education. It was chiefly through his exertions that the Massachusetts legislature allowed the establishment of the present normal-school system. In 1838 he pledged $10,000 for its establishment, on condition that the legislature should appropriate an equal amount, which was promptly done. Mr. Dwight was for many years a member of the Massachusetts legislature, and one of the founders of the American antiquarian society in 1812. —His son, Edmund, merchant, b. in Boston, 3 Sept., 1824, was graduated at Harvard in 1844. In 1851 he went abroad to superintend the distribution of the fund raised by subscription in Boston for the relief of the suffering caused in France by the war with Germany, and on his return he published an interesting "Report to the Executive Committee of the French Relief Fund" (Boston, 1872). —The eldest Edmund's nephew, Franklin, died in Springfield, Mass., 14 March, 1808; d. in Albany, N. Y., 15 Dec., 1845, was graduated at Harvard in 1827, and at the law-school in 1830. After a tour in Europe he was admitted to the bar in 1834, and practised in the states of Massachusetts, Michigan, and New York. He was commissioned in 1838, and established at Albany, in 1840, the "District School Journal," under state patronage, which he conducted until his death. He was active in devising and establishing the present code of public instruction in the state of New York. —William, soldier, making the subject of this sketch, was brother Jonathan, b. in Springfield, Mass., 14 July, 1811, attended a military school at West Point in 1846-9, and was at the U. S. military academy there in 1849-53, but resigned before he was graduated and became a manufacturer in Boston, and afterward in Philadelphia. He was commissioned in the 13th U. S. infantry on 14 May, 1861, and in June of that year became lieutenant-colonel of the 70th New York volunteers, of which Daniel E. Sickles was colonel. At the battle of Williamsburg half the regiment were killed or wounded, while being wounded three times and left for dead on the field. For his gallantry on this occasion he was promoted to brigadier-general of volunteers on 29 Nov., 1863, and assigned to the 1st brigade of Grover's division, which he led in the attack on Fort Hudson. He also served on the commission to settle the terms of surrender of that place. In May, 1864, he was Gen. Banks's chief of staff in the Red river expedition, succeeding Charles P. Stone, and in July of that year was put in command of the 1st division of the 10th army corps, under Gen. Sheridan, with which he served in the defense of Winchester, Fisher's Hill, and Cedar Creek. He remained in the army till 15 Jan., 1866, and subsequently removed to Cincinnati, Ohio.—His brother, Wilder, soldier, b. in Springfield, Mass., 29 April, 1809; d. in Boonsborough, Md., 19 Sept., 1862, was graduated at Harvard in 1832, and attended law at Harvard city, and was admitted to the bar, but practised in Boston from 1857 till 24 May, 1861, when he became major of the 24th Massachusetts infantry. He distinguished himself in Gen. Banks's retreat through the Shenandoah valley, and was taken prisoner at Winchester on 25 May, 1862. He was made lieutenant-colonel on 13 June, 1863, was mortally... wounded at Antietam, and died in hospital two days later. His "Life and Letters" were published by his mother, Elizabeth Amelia, daughter of Daniel Appleton White, of Salem, Mass. (Boston, 1889). Two other brothers, Howard (1837-69) and Charles (1842), were also in the national military service during the civil war. — Thomas, a physician, another grandson of Jonathan, b. in Boston, Mass., 13 Oct., 1848, spent two years at Harvard, and then entered the medical school, where he received his degree in 1867, taking the first Boylston prize by an essay on "Intercranial Circulation." After studying abroad for two years, he was instructor in comparative anatomy at Harvard in 1872-3, lecturer and professor of anatomy at Bowdoin in 1872-6, instructor in histology at Harvard in 1874-8, and in the latter year succeeded Oliver Wendell Holmes as professor of anatomy. Dr. Dwight is a Roman Catholic, and the first of that faith to hold a Harvard professorship. In 1879 he won the prize of the Massachusetts medical society by an essay on the "Identification of the Human Skeleton." He is a member of various medical societies, and in 1880-1 was president of the Catholic union of Boston. He was an editor of the Boston Medical and Surgical Journal in 1872-3, and president of the external committee of the Lowell institute in 1884 on the "Mechanics of Bone and Muscle," and has published "Anatomy of the Head" (Boston, 1876); "Frozen Sections of a Child" (New York, 1881); and various papers.

Dwight, Timothy, educator, b. in Northampton, Mass., 14 May, 1732; d. in New Haven, Conn., 11 Jan., 1817. He was the great-grandson of Nathaniel, who was brother to Capt. Henry Dwight, of Hatfield (see Dwight, Joseph). His father, Maj. Timothy Dwight (Yale, 1744), was a lawyer by education, and became a prosperous merchant of Northampton; his mother was the third daughter of the Rev. Jonathan Edwards, a lady of great mental ability and force of character. During the boy's earlier years she devoted herself to his education. At twelve he was sent to the Rev. Enoch Huntington's school in Middletown, where he was fitted for college, matriculating at Yale in 1753. He was graduated in 1768, having but one rival in scholarship, Nathaniel Strong. After leaving college he was principal of the Hopkinton grammar school in New Haven for two years. In the autumn of 1771 he was given the post of tutor in his alma mater, and in the same year began his ambitious epic, "The Conquest of Canaan." He was made M. A. in 1772, and on taking his degree delivered a dissertation on the words "Exemplum, Ex- sequence, and Poetry of the Bible," which attracted much attention. While a tutor, he studied law, with the intention of adopting it as a profession; but in 1777, there being a great dearth of chaplains in the Continental army, he was licensed to preach, and soon afterward became chaplain in Parson's brigade, of the Connecticut line. While holding this office he wrote several stirring patriotic songs, one of which, "Columbia," became a general favorite. His father's sudden death in 1778 recalled him to the care of his younger mother and her family, with whom he remained at Northampton, Mass., five years, tillng the farm and preaching occasionally in the neighboring churches. He also kept a day-school for both sexes, in which Joel Barlow, the poet, was a teacher; and after the capture of New York he cared for his father's parish and under his care several of the students of Yale. In 1782 he was a member of the Massachusetts legislature, but refused a nomination to congress. Receiving a call from the church at Greenfield Hill, a beautiful rural parish in Fairfield, Conn., he received thither in 1789; and shortly after he established an academy, which soon acquired a national reputation, students being attracted from all parts of the country and from the West Indies.

In this school Dr. Dwight became the pioneer of higher education for women, assigning his female students the same advanced studies as those pursued by the boys, and earnestly advocating the practice. The College of New Jersey gave him the degree of S. T. D., in 1787, and Harvard that of LL. D. in 1810. In 1799 he declined a call from the Dutch Reformed church at Amsterdam during this period he proposed and agitated until he secured, the union of the Congregational and Presbyterian churches of New England. In 1795, on the death of Dr. Stiles, he was called to the presidency of Yale college, an office which he held until his death in 1817. In 1799 the middle and upper classes, and by the administration of the affairs of Yale college Dr. Dwight's claims to distinguish largely rest. When he assumed control there were but 110 students; the curriculum was still narrow and pedantic; the freshmen were in bondage to the upper-class men, and they in turn to the faculty. President Dwight abolished the primary-school system, and established the school system, and between them and the faculty, such rules as are usually observed by gentlemen in social intercourse. He introduced the study of oratory into the curriculum, and himself gave lectures on rhetoric and composition. He also abolished the system of fines for petty offences. At his death the number of students had increased to 313. In politics he was a federalist of the Hamilton school, and he earnestly deprecated the introduction of French ideas into American life. His published works fill thirteen large octavo volumes, and his unpublished manuscripts would fill almost as many more. While he was a tutor in college, imprudence in the use of his eyes had so weakened them that he could use them neither for study nor writing, and he was afterward obliged to employ an amanuensis very frequently. His most ambitious work was his epic, "The Conquest of Canaan." A critic, writing in the "North American Review" (vii, 347), said its author had invented a medium between absolute barbarism and modern refinement. "There is little of distinctive, little that is truly oriental, about any of his persons or scenes . . . It is occasionally animated, and in description sometimes picturesque and poetical." His pastoral poem, "Greenfield Hill" (1794), in which was introduced a vivid description of the burning of the Greenfield church in 1779, was much more popular. In 1800 he revised Watts's Psalms, adding translations of his own, and a selection of hymns, both of which were adopted by the general assembly of the Presbyterian church. The best known of these is the version of the 137th Psalm, beginning, "I love the kingdom, Lord, the house of thine abode." His "Travels in New England and New York" (4 vols., New Haven, 1821; London, 1823) was pronounced by Robert Southey the most important of his works. His "Theology Explained and Defended in a Course of 173 Sermons" (5 vols., Middletown, Conn., 1818; London, 1819; new ed., with memoir by his son, Rev. Seroen E. Dwight, New York, 1846) has gone through a score of editions, and has been translated into one hundred and thirty languages abroad, and on it rests his reputation as a theologian. Besides these works and numerous discourses he published "America, a Poem" (1772); "The Genuineness and Authenticity of the New Testament" (1785); "Triumph of Inffdelity, a Satire" (1787); "Dispelling the Character in Washington" (1800); "Observations on Language" (1816); and "Essay on Light" (1816). See, besides, the memoir by his son, and the life in vol. xiv. of Sparks's "American Biography," by Rev. William S. Sprague. Dr. Dwight married, March 27, 1787, Mary, daughter of Benjamin Woolsey, of Long Island, who bore him eight sons. His brother, Theodore, journalist, b. in Northampton, Mass., 13 Dec., 1764; d. in New York city, 12 June, 1848, studied law in New Haven with his cousin, Judge Pierrpont Edwards, and began practice in Hartford in 1801. He never removed, but remained in that city, and became eminent in his profession. He at one time removed to New York to become the law partner of his cousin, Aaron Burr, but disagreed with the latter's political opinions and returned to Hartford, where he edited the "Courant" and the "Connecticut Mirror," the organ, in that state, of the Federal party, in which he had become prominent. He was also an active member of a club of young poets known as "the Hartford wits," and is said to have been a principal contributor to the "Political Echo," b. in the same year. He was elected a member of the celebrated "Hartford Convention" of 1814. In 1815 he removed to Albany and established the "Daily Advertiser," but relinquished it after two years, to found the New York "Daily Advertiser," a journal which he conducted until 1824, when he removed to Boston, and became a member of the celebrated "Hartford Convention" of 1814. In 1815 he returned to New York three years before his death. Mr. Dwight was a brilliant writer as well as able debater. Although he wrote too much and too rapidly for lasting fame, his political articles were bright and spicy, and his satirical and sketchy "New Year's Verses," in the "Mirror," were always looked for with eagerness. Mr. Dwight was a man of unflinching integrity and an outspoken opponent of slavery. In person he was tall and fine-looking. He published a "History of the Hartford Convention" (New York, 1855), and a "Character of Thomas Jefferson, as exhibited in his own Writings" (Boston, 1839). The latter is written with a strong Federal bias. An outline of this "Life and Writings" was published by the New York historical society (1846), and a speech on the character of Thomas Jefferson appeared subsequently under its auspices. His son, Theodore, author, b. in Hartford, Conn., 3 March, 1796; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 14 Oct., 1866, was graduated at Yale in 1814, and began to study theology with his uncle, President Dwight, but after some years study abroad in the United States and Europe for his health. He removed to Brooklyn in 1838, and engaged in various public and philanthropic enterprises, becoming a director of many religious and educational societies, and being active from 1830 to 1854 in multiplying and perfecting Sunday-schools. In 1854-5 he engaged with George Walter in a systematic effort to send free-soil settlers to Kansas, and it is estimated that, directly or indirectly, they induced 9,000 persons to go thither. Mr. Dwight was a prolific writer, and at various times edited, "The American Magazine," the "Family Visitor," the "Protestant Vindicater," the "Christian Alliance," the "Israelite Indeed," and the "New York Presbyterian," of which he was at one time chief editor and publisher. In his later years he was employed in the New York custom-house. Mr. Dwight was familiar with six or eight languages. At the time of his death, which was the result of a railroad accident, he was translating educational works into Spanish, for introduction into the Spanish-American countries. He published "A Tour in Italy in 1821" (New York, 1824); "New Gazzetteer of the United States," with William Darby (Hartford, 1833); "President Dwight's Decisions of Questions discussed by the Senior Class in Yale College in 1824," (New York, 1827); "A Visit to London, of Connecticut" and "The Northern Traveller" (1841); "Summer Tour of New England" (1847); "The Roman Republic of 1849" (1851); "The Kansas War; or, the Exploits of Chivalry in the 19th Century" (1858); and the "Autobiography of Gen. Garfield," in the "Harper's Monthly." He was also the author of numerous educational works. —Nathaniel, physician, another brother of President Dwight, b. in Northampton, Mass., 31 Jan., 1770; d. in Oswego, N. Y., 11 June, 1831, studied medicine in Hartford, Conn., and after practising there became a passenger surgeon in the U. S. Navy, and was stationed at Governor's Island, New York harbor. He afterward practised in Westfield, Mass., and New London and Wethersfield, Conn., but in 1812 entered the ministry, and was settled at Westchester, Conn., till 1820. He then resumed his medical profession, practising at Providence, R. I., and Norwich, Conn. Dr. Dwight was one of the first, probably the first, to propose the present system of retreats for the insane. As early as 1812, when dejected persons were still confined in cells, and exhibited like wild beasts, he proposed, in a communication to the Connecticut legislature, the establishment of "a hospital for lunatics." He prepared a school geography, the first published in this country, and was the author of "The Great Question Answered" and a "Compendious History of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence." —President Timothy Dwight's eldest son, Timothy, b. in Stratford, Conn., 29 March, 1778; d. 13 June, 1844, was for forty years a merchant in New Haven, and gave $5,000 to endow the "Dwight professorship of didactic theology" at Yale. —President Dwight's second son, Benjamin Woolsey, physician, b. in Northampton, Mass., 10 Feb., 1780; d. in Clinton, N. Y., 18 May, 1850, was fitted for college by his father and graduated at Yale in 1799. He studied medicine in Philadelphia under Dr. Rush and Dr. Physic, and practised in Catskill, N. Y., in 1805-1808. He returned to New York, and afterward started in Catskill. He retired to a farm in Clinton, N. Y., in 1831, and lived there till his death. He was treasurer of Hamilton college in 1861-50. Dr. Dwight published, in the "Memoirs of the Connecticut Historical Society," an article never published in this country on "Chronic Deblity of the Stomach," which was highly praised. and republished in England.—Benjamin Woolsey's "Benjamin Westbridge," educator, b. in New Haven, Conn., 5 April, 1818, was graduated at Hamilton college, Clinton, N. Y., in 1835, and at Yale theological seminary in 1838. He was tutor at Hamilton in 1839–42, founded the 1st Congregational church at Joliet, Ill., in 1844, but gave up pastoral work on account of ill health, and established a private school in Brooklyn, which he removed in 1858 to Clinton, N. Y., and in 1868 Mr. Dwight removed to New York city. In 1867 he returned to Clinton and devoted himself to literary work, having educated over 2,000 pupils. For five months in 1872 he was editor of the Chicago "Interior." He received the degree of Ph. D. from New York university in 1862. Dr. Dwight has contributed largely to the literature of education, theology, philology, and genealogy, and has published "Higher Christian Education" (New York, 1859); "Modern Philology" (2 vols., 1864); "History of the Strong Family" (2 vols., Albany, 1871); and "History of the Dwight Family" (2 vols., New York, 1874); and has ready for publication (1887) "Higher Culture of Woman" and "The True Value of Divine Preaching." Another of Benjamin Woolsey's, Theodore William, jurist, b. in Catskill, N. Y., 18 July, 1822, was graduated at Hamilton college, Clinton, N. Y., in 1840, and studied at Yale law-school in 1841–2. He was tutor at Hamilton in 1842–4, and in 1846–58 held there the chair of law, history, civil polity, and political economy. In connection with his professorship he also established a department of law, and in 1858 was elected professor of municipal law in Columbia college, New York. On the organization of Columbia law-school, he became its warden. Prof. Dwight has been one of the editors of the "New Englander" since 1856, and in 1870–1 published a series of articles in it on "The True Ideal of an American University," which was afterward issued separately, and attracted much attention. He was a member of the American committee for the revision of the English version of the Bible, from 1878 till its completion in 1885.—The elder President Dwight's fifth son, Sereno Edwards, educator, b. in Greenfield Hill, Conn., 18 May, 1786; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 30 Nov., 1850, was graduated at Yale in 1808, and after teaching in Pittsfield, Conn., and acting as his father's amanuensis, was tutor at Yale in 1806–10. He studied law at the same time, and practised in New Haven with success in 1810–18. In 1812, a dose of mercury, given him during a fever, caused a painful eruption, from which he suffered all his life. Deciding to become a clergyman, he was licensed to preach in 1816, and was chaplain of the U. S. senate in 1816–7. He was then ordained pastor of the Park street church, Boston, and continued there till 1828, when he resigned on account of failing health and returned to New Haven, where he engaged in literary work, and conducted, with his brother Henry, in 1828–31, the New Haven gymnasium, a boarding-school for boys. He was chosen president of Hamilton college, Clinton, N. Y., in 1833, but illness and pecuniary considerations forced him to resign in 1835. He was a member of the Pennsylvania colonization society in 1838, and in the same year removed to New York, where he spent his remaining years "among books by day, and in a lonely boarding-house by night," a prey to the distressing malady that finally ended his life. Yale gave him the degree of D. D. in 1852. Dr. Dwight published "Life of David Brainerd" (1822); "Life and Works of Jonathan Edwards," his great-grandfather (New York, 10 vols., 1830); "The Hebrew Wife," de-DYE, William M., soldier, b. in New York; d. in New York city, 21 May, 1868. He began his military career in the Mexican war, entering the army as a captain, and participating in the siege of Vera Cruz, the battles of National Bridge, Contreras, and Cerro Gordo, where he was severely wounded, and the capture of the city of Mexico. At the close of the war he was brevetted colonel for bravery and meritorious conduct, and on his return was elected register of the county of New York. During the civil war he served as lieutenant-colonel of the 79th regiment, and, afterward became its colonel. He was a candidate, in August, 1859, for the gold snuff-box in which the freedom of the city of New York had been officially given to Andrew Jackson forty years before. See Burnett, Ward Benjamin.

DYE, William M., soldier, b. in Pennsylvania about 1832. He was appointed from Ohio to the U. S. military academy, where he was graduated in 1853, served in the 8th infantry on frontier and garrison duty, was promoted 1st lieutenant in 1856, and captain, 14 May, 1861. After being employed eight lectures in New York and Philadelphia on his European experiences, and just before his death declined a professorship in the New York university. He published "Travels in the North of Germany" (New York, 1836).

DYER, John H., actor, b. in Ireland; d. in Albany, N. Y., 15 Dec., 1843. He was the son of an Irish gentleman who intended him for the law, but, disliking that profession, he made his first appearance, contrary to the wishes of his friends, at the Theatre royal, Dublin, and met with a success which confirmed him in his love for the stage. After playing in various provincial theatres he appeared at Drury Lane theatre, London, 1 May, 1802, as Belcenu in "The West Indian," with great approval, and was immediately engaged as the leading tragedian in the comic characters, and, suffering for this situation for three years, then gave it up, and in 1810 came to this country, where he made his first appearance at the Park theatre, New York, as Belcourn, meeting with great success. He made his last appearance on the stage at the National opera-house, on the corner of Broadway and Church streets, 30 May, 1830, in the character of Sir John Falstaff.

DYER, or DYE, Mary A., Quaker, d. in Boston, 1 June, 1660. She was the wife of William Dyer, who removed to Rhode Island in 1638. In September, 1639, of four persons ordered to depart from the jurisdiction, Peter and Jonathan, office of Massachusetts, on pain of death, Mrs. Dyer, who was a follower of Anne Hutchinson and had shared her exile, obeyed. In October she returned on purpose to offer up her life. She and others were arrested, sent to be shamed before the people, and sentenced to death. When the sentence was pronounced she exclaimed: "The will of the Lord be done," and returned to the prison "full of joy." Three were led forth to execution. Mary Dyer was reprieved; yet not till the rope had been fastened around her neck and she had prepared herself for death. Transported with enthusiasm, she exclaimed: "Let me suffer as my brethren unless you annul your wicked law." Her reprieve had been granted at the request of her son, and on condition that she should depart in forty-eight hours and should not return. Against her will she was again conveyed out of the colony, but returned, and was hanged on Boston common on the charge of "rebellious sedition and obstructing herself after banishment upon pain of death."
DYER, Alexander Brydle, soldier, b. in Richmond, Va., 10 Jan., 1815; d. in Washington, D.C., 30 May, 1866. He was graduated at the U. S. Military academy in 1837, served in garrison at Fort Monroe, Va., in the Florida war of 1837–8, and on ordnance duty at various arsenals in 1838–46, was chief of ordnance of the army invading New Mexico in 1846–8, during a part of which time he was on the head of the Rio de las Españas, and was engaged at Caney Creek, Texas, where he was wounded 4 Feb., 1847, and Santa Cruz de Rosales, Mexico, receiving for his services the brevets of 1st lieutenant and captain. He was afterward in command of North Carolina arsenal. At the beginning of the civil war Capt. Dy. was active in promoting the efficiency of the ordnance department. He invented the Dyer projectile for cannon. He was in command of the Springfield armory in 1861–4, and greatly extended the manufacture of small-arms for the army. In 1864, as chief of ordnance, U. S. army, he was placed in charge of the ordnance bureau in Washington, D.C., with the rank of brigadier-general, and he retained this office till his death. In March, 1865, he was brevetted major-general, U. S. army, for faithful, meritorious, and distinguished services.

DYER, Charles Gilford, artist, b. in Chicago in 1846. He was graduated at the U. S. naval academy, then in Newport, R. I., and saw some service in the civil war, but resigned his commission on account of impaired health, went to Europe, and studied art in Paris under Jacquotteau de Chenu. He entered the Royal academy at Munich in 1871, and has spent most of his professional life there and in Paris, with the exception of six winters in Rome, four summers in Venice, and prolonged working-tours in Egypt and Syria. Among his most important works is "The Last Mass," with Armenian Chapel," "On Lindon when the Sun was Low," "Venice at Birth of Day," "Morning on the Riva, Venice," "Historical Still-Life of the Seventeenth Century," and "Among the Domes of St. Mark's."

DYER, Edgar Volney, Abolitionist, b. in Clarendon, Vt., 12 June, 1808; d. at Lake View, near Chicago, 24 April, 1878. He was graduated at the medical department of Middlebury college in 1830, and began practice in Newark, N. J., in 1831, but removed in 1836 to Chicago, and soon became identified with its early development. He was successful in his practice and business adventures, retiring from the former in 1844, and becoming agent for the "underground railroad" in Chicago. One instance illustrates the courage of Dr. Dyer: In 1846 a fugitive from Kentucky was caught in Chicago by his master and an armed posse, bound tightly with ropes, and guarded while a man went for a blacksmith to rivet the manacles that were to be put upon him. Dr. Dyer, hearing of the arrest, went hurriedly to the mansion house and to the room where the victim was confined, burst open the door, cut the cords, and told the fugitive to go, which he did before his captors recovered from their surprise and bewilderment at such unexpected and summary proceedings. A bully, with brandishing Bowie-knife, rushed toward the doctor, and Dyer was chair of the committee of the committee for establishing the "National Era" at Washington, an organ of the Abolition party, established 7 Jan., 1847. Dr. Dyer had a genial nature, which manifested itself in ready wit and pleasant conversation, except when he chanced to come in contact with slavers, impostors, or hypocrites, for which he had a most profound contempt and abundant words to express his detestation. In recognition of Dr. Dyer's sterling integrity and the great service he had rendered the cause of anti-slavery, President Lincoln, who May, 1861, appointed him in 1865 judge of the mixed court at Sierra Leone, for the suppression of the slave trade, after which appointment he passed two years travelling in Europe.

DYER, David Patterson, lawyer, b. in Henrico county, Va., 12 Feb., 1839. He emigrated to Missouri in 1841, and was educated at the common schools and at St. Charles college, studied law at Bowling Green, and was admitted to the bar in March, 1859. He was elected district prosecuting attorney in 1860, and in 1862–5 was a member of the legislature. He recruited and commanded the 40th regiment of Missouri volunteer infantry during a part of the civil war, participated in the campaigns against Mobile in 1863, and in 1864 was chosen secretary of the state senate. He was a delegate to the Chicago national Republican convention in 1868, and in the same year was chosen from Missouri, serving on the committees on territories and agriculture, and was U. S. attorney for the eastern district of Missouri in 1873–6.

DYER, Eliphalet, jurist, b. in Windham, Conn., 29 Sept., 1821; d. there, 13 July, 1879. He was graduated at Yale in 1740, studied law, and was admitted to practice in 1746, after which he was town clerk and justice of the peace in Windham. He was many times member of the legislature between 1747 and 1792, and was the original promoter of the plan of a cutting colony in the valley of the Susquehanna. In 1753 he was a member of the committee to purchase the title to the land selected for the proposed colony at Wyoming, and in 1755 was agent to petition the general assembly in its behalf. The French and Indian wars interposed in favor of the French, and in August, 1755, Mr. Dyer was lieutenant-colonel of a regiment sent to reduce Crown Point. He was colonel of a regiment sent against Canada in 1758, and in 1792–94 was annually elected an assistant. As an active member of the Susquehanna land company, he was still in 1777 in England, but failed in his efforts to obtain confirmation from the crown of the title to the Wyoming region. On his return he became comptroller of the port of New London, and in September, 1755, he was the first of the commissioners sent to the stamped congress from Connecticut. Afterward, with a majority of the Connecticut assistants, he withdrew from the governor's house rather than assist in his taking the oath to carry out the provisions of the act. Col. Dyer was elected judge of the superior court in 1760, and held that office till 1768, serving during the last four years as chief justice. He was a delegate to the 1st Continental congress in 1774, and was re-elected to each succeeding congress, with the exception of those of 1770 and 1779. He became a member of the state committee of safety, and was chosen as brigadier-general of militia. Yale gave him the degree of D. D. in 1787. John Adams said of him: "Dyer is long-winded and roundabout, obscure and cloudy, very talkative and very tedious, yet an honest man; merely a wall." He published a pamphlet entitled "Remarks on Dr. Gale's Letter" (Philadelphia, 1769).
DYER, Heman, clergyman, b. in Shaftsbury, Vt., 24 Sept., 1810. He was graduated at Ken-yon College, 1833, having served himself by taking charge of the preparatory department, and afterward entered the Protestant Episcopal ministry. He taught in Pittsburg, Pa., in 1840-3, and then was made professor in the Western university of Pennsylvania there, becoming its president in 1844. In 1849 he retired from active work. He received the degree of D.D. from Trinity in 1843. Dr. Dyer has published "Voice of the Lord upon the Waters" (New York, 1870), and "Records of an Active Life," an autobiography (1889), and edited a series of evange-rical addresses. His daughter, Ili, author, b. in Ludlowville, N.Y., is the daughter of Arad Joy. She has been actively engaged in philanthropic work, and has contributed much to current literature. She has published "Henry and the Bird's Nest" (Philadelphia, 1853); "Thirty Days Abroad, or the Old World seen with Young Eyes" (New York, 1870); "Brev History of the Joy Family" (1876); "Records of the Dyer Family" (1884); and, with Marcia A. Hall, "Christmas at Fern Lodge" (1890). She has also edited her husband's works.

DYER, Sidney, clergyman, b. in Cambridge, N.Y., 11 Feb., 1814. He was chiefly self-taught, but studied for a time in the Amity street classical school in New York city. At an early age he was thrown upon his own exertions, and, after serving in the army in the Black Hawk war, became, in 1836, a student of theology. He was ordained as a Baptist clergyman in 1842, and shortly afterward served as a missionary among the Choctaws, soon becoming secretary of the Indian mission board in Louisville. He returned to Indianapolis in 1852, and in 1859 was called to Philadelphia as district secretary of the American Baptist publication society, which office he has since retained. Mr. Dyer has travelled extensively in the United States and Canada, and is a voluminous writer. His earlier poems, which appeared in various magazines, were collected into a volume entitled "Voices of Nature" (Louisville, 1850). He has also published, besides occasional sermons, "Psalm-ist for the use of Baptist Churches" (1854); "Songs and Ballads" (New York, 1857); "The Drunkard's Child" (Philadelphia, 1859); "Great Wonders in Little Things" (Philadelphia, 1871); "Black Diamonds" (1873); "Home and Abroad" (1874); "Hoofs and Claws" (1875); "Ocean Gardens and Palaces" (1877); "Emeldale Lyceum" (1879), and other works. He is also the author of several cantatas, including "Ruth" and "The Winter's Entertainments." Among his popular verses are "The Beautiful Ladder," "The Songs my Mother Sung," and "The Grave of Ben Bolt."—His daughter, Mattie, author, b. in New York city, 23 Nov., 1842, was educated at a female seminary in Indianapolis, Ind., and was afterward a teacher in the Lagoda female seminary. In 1860 she married James H. Britts, of Lagoda, Ind. She began to write for various literary journals at an early age, and has published "Edward Lee" (Philadelphia, 1865); "Harry Henderson" (1860); "Honest and Earn-est" (1881); "Boys and Girls of Deep Glen" (1882); "Better than Gold" (1885); "Earl Armstrong" (1885); "Cherry" in 1889 in the service of the American Sunday-school union, and afterward became secretary and general manager of the Evangelical-knowledge society. She became editor of "The Episcopcal Quarterly Review" in New York in 1854, and in 1862 declined the bishopric of Kansas. He was made a member of the board of missions in 1868, and in 1871 of its Indian and Freedman's committees. In 1875 he made a tour through Mexico with Bishop Lee, which resulted in the establishment of a bishopric there. In 1890 he was forced by failing health to retire from active work. He received the degree of D.D. from Trinity in 1843. Dr. Dyer has published "Voice of the Lord upon the Waters" (New York, 1870), and "Records of an Active Life," an autobiography (1889), and edited a series of evange-lical addresses. His daughter, Ili, author, b. in Ludlowville, N.Y., is the daughter of Arad Joy. She has been actively engaged in philanthropic work, and has contributed much to current literature. She has published "Henry and the Bird's Nest" (Philadelphia, 1853); "Thirty Days Abroad, or the Old World seen with Young Eyes" (New York, 1870); "Brief History of the Joy Family" (1876); "Records of the Dyer Family" (1884); and, with Marcia A. Hall, "Christmas at Fern Lodge" (1890). She has also edited her husband's works.

DYOTT, John, actor, b. in England in 1812; d. in New Rochelle, N.Y., 22 Nov., 1876. He early became a favorite at the Theatre royal, York, Eng-land, and made his first appearance in this country on 2 Sept., 1844, at the Park theatre, New York, playing Iago to the Othello of James R. Anderson, another English actor. For the next quarter of a century he did good work as leading man, chiefly in New York city, appearing there at the old Chamb-ers street theatre, the Broadway theatre, and Wal-lack's theatre in the same street. He was a fair Shakespearean scholar, and was known as a correct reader. Among his best-remembered parts are Iago and Sir Giles Overreach. About 1866 he re-tired from the stage and assisted his brother in editing a newspaper at New Rochelle, N.Y., suc-ceding to the chief editorial on the death of the latter. His wife was at one time a member of the Walack theatre company.

DZIEROWYNSKI, Francis, Jesuit, b. in Or-sani, Poland, in 1779; d. in Frederick, Md., in 1850. He entered the novitiate of the Society of Jesus in 1794. After his ordination he was made professor of theology in the University of Polotz, and continued there till 1820, when he was banished by the Russian government and came to the United States, where he landed in 1821. He was appointed superior of the Jesuits of the United States in 1828, and was active and successful in extending the influence of his order throughout the country. He founded, during his superiorship, the College of St. John in Frederick, Md., and gave great impetus to education in this and in other ways. On the expi-ration of his term in 1830, he was appointed prof-essor of theology in Georgetown College, and in 1834 he took charge of the Jesuit novitiate of Frederick. He was created provincial of the Jesu-its in 1840, and during his term of office founded the College of the Holy Cross, Worcester, Mass.
EADS, James Buchanan, engineer, b. in Lawrenceburg, Ind., 23 May, 1820; d. in Nassa, N. P., Bahama islands, 8 March, 1887. He early showed a great interest in machinery, and at the age of ten constructed models of saw-mills, for steam, steamboats, and other machines. In 1833 he settled in St. Louis, where, besides being variously employed, he acquired considerable knowledge of civil engineering and cognate subjects. He constructed a diving-bell boat in 1842 to recover the cargoes of sunken steamers, and soon afterward designed larger boats, with novel and powerful machinery, for pumping out the sand and water, and lifting the entire hull and cargo. Many valuable steamers were set afloat and restored to usefulness by his methods. He disposed of his interests in these inventions in 1845, and then established in St. Louis the first glass-works west of the Ohio river. In 1856 he made a proposition to congress to keep the channels of the Mississippi, Missouri, Ohio, and Arkansas rivers clear of snags, wrecks, and other obstructions for a term of ten years, but this offer was not accepted. In 1861 he was called to Washington and consulted by the president and his cabinet in relation to the practicability of using light iron-clad vessels on the Mississippi and its tributaries. Soon afterward he designed and constructed eight iron-clad steamers, fully equipped, within 100 days. These were employed in the capture of Fort Henry in February, 1862, a month earlier than the conflict between the "Merrimac" and "Monitor." Subsequently, in 1863, he constructed numerous other iron-clads and mortarmboats, which proved of great value in the campaigns of Grant and in the capture of Mobile by Farragut. From 1867 till 1874 he was engaged in the construction of the steel arch bridge across the Mississippi at St. Louis. The central arch of this bridge has a clear span of 520 feet, and has been pronounced the finest specimen of metal arch construction in the world. This structure ranks among the noted bridges of the world. On the completion of this enterprise, Mr. Eads turned his attention to the deepening of the Mississippi by means of jetties. His plans, which were strongly opposed by the chief engineers of the U. S. army, to whom the government naturally looked for advice, were submitted to congress, and finally a bill was passed granting him permission to attempt the improvement of the South Pass. Four years after he began work the U. S. inspecting officer reported that the maximum depth proposed had been secured throughout the jetty. This was a great triumph for Mr. Eads, as it was a practical demonstration of his theories. Subsequently he outlined one of the grandest plans that hydraulic engineermanded the frigate "Santee," of the Gulf blockading squadron, and during his service a boat-expedition from that vessel captured and destroyed the privateer "Royal Yacht," in the harbor of Galveston, Texas. He was promoted "posthumously" and on 1 Jan., 1865, was placed on the retired list. In 1864 and 1865 he was engaged as prize commissioner, and in that year became light-house inspector, which office he held for one year.

EAKIN, Samuel, clergyman, b. about 1742; d. in the town of Middletown, Conn., 1829. He was a graduate of Yale in 1768 and ordained by the Second presbytery of Philadelphia in 1770. From 1773 till 1777 he had charge of Penn's Neck Presbyterian church in West Jersey; but, as most of the parishioners were Tories, he was obliged to withdraw on account of his zeal for American liberty. He was the idol of the soldiers, and whenever there was a military drill, or an order for a march, he was present, and by his fervor excited the patriotism of the troops to the highest degree. It is said that he never entered the pulpit without imploring the Lord "to teach our people how to fight, and give them fresh courage and perseverance to overcome their enemies." He was said to be the most eloquent preacher, after Whitefield, that had ever been in this country.

Eames, Thomas, artist, b. in Philadelphia, 25 July, 1844. He was graduated at the high school of Philadelphia, and went to Paris, where he received his art education at L'École des beaux arts under Gérôme. He also studied in the atelier of Bonnat, and with the sculptor Dumont. As an artist he was a native of Philadelphia, was appointed demonstrator of anatomy, and afterward professor of painting and director of the Pennsylvania academy of fine arts. For several years he was teacher in the Brooklyn art guild, and lecturer on anatomy and perspective in the art student's league of New York. For is now professor in the art-student league of Philadelphia. He has painted many small pictures of domestic life in the early days of America, of American sporting and athletic games, studies of the American negroes, etc., which have been exhibited in the Paris salons, the National academies of Portici, Rome, and the American art association, and elsewhere. Among his noted pictures are "Dr. Gross in his Clinic"; "William Rush carving an Allegorical Figure"; "A Lady Singing"; "The Chess-Players"; "Mendicant Writing on a Stone"; and "The Zither-Player." He sent "The Chess-Players," several portraits in oil, and the water-colors "Whistling for Plover" and "Base-Ball" to the Centennial exhibition in 1876.

EAMES, Charles, lawyer, b. in New Braintree, Mass., 20 March, 1812; d. in Boston, Mass., 28 March, 1887. He was prepared for college at Leicerster academy, was graduated at Harvard in 1831, and studied law in the Cambridge law-school, and with John Duer in New York. But ill health prevented him from practising his profession, and in 1843 he accepted an office in the navy department in Washington. A few months later he became associate editor of the Washington "Union," and was appointed by President Polk to be commissioner to the Sandwich islands to negotiate a treaty. In 1850 he returned and edited the Nashville "Union" for six months, after which he again held charge of the Washington "Union." After several years of journalism he was appointed minister to Venezuela by President Pierce, and remained there until 1857, when he resigned and returned to Washington, where he practised his profession until his death. During the last five years of his life he attained a high reputation as an admiralty lawyer and for his knowledge of international law. He was a fine linguist and scholar, and possessed remarkable conversational power.

EAMES, Benjamin, author, b. in Wellington (now Dighton), Mass., 21 Jan., 1816. She is a sister of the late Henry B. Anthony, and was graduated at the young ladies' high school in Providence, R. I. In 1838 she married the Rev. James II. Eames, who was for many years rector of the Protestant church in Boston, and died in 1877. She has travelled extensively in Europe and the east, and has published "A Budget of Letters" (Boston, 1844); "My Mother's Jewel" (New York, 1850); "The Christmas Gift" (1851); "Sarah Barry" (1852); "Home" (1853); "Another Mango" (Boston, 1856), and "The Budget Closed" (1864); and has compiled memoirs of her father, Hezekiah Anthony (1856), and of the Rev. Dr. Eames (1878).

EARL, Parker, horticulturist, b. in Mt. Holly, Vt., in 1851. He is one of the largest practical horticulturists in the country. He has been for a number of years head of the horticultural department of the International exposition at New Orleans in 1885, has been president of the Illinois state horticultural society, and is now president of the Mississippi valley and the American horticultural societies. He has contributed frequently to the columns of standard agricultural periodicals.

EARLE, Pliny, inventor, b. in Leicester, Mass., 17 Dec., 1762; d. there, 19 Nov., 1832. He was a descendant of Ralph Earle, who, with nineteen others, settled in the New World in 1638, for a charter to form themselves into a body-politic of Rhode Island. In 1783 he became connected with Edmund Snow in the manufacture of hand-cards for carding cotton and wool, and in 1786 he established himself in the business. Among the many obscurities encountered by Samuel Slater in the introduction into the United States of the manufacture of cotton by machinery was the difficulty of procuring card-clothing for his machines. After unsuccessful applications to several other persons, he went, in 1796, to Mr. Earle, who, although engaged in the manufacture of cloth, agreed to make the cards. He succeeded, but to achieve that success he was obliged to prick the holes for the teeth with two needles fastened in a handle. This led him to the invention of the machine for pricking the so-called "cards," by which the labor of a man for fifteen hours could be performed in as many minutes. This machine was in general use for years, until it was superseded by the machine that both pricks the leather and sets the teeth. He was a member of the Society of Friends, and, apart from his inventive genius, made extensive attainments in science and literature.

His second son, Thomas, lawyer, b. in Leicester, Mass., 21 April, 1796; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 14 July, 1849, was educated at Leicerster academy. In 1817 he removed to Philadelphia, where he engaged in mercantile pursuits. He subsequently studied law and practised his profession. He became distinguished also as a journalist, editing in succession the "Columbian Observer," "Standard," "Pennsylvanian," and "Mechanics' Free Press and Reform Advocate." In 1837 he took an active part in the Constitutional convention of Pennsylvania, of which he was a prominent member, and it is supposed that he made the original draft of the new constitution. He lost his popularity with the Democratic party by advocating the extension of the right of suffrage to negroes. He was the candidate of the liberty party for vice-president in 1840, but the nomination was repudiated by the abolitionists, who, at the last minute, substituted an anti-slavery candidate in the Republican party. Mr. Earle subsequently took little part in political affairs. He devoted his time principally to literary work, and published an "Essay on Penal Law"; an "Essay on the Rights of States to Alter and to Annul their Constitutions"; an "Essay on Railroads and Internal Communications" (1830); and a "Life of Benjamin Lundy." At the time of his death he was engaged in the translation of Sismondi's "Italian Republics," and in the compilation of a "Grammar of the Italian and French Languages"—Another son, Philip, physician, b. in Leicester, Mass., 31 Dec., 1809. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1837, then studied in the hospitals of Paris, and visited institutions for the insane in European countries. In 1840 he became resident physician of the asylum for the insane at Frankford, Pa., where he remained two years. From April, 1844, till April, 1849, he was physician to Bloomingdale asylum, New York. He immediately afterward visited insane hospitals in Europe. In 1853 he was appointed visiting physician to the New York City lunatic asylum. In 1854 he delivered a course of lectures on mental disorders at the College of physicians and surgeons, New York. In 1863 he became professor of materia medica and philosophy at Berkshire medical institute in Pittsfield, Mass., the first professorship of mental diseases ever established by a medical college in the United States. His lectures there were limited to the one course of 1864, owing to his appointment as superintendent and physician-in-chief of the state hospital for the insane in Northampton, Mass., a position which he retained from October, 1885. In 1871 he visited forty-six institutions for the insane in Europe. Dr. Earle was, so far as known, the first person that ever addressed an audience of the insane in any other than a religious discourse. His introduction of lectures on natural philosophy at the Frankford asylum, in the winter of 1840-41, was the initiative to a system of combined instruction and entertainment, which has been widely adopted, and is now considered essential to the highest perfection of an institution for the insane. In the winter of 1864-65, in Northampton, Mass., he delivered a course of lectures on insanity before audiences in which the average number of insane persons was about 250. His annual reports during the last ten years of his superintendency at Northampton hospital contain a series of articles on the curability of insanity, which have been published in book-form, entitled "The Curability of Insanity: a Series of Studies" (Philadelphia, 1887). Dr. Earle was one of the founders of the American medical association, the New York academy of medicine, the Association of medical superintendents of American institutions for the insane, and the New England psychological society, and has been president of the last named. He has published "A Visit to Thirteen Asylums for the Insane in Europe" (Philadelphia, 1849); "The Insane in the Asylums," New York, 1848; "Institution for the Insane in Prussia, Germany, and Austria" (New York, 1853); and "An Examination of the Practice of Blood-Letting in Mental Disorders" (New York, 1854), besides frequent contributions to medical periodical literature. He has published "Marathon and other Poems" (Philadelphia, 1841).

EARLE, Ralph, artist, b. in Leicester, Mass., 11 May, 1761; d. in Bolton, Conn., 16 Aug., 1891.

He was a descendant of Ralph Earle, an early settler of Leicester, and his father, Ralph, held a commission as captain in the Revolutionary War. He had no collegiate education, but painted portraits in Connecticut in 1775. Soon after peace was declared he went to England, studied his art under the instruction of Benjamin West, and was the first American artist to obtain an European reputation. He returned to the United States in 1786 and continued to pursue his profession in different parts of Massachusetts, New York, and Connecticut. Among his works are two portraits of Dr. Dwight (1777); four historical paintings, believed to be the first of that class ever executed by an American artist—"The Battle of Lexington," "A View of Concord," "The Battle of North Bridge, Concord," and "A View of the South Part of Lexington." These were engraved and published by Amos Doolittle, of New Haven, Conn. Mr. Earle also painted portraits in England and America of landscapes, and a "Niagara Falls," which was exhibited in all parts of the country and subsequently in London.—His brother, James, artist, b. in Leicester, Mass., 1 May, 1761; d. in Charleston, S. C., 7 Sept., 1796, had no collegiate education, and little is known of his early life. He was the father of the famous Miss Pilkington Smyth, mother of Admiral William Henry Smyth. He painted portraits in Charleston, S. C., and died suddenly of yellow fever when he was preparing to return to England.—His son, Augustus, artist, b. in 1793, was admitted as a student in the Royal academy, London, in 1807, and some of his pictures were in two of the public exhibitions prior to that date. He had an insatiable love of adventure, and was known as the "wandering artist." From 1815 till 1832 he travelled extensively throughout Asia, Australia, New Zealand, and the East Indies. In Madras he painted portraits and executed original drawings, which he afterward arranged for a panorama, and exhibited. His health failing, he returned to England. When in New York, he spent most of his time with Thomas Baring, of Emmaus, the well-known painter of miniatures. He visited all parts of the Mediterranean, travelled in Africa, and finally sailed on a four-years' voyage of discovery, from which he never returned. "A Narrative of a Nine-Months' Residence in New Zealand and Australia, with a Visit of Residence in Tristan d'Acunha," was published by Augustus Earle, draughtsman to his Majesty's ship "The Beagle" (London, 1832).—Ralph's son, Ralph, artist, d. in New Orleans, La., studied in London in 1808-10, and after his return to the United States married a niece of Andrew Jackson, and painted a full-length portrait of the general.

EARLY, John, M. E. bishop, b. in Bedford county, Va., in 1755; d. in Lynchburg, Va., 5 Nov., 1875. He joined the Methodist conference of his state in the great revival of 1801-2, and became an itinerant preacher about 1807. He soon attracted attention by his fervor and eloquence, and was specially successful in conducting religious exercises in a revival. He successively filled the offices of secretary of the conference and presiding elder, and was the leader of the biennial general conference. In the agitation that resulted, in 1844, in the division of his denomination into the Methodist church north and south, Mr. Early took an active part, and was elected the first book-agent of the latter. Though sixty-nine years of age, he was elected by the first annual conference held in the South and served his church with great zeal and fidelity for nineteen years. He was largely instrumental in founding Randolph-Macon college, Va. Bishop

VOL. II.—19
Early, though a vigorous writer, published only a few sermons, addresses, and occasional pamphlets, some of them relating to the dispute controversy. He received the degree of D.D.

EARLY. John, clergyman, b. in the County Fermanagh, Ireland, in 1814; d. in Georgetown, D. C., in 1874. He came to the United States when eighteen years of age, and entered St. Mary's college, Emmetburg, Md., as a student, finished his studies in Georgetown college, and in 1844 entered the Society of Jesus. He was ordained priest in 1844, and, after passing some time in Georgetown college as professor of belles-lettres, was sent to Philadelphia on his first mission. He was next appointed president of Worcester college, Mass., where he remained several years. In 1852 he went to Baltimore and built the fine college and church of St. Ignatius. Subsequently he was transferred to the presidency of Georgetown college. During the civil war he converted the college and its grounds into a hospital and camp for National soldiers, but without a day's interruption of the course of study.

EARLY, Jubal Anderson, soldier, b. in Franklin county, Va., 3 Nov. 1816. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1837, appointed a lieut. in the 2nd U. S. infantry; served in his green years at Fort Monroe, Va. He served in the Florida war in 1837–8, resigned from the army in July, 1838, and began the practice of law in Virginia. He served in the legislature in 1841–2, and was commonwealth attorney in 1842–7, and again in 1849–52. During the Mexican war he was major of a regiment of Virginia volunteers, serving from January, 1847, till August, 1848, was acting governor of Monterey in May and June, 1847, and after the disbanding of the army returned to the practice of law. At the beginning of the civil war he entered the Confederate service as a colonel, commanded a brigade at Bull Run, and in the battle of Williamsburg, 5 May, 1862, was supposed to be mortally wounded. He was promoted brigadier-general, and in May, 1863, commanded the division that held Fredericksburg while Lee was fighting the battle of Chancellorsville. He also commanded a division at Gettysburg. In 1864 he was ordered to the valley of the Shenandoah, where his operations were at first successful. In July he crossed the Potomac, gained the battle of Monocacy, and threatened Washington, but was obliged to retreat. Toward the end of the month a portion of his cavalry advanced into Pennsylvania as far as Chambersburg, which, by his orders, was burned. He was afterward, 19 Sept., defeated by Sheridan on the Opequan, and again at Fisher's Hill three days later. On 19 Oct., Gen. Early surprised the National forces at Cedar Creek in the absence of Gen. Sheridan; but the latter, having arrived in the afternoon, rallied his army and gained a decisive victory. Gen. Early losing the greater part of his artillery and trains.

In March, 1865, he was totally routed by Gen. Cust EASTBURN. James Wallis, clergyman, b. in London, England, 26 Sept. 1797: d. at sea, 2 Dec. 1819. His father and family came to the United States in 1803. The son was graduated at Columbia in 1818, and afterward studied theology at the Church of St. George's, Accomac co., Va. After less than a year's ministry his health failed, and in November, 1819, accompanied by his mother and brother, afterward bishop of Massachusetts, he sailed for Vera Cruz. He died on the fourth day out, and was buried at sea. Mr. Eastburn wrote several of the poems, some of which are very graceful, and published, in conjunction with Robert C. Sands, "Yamovden," a romantic poem, founded on the history of King Philip, the saviour of the Wampum, 1818.—His brother, Manton, P. E. bishop, b. in Leeds, England, 9 Feb. 1801; d. in Boston, Mass., 11 Sept., 1872, was brought to the United States in infancy. He was graduated at Columbia in 1817, studied theology in the General Protestant Episcopal theological seminary, and was consecrated assistant bishop of the diocese of Massachusetts, then embarking on a voyage to Ireland, Rhode Island, and two months later, on the death of the venerable Bishop Griswold, became bishop.

EASTMAN, Charles Gamage, poet, b. in Fryeburg, Me., 1 June, 1816; d. in Burlington, Vt., in 1861. He early went with his parents to Barnard, Vt., was educated at Royalton academy, Windsor, and at Burlington, and was graduated at the University of Vermont in 1837. While a student he wrote editorials for the Burlington Sentinel. He founded the "Lamoille River Express" at Johnson, Vt., in 1838, established the "Spirit of the Age" at Woodstock, Vt., in 1840, and purchased the "Vermont Patriot" and removed to Montpelier in 1846. He was postmaster at Woodstock and Montpelier for several years, and a member of the state senate in 1851-2. He published a volume of poems delineating the rural life of New England, marked by a high degree of metrical finish (Montpelier, 1848), was a contributor to poetry reviews and magazines, and read poems at the University of Vermont and at Dartmouth and other colleges.

EASTMAN, Harvey Gridley, educator, b. in Marshall, Oneida co., N. Y., 16 Nov., 1832; d. in Denver, Col., 13 July, 1878. He opened a commercial school in St. Louis in 1854, and four years later the Eastman national business college at Poughkeepsie, N. Y. Beginning with one pupil, the college in a short time included 1,600 students, occupied five large buildings, and employed more than sixty instructors. In 1871, and again in 1873, Mr. Eastman was elected to the New York assembly, and he also served three terms as mayor of Poughkeepsie. Many public improvements in that city were due to his energy and liberality.

EASTMAN, John Robie, astronomer, b. in Andover, N. H., 29 July, 1831. He was graduated at the Chandler scientific department of Dartmouth in 1852, and in 1877 received the degree of Ph. D. from that college. In February, 1865, he was appointed professor of mathematics in the U. S. navy, with the relative rank of commander, and assigned to astronomical work at the observatory in Washington. He has accompanied various astronomical expeditions throughout the United States, and in 1870 was sent to Syracuse, Sicily, to observe the total eclipse of the sun that took place on 22 Dec. of that year. Besides being a member of various scientific societies, he has since 1879 been a fellow of the American association for the advancement of science, and was its general secretary in 1883. The results of his astronomical investigations have appeared in the yearly volumes of the U. S. navy, a series which from 1872 till 1882 were edited by him.

EASTMAN, Julia Arabelia, author, b. in Rut-ton, N. Y., 17 July, 1837. She became a successful teacher, and, with her sister, Sarah, opened in 1880 the Dana Hall preparatory school for students encouraging Wellesley and other institutions, and wrote story-books, among them "Short Comings and Long Goings" (Boston, 1889); "Beulah Romney" (1871); and "Young Rick" (1875); also many articles and short poems in newspapers.

EASTMAN, Macarthur Eastman, capitalist, b. in Gilmanton, N. H., 5 June, 1818; d. in Manchester, N. H., 3 Sept., 1877. While engaged in the manufacture of woollen goods at Roxbury, Mass., he acquired an interest in a patent spinning-jenny, which he introduced into England, and in 1856, after the beginning of the Crimean war, he secured the patent of a breech-loading cannon and sold it to the British government. At the begining of the civil war he contracted for the manufacture of a large number of carbines, and subsequently furnished fire-arms to the United States and foreign governments. When he died he was in charge of the direct ocean cable, an enterprise which required a capital of $6,500,000 in gold, and which was met from the first by a powerful corporate opposition. He secured the needed legislation after nearly five years of effort, and the cable was laid, the American end being laid at New London, Conn., in July, 1874.

EASTMAN, Orman, clergyman, b. in Amherst, Mass., 27 March, 1795; d. in New York city, 24 April, 1874. He was graduated at Yale in 1814. After completing his theological studies at Andover in 1824, he was for a year an agent of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions, and then entered the service of the American tract society in Boston, where he remained from 1825 to 1828. In the latter year he was transferred to New York, first as general agent for the Mississippi valley, and from 1834 as finance secretary, which office he continued to fill till he died in Rochester in 1870.

EASTMAN, Philip, jurist, b. in Chatham, N. H., in February, 1799; d. in Saco, Me., 7 Aug., 1840. He was graduated at Bowdoin in 1820, studied law, and was admitted to the bar at Paris, Me., in 1825. He practised law at North Yarmouth, Me., in 1827-31; at Harrison, Me., in 1836-47; and at Saco in 1847-69. He was a member of the Maine senate in 1840-2, a commissioner to locate the claims of settlers on the northeastern boundary of Maine under the Washington treaty in 1842-3, and for five years subsequently commissioner for Cumberland county. He published "General Statutes of Maine," as chairman of a legislative committee for that purpose (1849), and a digest of the first twenty-six volumes of the "Maine Law Reports" (1849).

EASTMAN, Sanford, physician, b. in Lodi, Seneca co., N. Y., 11 Nov., 1831. He was graduated at Amherst in 1851, spent a few years in teaching and agricultural pursuits, then studied medi-ecine, and was graduated from the medical department of the University of Buffalo in February, 1861. He began practice in Utica, N. Y., in 1858 appointed to the professorship of anatomy in the university, to which was added in 1867 that of clinical surgery, which position he resigned in 1870. He was health-officer of the city in 1861-7, and in 1871 a member of the Board of state charities. Later in the same year he removed to California.
EASTMAN, Seth, soldier, b. in Brunswick, Me., 24 Jan., 1808; d. in Washington, D. C., 31 Aug., 1875. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1828 and assigned to the infantry. After frontier and toposiographical duty he was assistant teacher of drawing at West Point from 1833 to 1840, served in the Florida war in 1840-1, and afterward on the western frontier. From 1850 to 1855 he was employed in the bureau of the com- missions of Indian affairs and the national work on the "History, Condition, and Future Prospects of the Indian Tribes of the United States" (Washington, 1850-7). He then returned to the frontier. He was retired with the rank of lieutenant-colonel on 3 Dec., 1863, on account of disability from exposure in the line of duty, and on 9 Aug., 1866, was brevetted brigadier-general. Gen. Eastman was elected a member of the National academy of design in 1838. He was the author of a "Treatise on Topographical Drawing" (1867).—His wife, Mary Henderson, author, b. in Warren, Pa., 1818, married Capt. Eastman in 1835, and resided with him for many years at Fort Snelling, Minn., and at other frontier stations. Her portrayal of Indian life is the fruit of long observation and familiarity with the Indian character. She has published "Desecah, or Life and Legends of the Sioux" (New York, 1849); "Romance of Indian Life" (Philadelphia, 1852); "Aunt Phillis's Cabin," a reply to Mrs. Stowe's "Uncle Tom's Cabin" (1852); "American Aboriginal Portfolio," illustrated by her husband (1853); and "Robbers and Other Regions of the Conquerors and the Conquered" (1854); "Tales of Fashionable Life" (1856); and numerous stories and sketches in magazines.—Their son, Robert Langdon, b. in Maryland about 1840; d. in Washington, D. C., 9 Nov., 1863. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in May, 1863 and, being ordered at once to the seat of war, was engaged in the battle of Bull Run. From that time he was on duty with the Army of the Potomac, rising to the grade of captain, till he was prostrated by disease contracted in the service. After the battle of Antietam he was sent to Walt Point, and, though suffering from illness, performed the duty of assistant professor of drawing and of ethics until it was impossible for him to continue.

EASTON, James, soldier, b. in Hartford, Conn.; d. in Pittsfield, Mass., 25 July, 1872; d. in Warren, Me., 24 Mar., 1888. He was graduated at Harvard in 1863, and while pursuing theological studies officiated for two or three years in Christ church, Boston, as lay reader. In 1865 he went to New York, and in July of that year was admitted to orders by Bishop Benjamin Moore in Trinity church. He returned to New England soon afterward, and entered zealously upon clerical duties in connection with Christ church, Boston. This position he resigned in 1829, owing to continued weakness of voice, and engaged in the free church city mission with gratifying success. In 1837 he was connected with St. Mary's school, Burlington, N. J., and labored there for four years. Thence he returned to Boston, where he occupied himself in various church works. He also accepted the charge of Trinity church, Bridgewater, where he held at the time of his death. He received the degree of D. D. from Dartmouth college in 1828. Dr. Eaton's principal publication was a "History of Christ Church, Boston" (1829).

EATON, Cyrus, educator, b. in Framingham, Mass., 11 Feb., 1784; d. in Warren, Me., 21 Jan., 1875. He was a son of Benjamin Eaton, a Revolutionary soldier. He received a common-school education, studied the classics by himself, and removed in 1804 to Warren, Me., where he was for forty years a teacher. He served for thirteen years as town clerk, and was five years in the Massachusetts legislature. He wrote "Annals of Warren" (1851); "Woman," a poem (1856); "History of Thomaston, Me." (2 vols., Hallowell, Me., 1865).
became the partner of Judge William Kent. He was for several years chairman of the committee on political reform in the Union League club. Mr. Eaton was graduated at the University of Virginia in 1870–71, giving particular attention to the status and probable development of the civil service of various countries. After his return President Grant appointed him a member of the civil service commission, and he held the place of chairman till the close of the Tariff of 1878, when Mr. Eaton resigned to make an appropriation for its support. He visited Europe in 1875; and in 1877, at President Hayes's request, went to England to secure material for a historical report upon the British civil service. He was the first of the commissioners appointed by President Arthur under the act of 1888 re-establishing the civil service commission, resigned on 28 July, 1885, but was reappointed by President Cleveland, 5 Nov., and resigned in April, 1886. Mr. Eaton has been prominent in the civil service reform movement in the United States. The first society for promoting it was formed at his residence in 1878, and he has contributed largely on the subject to periodical literature. Mr. Eaton delivered the annual address before the Yale law-school in 1883. He drafted the law for creating a metropolitan board of health in 1882; and that establishing the present New York police courts; and also the national civil service act of 1883. Mr. Eaton has received the degree of LL.D. from the University of Vermont, and he has published "The Independent Movement in New York" (New York, 1880), co-written with Edward B. and edited Kent's "Commentaries" with Judge William Kent (1851–2), and "Chipman on Contracts Payable in Specific Articles" (1852).

Eaton, Edward Dwight, educator, b. in Lancaster, Wis., 12 Jan., 1851. He was graduated at Beloit college, Wis., in 1870, and studied at the divinity school in 1873, and studied in the universities of Leipzig and Heidelberg, Germany, in 1875–76. He was pastor of Congregational churches in Newton, Iowa, in 1876–78, and in Oak Park, Ill., in 1880–81, and on 29 Jan. of the latter year was elected president of Beloit college.

Eaton, George Washington, clergyman, b. in Henderson, Huntington co., Pa., 3 July, 1804; d. in Hamilton, Madison co., N.Y., 3 Aug., 1872. He was graduated from Union college in 1829, and from the Western Theological Seminary in 1831. He was ordained in the Presbyterian church in 1831, and in 1832 took orders in the Episcopal church. He taught in Georgetown college, Kentucky, as professor for six months. He was professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in Hamilton literary and theological institution, Hamilton, N.Y., and in 1837–90 filled the chair of ecclesiastical and civil history there. After the incorporation of the institution as Madison university Dr. Eaton was its president from 1850 till 1861, and at the same time professor of systematic theology. He was also professor for some years of intellectual and moral philosophy. From 1861 till 1871 he was president and chancellor of Marietta college, and professor of homiletics. He received the honorary degrees of D.D. and LL.D. Dr. Eaton was early ordained to the Baptist ministry, and was a strikingly original and eloquent preacher. His brother, Joseph Haywood, educator, b. in Berlin, Delaware co., Ohio, 22 Dec., 1815; was ordained in the Baptist church in 1835; in Murfreesboro, Tenn., 12 Jan., 1859, was graduated at Hamilton literary and theological institution in 1837. He was elected to a professorship in Union university, Murfreesboro, Tenn., in 1841, and in 1847 became its president, continuing in that relation till his death. He was ordained to the Baptist ministry in 1848, and was a preacher of uncommon ability. He had received the honorary degree of LL.D.—Joseph Haywood's son, Thomas Treadwell, clergyman, b. in Murfreesboro, Tenn., 16 Nov., 1845, was graduated at the University of Virginia in 1870–73, giving particular attention to the status and probable development of the civil service of various countries. After his return President Grant appointed him a member of the civil service commission, and he held the place of chairman till the close of the Tariff of 1878, when Mr. Eaton resigned to make an appropriation for its support. He visited Europe in 1875; and in 1877, at President Hayes's request, went to England to secure material for a historical report upon the British civil service. He was the first of the commissioners appointed by President Arthur under the act of 1888 re-establishing the civil service commission, resigned on 28 July, 1885, but was reappointed by President Cleveland, 5 Nov., and resigned in April, 1886. Mr. Eaton has received the degree of LL.D. from the University of Vermont, and he has published "The Independent Movement in New York" (New York, 1880), co-written with Edward B. and edited Kent's "Commentaries" with Judge William Kent (1851–2), and "Chipman on Contracts Payable in Specific Articles" (1852).

Eaton, John, educator, b. in Sutton, N.H., 5 Dec., 1829. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1854, was principal of a school in Cleveland, Ohio, in 1854–7, and superintendent of schools in Polkville in 1856–59. He then resigned, studied for the ministry at the Andover theological seminary, and was ordained by the presbytery of Maumee, Ohio, on 5 Sept., 1861. Meanwhile, in August, he had been commissioned chaplain of the 73d Ohio volunteers, was made brigade sanitary inspector, and in November, 1862, was appointed by Gen. Grant superintendent of contrabands. A month later he became general superintendent of freedmen for Mississippi, Arkansas, West Tennessee, and North Alabama as such, he served until May, 1865. He was commissioned colonel of the 68th U.S. colored infantry on 2 Oct., 1863, and received the brevet of brigadier-general of volunteers in March, 1865. Subsequently he was appointed assistant commissioner of the bureau of refugees, freedmen, and abandoned lands, and after thoroughly organizing the bureau resigned to edit the "Memphis Post," where he continued from 1866 till 1870, serving as state superintendent of public instruction in 1867–9. He was appointed U. S. commissioner of education in March, 1870, and remained in that capacity till 1883, when he resigned to accept the presidency of Marietta college. The bureau of education at the time of his appointment had but two clerks, not over a hundred volumes belonging to it, and no museum of educational illustrations and appliances; but when he resigned there were more than 600,000 volumes in the library including 18,000 volumes and 47,000 pamphlets. Gen. Eaton represented the department of the interior at the Centennial exhibition held in Philadelphia in 1876, he was chief of the department of education for the New Orleans exposition and organized that vast exhibition, was president of the International congress of education held there, and vice-president of the International congress of education held in Havre, France. He received the degree of Ph. D. from Rutgers in 1872, and that of LL. D. from Dartmouth in 1876. Gen. Eaton is a member of many learned associations, and has published numerous addresses and reports on education and the public affairs with which he was connected.

EATON, John Henry, politician, b. in Tennessee in 1799; d. in Washington, D. C., 17 Nov., 1856. He received a thorough education, studied law, and was admitted to the bar, beginning to practise in Nashville, Tenn. He was elected to the U. S. senate as a Democrat, and served till his resignation in 1829. He was a personal friend of Andrew Jackson, and was appointed by him secretary of war, holding the office from 1829 till 1831. Three years later he was made governor of the territory of Florida, and held the office till 1836, when he was appointed U. S. minister to Mexico, remaining there till 1840. He published "Life of Andrew Jackson" (Philadelphia, 1824).—His wife, Margaret L. O'Nell, b. in 1796; d. in Washington, D. C., 8 Nov., 1857, was the daughter of William O'Nell, an Irish immigrant, who settled in Washington before the death of her first husband, John B. Timberlake, a pursuer in the U. S. navy, she married Mr. Eaton in 1828. She possessed great beauty and fascination of manner, united to a persistent will and high ambition. The appointment of Mr. Eaton to the cabinet gave her a social position that she had long desired, but, owing to reports unfavorable to her reputation, she was refused recognition on equal terms by the families of the other members of the cabinet. The feud in society caused by this involved the president, who warmly supported his "little friend Peg," as he so often called her, and caused the estrangement between President Jackson and Vice-President Calhoun to begin, and a belief was awakened in the mind of the former that the latter had shrewdly fomented the general excitement, and it was said took an active part in promoting the crisis. Finally the president demanded of his secretaries the recognition of the social status of Mrs. Eaton, and was refused by all of them excepting Mr. Van Buren. As a compromise it was suggested that her public status should be concealed, while she should act as she chose in regard to private recognition. Gen. Jackson wrote a very plain-spoken note on the subject to Vice-President Calhoun, but only elicited from him the diplomatic reply that it was a "ladies quarrel," with which men could not successfully interfere, adding that "the laws of the ladies were like the laws of the Medes and Persians, and admitted neither of argument nor of amendment." The quarrel culminated in a general disruption of the cabinet in 1831. Mrs. Eaton was said to have shone with brilliancy in the court of Isabella in Spain, and was a social favorite in Paris and London. In 1840 she returned to Washington, where she resided quietly till the death of Mr. Eaton. She was left with a large estate, and the custody of five grandchildren. In 1857 she married an Italian, from whom she was separated after losing much of her property.

EATON, Joseph O'Leary, b. in Cuyahoga county, Ohio, 8 Feb., 1829; d. in Youngers, N. Y., 7 Feb., 1857. He was an effective genre and portrait painter, both in oil and water-colors. He was an associate of the National academy, and a member of the Society of painters in water-colors, and of the Artists' fund society. The works of art he exhibited at the National academy are "Landscape View on the Hudson" (1889); "Moral Instruction," portraits of K. G. Gifford (1869) and of Rev. George H. Hopkins (1870); "Dawning Maternity" and "The Last Chapter" (1871); "The Greek Water-Carrier" (1872); and "The Lady Godiva." Among his water-colors are "Vision of the Cross" (1860); "Little Neil and her Grandfather" (1871); and "The Two Pets" (1874). In 1873 he traveled in Europe. His "Looking through the Kaleidoscope" is said to have been destroyed by fire, and the reproduction of it was destroyed by the flames. His "landscapes" were signed by the initials "J. O. H. Eaton.”

EATON, Samuel John Mills, clergyman, b. in Fairview, Erie co., Pa., 15 April, 1820. He was graduated at Jefferson in 1846, studied theology in the Western theological seminary, and entered the Presbyterian ministry in 1848. From that year till 1882 he was pastor in Franklin, Pa. He has held the offices of stated clerk of the presbytery of Erie since 1853; permanent clerk of synod of Allegheny from 1859 to 1870; stated clerk of synod of Erie from 1870 to 1881; chosen to be a magistrate of Erie, and Jefferson since 1879; and director of Western theological seminary since 1880. In 1871 he visited Egypt, Palestine, Greece, and Turkey. His publications are "Petroleum" (Philadelphia, 1866); "History of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ" (Philadelphia, 1869); "History of Venango County, Pa." (Franklin, 1870); "Lakeside" (Pittsburg, 1880); "Memorial of Cyrus Dickson, D. D." (New York, 1883); "Jerusalem" (1884); "Palestine" (1885); and "Memorial of Robert Lambertson" (Franklin, 1886). The degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by Washington and Jefferson in 1869.

EATON, Theophilus, governor of New Haven, B. in Stony Stratford, Oxfordshire, England, about 1501; d. in New Haven, Conn., 7 Jan., 1658. He was the son of a clergyman, and was educated for the church, but was sent to London to prepare himself for a career in commerce. He entered the ministry, and entered England as an agent to the court of Denmark, where he remained several years, and on his return to London became a merchant of high reputation. In 1637 he accompanied John Davenport's party to New England (see Davenport, John), and on his arrival in Massachusetts was chosen to be a magistrate. The Massachusetts planters made strong efforts to retain the party, who were gentlemen of wealth and character. The general court offered them whatever place they might choose, and the inhabitants of Newbury agreed to give them 130 town lots, but they determined to found a distinct colony. Accordingly, in the fall of 1637, Eaton, with a few friends, carefully explored the Connecticut coast, and finally selected a place called Quinnipiac, where in March, 1638, the colony was planted. In November, Eaton was one of those who contracted with the Indians for the sale of lands including what are now seven townships, the price being thirteen English coats. On 4 June, 1639, he was one of the "seven pillars" selected to form a government for the colony. He was chosen its first governor, and continued in office till his death. Gov. Eaton was one of the commissioners that formed the "United colonies of New England" in May, 1643, and in 1646 he proposed to the Dutch governor, Kieft, to settle all differences with him by arbitration. On his arrival in New Haven, Eaton attempted to suppress all Indian pursuits, but soon abandoned them for agriculture. In person he was handsome and of commanding figure, and, although strict and severe in religious matters, he was affable and courteous. His brother, Samuel, clergyman, b. in England, 1616; d. in Boston, Mass., 30 April, 1657, was educated at Magdalen college, Cambridge, receiving the degree of B. A. in 1624, and that of M. A. in 1628. Shortly after leaving the university he took orders in the Church of England, but could not conscientiously conform to its usages, and came to New England with his brother Theophilus in 1637, becoming minister of the church at New Haven. He suffered from his colleague in respect to the principles of civil government, and returned to England in 1640, with the design of gathering a company to settle Toboket (afterward Branford, Conn.) near which place he died in 1649. After leaving New Haven he preached for some time in Boston, where an unsuccessful attempt was made to secure his services permanently. On reaching England he found such an improvement in the civil and ecclesiastical condition of the country that he retained there till his wife was holding various pastorates. In 1662 he was silenced by the act of uniformity. His publications included "Defence of Sundry Positions and Scriptures alleged to justify the Congregational Way" (1645; second part, 1646); "The Mystery of God Incarnate" (1650); "Treatise of the Oath of Allegiance and Covenant" (1650); and "Human Life" in seventeen sermons (London, 1784). Another brother, Nathaniel, educator, b. in England about 1609; d. in London after 1660, was educated at Franeker, in the Netherlands, and it is said he founded the order of the Barnabites. He came to New England with his brothers, and in 1637 was appointed first professor of the school (afterward Harvard college) that had been established by the legislature in the preceding year. Mather speaks of him as "a Blade who marvellously deceived the expectation of Good Men concerning him, for he was One fitter to be Master of a Bridewell than a Colledge; and though his Avarice was notorious, yet his Cruelty was more Scandalous than his Avarice. He was a Rare Scholar himself, and he made many more such; but the Education truly was in the School of Tyrannus." His pupils complained of bad food and ill treatment, and in September, 1639, Eaton was fined 100 marks for beating his usher, Nathaniel Briscoe, "with a cudgele," and was removed from his post. He fled to Virginia, leaving debts amounting to £1,000, and was afterward excommunicated by the Cambridge churches. Winthrop says that "in Virginia he took upon him to be a minister, but was given up of God to extreme pride and sensuality, being usually drunken, as the custom is there. He returned to England in 1645, and for several weeks he was a missionary in Biddeford, Devonshire. He was afterward put into the King's bench prison for debt, "where," says Mather, "he did at length pay One Debt, namely, that unto Nature, by Death.

Eaton, William, soldier, b. in Woodstock, Conn., 28 Feb., 1774; d. in Brimfield, Mass., 1 June, 1811. His father, a school-master and farmer, removed to Mansfield about 1774. At the age of sixteen the son entered the Revolutionary army, which he left in 1783, having attained to the rank of sergeant. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1790, and in 1791 was chosen clerk of the house of delegates, where he remained until 1797. In that year he was appointed consul to Tunis, and arrived there in March, 1799. For several years he was engaged in a series of negotiations and altercations with the Tunisian cruisers, and afterward exacted from the latter payment of tribute money, and acted with a boldness and tact that secured to the commerce of his country an immunity from the attacks of Tunisian cruisers.

He returned to the United States in 1803, and, after receiving the appointment of U. S. naval agent to the American fleet to the Mediterranean in the summer of 1804. The reigning pacha of Tripoli, Jussuf Caramalli, had gained the throne by deposing his brother Hamet. On learning that the latter had taken refuge in Egypt, Eaton sought him out, and, with the sanction of the government proposed to reinstate him. In the early part of 1805 he assembled a force of about 500 men, four fifths of whom were Arabs, the remainder being Greeks and a few Americans made to his orders. After securing the cooperation of the United States squadron, this small army, under the command of Gen. Eaton, that side of the Atlantic. The guns of 600 miles across the Libyan desert to Derne, the capital of the richest province of Tripoli. On several occasions the murmurings of the Arab sheiks and the irresolution of Hamet imperilled the safety of the Christians belonging to the expedition, but the forces were finally brought to Bomba, where the "Argus" and "Hornet," under command of Isaac Hull, were in waiting. On 27 April, 1805, fire was opened upon the town and batteries. After a bombardment of an hour, which drove the enemy from their guns, the land force, numbering about 1,500, carried the works by storm, and Commander Hull raised the United States flag, which floated for the first time over a fortification on that side of the Atlantic. The guns were turned upon the town, which capitulated after a furious assault from the other side, in which Eaton was severely wounded. A few days later an army of several thousand Tripolitans, despatched by the bey, approached the town, and for several weeks sharp skirmishes took place between the opposing forces. At the moment when Eaton was preparing to fall upon Tripoli by a rapid march, intelligence arrived that Tobias Lear, the U. S. consul-general at Algiers, had negotiated with the reigning bey a treaty, among whose provisions was that the £10,000 should be paid for the ransom of the American captives. Hamet retired to Syracuse, and the pacha retained custody of his wife and children. Eaton accused Col. Lear of treachery, and of betraying the interests of the government. On his return to the United States, Gen. Eaton was well received, and honorably mentioned in the president's message, but failed to obtain compensation from the government for his pecuniary losses, or such recognition as he expected. Massachusetts, "desirous to perpetuate a remembrance of heroic enterprise," granted him 10,000 acres of land, and in acknowledgment of his release of the Danish captives he was presented with a gold box by the king of Denmark. In 1806 Aaron Burr endeavored ineffectually to enlist Eaton in his conspiracy, and on his trial in Richmond after the trial of one of the most important witnesses against him, Eaton's last years were spent in Brimfield, Mass., which town he represented in the legislature. See "Life of Gen. Eaton," by Festus Foster (Brookfield, 1813), and a memoir by President Cornelius C. Felton in Sparks's "American Heroes." — His son, Nathaniel Johnson, d. in Alton, Ill., 30 March, 1883, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1827. but left the army in 1887, and was post warrant of St. Louis, Mo., from 1850 till 1877.—William's first child, Amos botanist, b. in Chatham, N. Y., 12 May, 1776; d. in Troy, N. Y., 6 May, 1842, was graduated at Williams in 1799, studied law under Elisha Williams and Joseph O. Hoffman, was admitted to the bar in 1802, and afterward became agent and surveyor of the Livingston estates on the Hudson river. He was a retired, molder, botanist, in 1810 delivered at Catskill a popular course of lectures on botany, and began lecturing on the natural sciences at Williams college in 1817. His lectures were also delivered in several New England cities, and in 1818, by request of C. B. Clinton, was invited to the legislature of New York. As a result of his suggestion at Albany, "The Natural History of New York" was published. In 1820 Gen. Stephen Van Rensselaer employed him to make a geological and agricultural survey of several counties and of the region through which the Erie canal afterward passed, and it was the initiation of such surveys in this country, reports of which were published. Also in 1820 he was elected professor of natural history in the medical college at Castleton, Vt. When the medical college was established the Polytechnic institute at Troy in 1824, Mr. Eaton became its principal and senior professor. He was author of numerous works, including an "Index to the Geology of the Northern States" (Albany, 1818); "Geological and Agricultural Survey of the District adjoining the Erie Canal" (1818); "The Philosophical Instructor" (1834); "Manual of the Botany of North America," the first popular text-book on that science published in the United States (1833); and a "Treatise on Engineering and Surveying" (New York).—His son, Amos Beebe, soldier, b. N. Y., 12 May, 1811, was graduated at Yale in 1835. He took part in the Seminole war, was appointed chief commissary of subsistence of Gen. Taylor's army at the beginning of the Mexican war, and was brevetted major after the battle of Buena Vista. He afterward purchased commissary in New York from 1861 till 1864, when he was appointed commissary-general of the subsistence bureau in Washington, D. C. After being promoted successively to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, colonel, and brigadier-general, he was appointed major-general, and served on the retired list in 1874.—Amos Beebe's son; Daniel Cady, botanist, b. at Fort Gratiot, Michigan, 12 Sept., 1834, was graduated at Yale in 1857, and studied botany at Harvard in 1860. He became professor of botany at Yale in 1864. He is the author of that part of Chapman's "Flora of the Southern States" (1860) that treats of ferns, and the corresponding part of "Gray's Manual" (5th ed., 1867), and has published "The Ferns of North America" (Boston, 1879-80), and various scientific papers.—Amos Beebe's nephew, Daniel Cady, b. in Johnstown, Fulton co., N. Y., 10 June, 1857, was educated at Gottingen gymnasium, Yale, where he was graduated in 1869, and the University of Berlin. He was professor of the history of art in Yale from 1869 till 1876, and is the author of the "History of Great Britain" (Boston, 3d ed., 1886), and numerous pamphlets on art and education, including one on "Yale College in 1888," published anonymously, which attracted much attention (New Haven, 1883).

Eaton, William Wallace, senator, b. in Toledo, Ohio, 11 Dec. He was educated by private tutors and in the public schools, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1837. He soon became prominent in local politics, was elected to the Connecticut house of representatives in 1847 and 1848, and to the legislature in 1850. Shortly afterward he removed to Hartford, and frequently represented that city in the legislature from 1853 till 1875. He was clerk of the superior and supreme courts of Tolland and Hartford counties, and for several years one of the judges of the Hartford county court. For many years he was a popular lecturer and historian. He was the first secretary of the Society of American artists. His works include "Farmer's Boy" (1870); "Reverie" (1875); "Harvesters at Rest" (1875); "Boy Whitting" : "Portrait of William Cullen Bryant" (1879); and "Grandmother and the White Bear" (1880).

EBELING, Christoph Daniel, German scholar, b. near Hildesheim, Hanover, in 1741; d. in Hamburg, 30 June, 1817. He studied theology at Göttingen, but devoted himself to geographical studies, and held for thirty-three years the chair of history and Greek in the University of Göttingen. He was also superintendent of the Hamburg library, and collected about 10,000 maps and nearly 4,000 books relating to America. His collection was bought by IsraeL Thorleike in the year after Ebeling's death, and given by him to Harvard. Ebeling's great work was a "Geography," d. in 5 vols., Hamburg, 1796-1816, forming a continuation of Büsching's "General Geography." He received a vote of thanks from the congress of the United States for this work.

EBERLE, John, physician, b. in Lancaster county, Pa., 11 Oct., 1784; d. in Lexington, Ky., 2 Feb., 1838. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1809. He began to practise in Manheim, Pa., and, after living for a short time in Lancaster, accepted a commission as surgeon in 1813, and served on the retired list in 1814. He then removed to Philadelphia, where he was appointed physician to the poor. He was one of the founders of Jefferson medical college in 1822, and was given the chair of medicine there in 1825, being transferred in 1830 to that of materia medica, and lecturing at the same time on obstetrics. He removed in 1831 to Cincinnati, where he held the professorship of materia medica in the Medical college of Ohio till 1857, and was next called to the chair of the practice of medicine in the medical school of Western University, Lexington, Ky., where he continued till his death. He was a member of many medical and scientific societies. Dr. Eberle was one of the editors of the "Western Medical Gazette," and the "Ohio Medical Lyceum," as well as of the "Medical Advocate," in which he conducted from 1818 till 1823. His works include "Botanical Terminology" (1818); "Treatise on the Diseases and Physical Education of Children" (Philadelphia, 1819); "Treatise on Therapeutics and Materia Medica" (2 vols., 1822; 5th ed., 1847); and "Notes on Lectures on the Theory and Practice of Medicine" (2 vols., 1844). Some of these works have been translated into German.
ECCLES, Henry, Canadian lawyer, b. in Bath, England, in 1817; d. in Toronto, 22 Nov., 1888. He was educated in Canada by his father, a retired British officer, studied law, and was called to the bar in 1840. He was a leader in the movement for the establishment of the Law Society in 1853, and appointed queen’s counsel in 1856. He became very prominent in his profession, was noted for the clearness and simplicity of his style, and was also famous for his power of extort- ing confessions from witnesses.

ECCLES, John, R. C. archbishop, b. in Kent county, Md., in 1801; d. in Georgetown, D. C., in 1851. He entered St. Mary’s college, Baltimore, and while there became a Roman Catholic. Pursuing his studies in the theological seminary there, he was ordained in 1835, and afterward took a course in the Eccl. seminary of Fossy, near Paris. On his return he successively filled the offices of vice-president and president of St. Mary’s college. In 1834 he was consecrated coadjutor archbishop of Baltimore, and succeeded Archbishop Whipple in the same year. Several new academies for the education of girls were built under his care and placed in charge of the nuns of the Visitatin, and the Christian Brothers established a novitiate and training-school of their order under his auspices. Parochial schools were made by the church, and communicant classes and the Brothers of St. Patrick, and German parishes were organized under the direction of the Redemptorists.

Dr. Ecclesdon founded the College of St. Charles in 1850, and shortly afterward introduced the Lazarists into his diocese. He presided over five provincial councils, and took a prominent part in the anti-constant legislation, including the law passed by the council of 1840, providing for the transmission of church property from a bishop to his successor, and that of 1843, communicating Roman Catholics who should marry after being divorced by the state, during the reign of Pius IX. In 1849 he was invited by Archbishop Ecclesdon to visit Baltimore and preside over the provincial council.

ECHAVE, Baltasar de (ay-chay'-vay), Spanish-Mexican artist, b. in Zumaya, Guipuzcoa, Spain, in the latter part of the 16th century; d. in Mexico about 1642. The chief work of the artist is generally called Echave the elder, as there was another painter of the same name, supposed to have been his son. He came, when very young, to the New World, and, although he had probably begun his artistic studies in Spain, he wished to work in Mexico. In the “Profess” church of Mexico there are several excellent paintings of his, including “Saint Isabel of Portugal,” but his best paintings are in the National academy of San Carlos. Among these last, which recall the manner of Guercino, are “The Visitation,” “The Adoration of the Three Magi- cians,” and the “Adoration in the Garden.”

The latter has been compared by some artists to the best productions of Overbeck, especially as regards correct composition. In Santiago Tieltoloco there were fifteen altar panels on wood by him, dated 1608, some of them the finest, but far inferior to those at the Profess. He also painted some smaller pictures, the best representing the conversation of Saint Antonio Abad with Saint Paul, the first hermit, which, besides the merits of the larger paintings, has an extraordinary delicacy of execution. As a landscape painter he was inferior in the neatness of design than for richness of color, but generally his later works, painted in 1620-30, are far superior to his earlier pictures, dated from 1603 to 1619. Echave was also notable as a philologist and author. His best-known work is a treatise on the origin of the Biscayan language, “Antigüedad de la lengua de Cantabria,” which has been favorably noticed by the learned Larrumendi and Astorios (Mexico, 1607).

ECHENIQUE, José Rufino (ay-chay-ne'-kay), Peruvian soldier, b. in Puno, Peru, 8 Feb., 1808; d. in Arequipa, 18 Oct., 1879. He entered the Peruvian army as a cadet in 1821, took part in the campaign of the Peruvian forces in 1825, and fought at the battle of Cocharba, where he was taken prisoner and sent to the island of Esteves, in Lake Titicaca. After the battle of Ayacucho, 9 Dec., 1824, he was set at liberty, rejoined his battalion, and in daily battles contributed to the pacification of Pias de Lujiche, which was held by the Jacobins. He twice fought against the fortress of Huancayo. He was recalled on 14 Nov., 1830, and on 15 Jan., 1831, he retreated to the Andes and occupied Cerro Paseo. In March of the same year Echenique fought against Junin, then joined Gen. Miller, and on 30 Jan., defended the bridge of Huancayo, which was recaptured against 100 men under the same general. He was promoted colonel on 30 April, 1832. When Gen. Santa Cruz occupied Peru in 1833, Echenique refused to join him; but in 1846, during the administration of Vivanco, he again entered the army, and was appointed commander-in-chief of Lima. In that year the civil war was devastating the country, and Echenique left Lima at the head of a small army, with which he occupied Junin and Ayacucho, and, later, together with Gen. Castillo, checked the second revolution headed by Domingo del Oliva. After the death of Oliva in 1846, Echenique was promoted general. He was elected deputy, senator, and counsellor of state, and from 1846 till 1851 was vice-president of the republic. He was elected president in 1852. During his administration he fostered the material as well as the moral prosperity of his country. In 1853 he established the navigation of the upper Amazon, which proved beneficial to the towns along its course. In 1854, Elías and Castillo revolted against him, and he was defeated in the struggle that followed, afterward going abroad, where he remained for seven years. He returned

ECKFORD, Henry, naval architect, b. in Irvine, Scotland, 13 March, 1775; d. in Constanti-ople, 12 Nov., 1882. In his sixteenth year he was placed with a naval constructor at Quebec, and in 1796 removed to New York, where he introduced important changes in the art of ship-building, and took the lead in this business, his vessels proving superior in strength and speed. In the second war with Great Britain, 1812-15, he was employed by the government to construct ships-of-war on the lakes, and filled the contract with expert service and skill. After the war he built the steamer “Robert Fulton,” which, in 1829, made the first and successful voyage by steam to New Orleans and Havana. When after ward rigged into a sailing-vessel she became the fastest and most efficient sloopof-war in the Brazilian navy. Mr. Eckford was appointed naval constructor at Brooklyn in 1890. Six ships-of-the-line, of which the “Ohio” was the first, were built after his models.

The “Ohio,” which was one of the old line-of-battle ships, was in her day one of the finest in the world, and Mr. Eckford distinguished himself in designing and building these ships-of-war. The “Ohio” was three times in special government service:
twice a flag-ship; and, finally, as a receiving-ship in Boston in 1850, was the scene of many brilliant festival occasions, being visited by thousands from all parts of the world. He left the government in consequence of disagreement between the naval commissioners, and became master of vessels for European and South American powers.
President Jackson requested him to submit a plan for the reorganization of the navy, which he did, and he was about to establish a professorship of naval architecture for Columbia college, by giving $20,000 to it, having engaged the first professor, when a disastrous affair swept away his large fortune. In 1831 he built a sloop-of-war for Sultan Mahmoud, of the Ottoman empire, and was solicited to enter his service as chief naval constructor for the empire. This led him to visit Turkey, where he established a navy-yard, and there died. Mr. Eckford’s house in “Love Lane,” now West 26th street, New York, was the resort of the friends and poets Halleck and Drake and Dr.
De Kay, two of whom became his sons-in-law. He was a man extremely beloved for a character both forceful and beautiful.

ECKLEY, Joseph, clergyman, b. in England in 1750; d. in the United States in 1811. He was graduated at Princeton in 1772, and ordained pastor of the Old South church, Boston, in 1778. He was an original member of the Society for promgating the gospel among the Indians in 1787, and was for many years one of the Boston association of ministers of Congregational churches when they formed only one association. In 1806 he delivered the Dudley lectures of other nations, and thenceforth Mr. Eckfolland’s reputation as an essayist was world-wide. The office to which he was appointed during Andrew Jackson’s presidency he held until his death.

EDDY, William, loyalist, b. in England about 1745. He came to this country in 1769, and settled at Annapolis, under the protection of Sir Robert Eden, governor of Maryland. He was, the office of surveyor of customs, and was intimacy acquainted with prominent men of all parties “until the unfortunate misunderstanding which arose between the parent state and the colonies rendered it impossible for even such a man, sincerely and steadily attached to the former, to continue in the country.” On 4 June, 1776, Eddis, with others, supposed to appear before the patriot “committee of observation,” and on 11 June, refusing to give bonds for his conduct, he was ordered to leave the country before 1 August. He was unable to remain and hold his office, however, till April, 1777, when he made his way to a British man-of-war and returned to England. He published an interesting collection of his “Letters from America” (London, 1789).
ines of the Missionary Enterprise" (1854); "Angel Wispers" (Lowell, 1859); "The Quiet Side" (1854); "Young Woman and Friend" (1859); and "Waiting at the Cross" (Boston, 1859).

Eddy, Edward, actor, b. in Troy, N. Y., in 1821; d. in Kingston, Jamaica, 19 Dec., 1875. He made his first appearance in Albany, then played in New York in 1834, under the management of the Apollo Hall, and in the same year went to New York in 1831, and was successively manager of the Metropolitan theatre, Burton's Chambers street theatre, the Old Bowery, and the old Broadway theatre. The last performance in this building, on 13 April, 1859, was for his benefit. Although he aspired to persuade leading characters, Mr. Eddy did not succeed in impressing his audiences favorably. His best efforts were in melodrama, and in such Shakespearean parts as Laertes, Edgar, and Macduff.—His wife, Mary Mathews, b. in England; d. in New Orleans, La., in 1865, was also on the stage, but more temporary figures of the Eddies. He was educated at the public school, and when fifteen years of age went to New York, where he secured employment with a merchant. After a year he returned to Vermont, and engaged in the manufacture of friction matches at Burlington. In 1854 he removed to Hull, opposite Ottawa, Canada, and there began the manufacture of matches, adding thereto, in 1856, the manufacture of articles of wooden ware. In 1858 he added lumbering to his other enterprises, and the yearly amount of this business is now (1887) nearly $20,000,000. Mr. Eddy was elected to the Queens legislature in 1861, and was a representative for four years. When the Ottawa ladies' college was established he was made its principal, and held that office severally.

Eddy, Henry Turner, mathematician, b. in Stoughton, Mass., 9 June, 1844. He was graduated at Yale in 1867, receiving the mathematical medal in his senior year, and then followed the engineering course in Sheffield scientific school, where he held the office of instructor in field-work in engineering. In 1868 he received the appointment of instructor in mathematics and Latin in the University of East Tennessee, at Knoxville, and in 1869 he became assistant professor of mathematics and civil engineering in Cornell, where he received the degrees of B.A., M.A., and Ph.D., and advanced studies in pure and applied mathematics. After holding the office of associate professor in mathematics in Princeton for a year, he was called in 1874 to fill a similar chair in the University of Cincinnati, and was appointed dean of the faculty in 1874-5 and 1884-5. The year 1879-80 he spent in study abroad. Dr. Eddy is a member of scientific societies, and was vice-president of the American association for the advancement of science, of the section on mathematics and astronomy in 1884. He has contributed numerous papers to scientific and technical journals, and has published "Analytical Geometry" (Philadelphia, 1874); "Researches in Graphic Statics" (New York, 1878); "Thermodynamics" (1879); and "Neue Construktionen aus der graphischen Statik" (Leipzig, 1880).

Eddy, Loring, b. in Clinton, Mass., 23 June, 1851. At the age of seven he began his musical education, and at fourteen filled a place as organist. When sixteen he went to Hartford, Conn., where he studied with Dudley Buck, and at the age of seventeen became organist of Bethany church, Montpelier, Vt. Here he remained about two years and a half, teaching and devoting all his leisure time to his studies. In 1871 he went to Berlin, where he studied the piano under Loeschhorn and the organ under Haupt. After making a concert tour through Saxony, Austria, and Switzerland, playing in the principal churches, he was invited in Berlin to play before the emperor and many of the nobility. Passing through England on his way home, he stopped in London, playing in the Royal Albert Hall and the Gewandhaus, and his concerts in Berlin, and consequently in Europe. Mr. Eddy became organist of the 1st Congregational church in Chicago. In 1876 Mr. Eddy became general director of the Hershey school of musical art in Chicago. In the spring of 1877 the music-hall connected with the school was finished, capable of seating 1,000 persons, and hereupon a fine three-manual concert organ, Mr. Eddy began a series of recitals unique in the history of organ music. They will number, when completed, 100, and will embrace all the greatest works for the organ, of both ancient and modern authors. Mr. Eddy held the Centennial exposition at Philadelphia, and in different parts of the country, giving concerts and exhibiting many new organs. Among his most notable publications are a prelude and fugue in A minor; a set of organ variations on the theme of "Greenville," but a set of sonatas; a fugue in A minor; a counterpoint; an English translation of Haupt's "Theory of Counterpoint and Fugue"; and several compositions for the organ.

Eddy, John H., geographer, b. in New York in 1792; d. 22 Dec., 1817. He published a circular map of the state of New York (1814); a map of the western part of New York; a map to illustrate the communication between lake Erie and the Hudson; and a map of the state of New York; and was engaged on a general atlas of America several years.

Eddy, Norman, congressman, b. in Scipio, Cayuga co., N. Y., 10 Dec., 1810; d. in Indianapolis, Ind., 28 Jan., 1872. He was graduated in medicine at the University of Pennsylvania in 1833, and removed in 1836 to Mishawaka, Ind., where he practiced for several years, but finally gave up his profession for that of the law, and was admitted to the bar in April, 1847, removing to South Bend, Ind., in the same year. He was elected state senator on the Democratic ticket in 1850, and in 1852 was elected to congress over Schuyler Colfax. He was then made a member of the Michigan bar in 1854. President Pierce appointed Mr. Eddy district attorney for Minnesota in 1855, and in 1856-7 he was commissioner of the Indian trust lands in Kansas. In the autumn of 1861 he organized the 48th Indiana regiment, was commissioned its colonel, and continued in command till July, 1863, when he resigned because of disability resulting from wounds received in the battle of Iuka, Miss. In that engagement the 48th lost 119 killed or wounded out of 420 that entered the fight. Col. Eddy was appointed collector of internal revenue by President Johnson in 1865, and in 1870 was elected secretary of state of Indiana, which office he held till his sudden death from heart disease.

Eddy, Richard, author, b. in Providence, R. I., 21 June, 1828. He was apprenticed to a bookseller at the age of fifteen, in Greenfield, Mass., 23 June, 1851. At the age of seven he began his musical education, and at fourteen filled a place as organist. When sixteen he went to Hartford, Conn., where he studied with Dudley Buck, and at the age of seventeen became organist of Bethany church, Montpelier, Vt. Universalist historical society, and Tufts college gave him the degree of S. T. D. in 1881. In July, 1886, he became editor of the "Universalist Quarterly." Dr. Eddy has published a "History of the 60th West Virginia, New York, State Volunteer, (Philadelphia, 1864): "Universalism in America, a History" (2 vols., Boston, 1884-86); and several sermons, including three on President Lincoln, with the title "The Martyr to Liberty" (1865). He has in press "Alcohol in History," edited by John Johnston, R. I., 81
March, 1769; d. in Providence, R. I., 2 Feb., 1839.
He was graduated at Brown in 1877, and studied law, but was not long in active practice. He was clerk of the Rhode Island supreme court in 1870-3, secretary of state in 1878-1819, and in the latter year was elected to Congress as a Democrat without opposition, serving three terms till 1885. He was chief justice of the state supreme court in 1887-37.
Brown gave him the degree of L. L. D. in 1801.
Judge Eddy contributed to the collections of the Massachusetts historical society, and published "Reasons for My Opinions" (Providence, 1818).

EDDY, Thomas, philanthropist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 5 Sept., 1758; d. in New York city, 16 Sept., 1827. His parents, who were Friends, emigrated from Ireland about 1733. Thomas received a schooling in his youth, and when he was about 17 years old, he was apprenticed to a tanner, but remained with him only two years. On 4 Sept., 1778, he went to New York, being resolved to become a merchant, though his possessions only amounted to ninety-six dollars, and he was totally ignorant of business. He be-gen by being an agent of goods at auction, soon established a trade, but failed in 1784 through an unfortunate speculation, and about 1790 entered the insurance business, in which he made a large fortune. In 1796, with Philip Schuyler and Ambrose Spencer, he prepared a bill establishing a penitentiary system, which was passed. Mr. Eddy had sole charge of the erection of the first building, and served as its director for four years, substituting cleanliness and discipline for former abuses. To Mr. Eddy is due the plan of providing a separate cell for each con*\^\(\text{vict}\) in, instead of confining them all together. He was one of the governors of the New York Hospital in 1793, induced the legislature to make liberal grants in its aid, and in 1815 was one of the founders of the Bloomingdale Insane Asylum.
In 1795, John Murray, was appointed by the society of Friends to visit the Indians in New York state, and did much to improve their condition.
He labored earnestly for the construction of the Erie canal, being second only to De Witt Clinton in his efforts, and was also one of the originators of the New York savings bank and the New York Bible society. His labors in these various directions earned for him the title of the "American Howard." He published a work on the "State Prison of New York" (1801). See "Life of Thomas Eddy" by Samuel L. Knapp (New York, 1884).

EDDY, Thomas Measthus, b. in Newtown, Hamilton co., Ohio, 7 Sept., 1823; d. in New York city, 7 Oct., 1874. He was educated in Greensborough, Ind., classical seminary, and in 1842-53 was a Methodist circuit preacher in that state. He was agent of the American Bible society in the latter year, and residing elder of the Indianapolis district till 1856, when he was appointed ter of the "Northernwestern Christian Advocate" in Chicago. He retained this post till 1868, and, after holding pastures in Baltimore and Washington, was elected one of the corresponding secretaries of the missionary society by the general conference of 1872, of which he was a member. Dr.
Eddy was a copious writer for the press, and, besides occasional sermons, published "Patriotism of Illinois," a history of the state during the civil war (3 vols. Chicago, 1868). He was ordained to the ministry in 1820, and served as pastor of the churches in Warsaw, N. Y., in 1850-5, and Northampton, Mass., in 1857-67, of the Brooklyn Heights Dutch Reformed church in 1867-71, and afterward of Congregational churches in Chelsea, Mass., Detroit, Mich., and Augusta, Ga., where he is at present (1877). Williams gave him the degree of D. D. in 1890. Dr. Eddy has published "Immanuel, or the Life of Jesus Christ" (Springfield, Mass., 1888); and was the principal compiler of "Hymns of the Church" (1898), and joint editor of
"Carmina Sancta" (New York, 1864).

EDEN, Charles, governor of North Carolina,
b. in 1673; d. in North Carolina, 17 March, 1722.
He was appointed governor on 13 July, 1718, and his administration was marked by the arrest of the pirate Edward Teach, called "Black Beard." Eden charged Teach the royal pardon if he would give himself up, whereupon he surrendered with twenty of his followers, and for a time occupied himself as a good citizen, but soon returned to his old habits. Eden was even susppected of an intimacy with him, and Edward Moesty, a prominent citizen, declared that the governor could raise an armed posse to arrest honest men, but could not raise a similar force to apprehend Teach. For his accusations, Mosely was arrested, fined $100, and debarred from holding office for three years; and in 1719 the governor gave to the council a full account of his dealings with the pirate, which was approved by them.
An expedition against Teach was finally sent out by the government of Virginia, and the pirate was killed in a hand-to-hand combat with its commander, Lieut. Maynard. In 1720 the town of Edenton was laid out near the mouth of the Perquimans river, on the tomb of the Willa-המכינד, N. C., bears an inscription to the effect that "He brought the country into a flourishing condition, and died much lamented.

EDEN, sir Robert, governor of Maryland, b. in Durham, England; d. in Annapolis, Md., 2 Sept., 1786. He was the second son of Sir Robert Eden, Bart., and succeeded Horatio Sharpe as royal governor of Maryland in 1768. He was more disposed to moderation than any of the other British officers, advised the repeal of the tax on tea. and, when the colonels of militia demanded the arms and ammunition of the province, readily gave them up. His course had much to do with the attitude of the Maryland patriots, who hoped and labor for conciliation long after the other colonies had given up all idea of it. Eden was commanded to remain undisturbed in Maryland after his authority had ceased, till in April, 1776, despatches were intercepted addressed to him by Lord George Germain, which implicated him in transactions hostile to the liberty of the country. These were sent by Gen. Charles Lee to Congress, and he also ordered the Baltimore committee of safety to arrest Eden, which order was presently confirmed by congress. Its execution, however, was prevented by the provincial council of safety at Annapo-ilis, and the governor was allowed to embark for England, where he was created a baronet on 19 Sept., 1776. He had married Caroline Calvert, sister and co-heir of the last Lord Baltimore, and died while on a visit to Maryland in 1784 "to look after the business of his estate" which was devolved upon him by the treaty of 1783. His grandson, Sir Frederick, an officer in the British army, fell at New Orleans, 24 Dec., 1814. —Sir Robert's brother, William, Lord Auckland, b. in 1744; d. 28 May, 1814, studied law, and became a barrister. He was at different times secretary of state for Ireland, privy councillor and ambassador to France, Spain, and Holland, and in 1789 was made an Irish peer, with the title of Baron Auckland. He received the same title in the English peerage in 1789. He was one of the lords of the trade and plantations during 1776, and one of the three commissioners sent by Lord North in 1788 to treat with the Americans.

EDES, Benjamin, journalist, b. in Charlestown, Mass., 14 Oct., 1732; d. in Boston, 11 Dec., 1803. His great-grandfather John came from England to Charlestown, Mass., about 1674. Benjamin was educated in the public schools of Charlestown, and in 1755 he became, with John Gill, editor and proprietor of "The Boston Gazette and Country Journal," a patriotic sheet that exerted a powerful influence just before the Revolution and during the war. It is in its original form Adams' "Novanglus" letters, and Quincy, Warren, and other patriots were among its contributors. Mr. Edes, as one of the "Sons of Liberty," took an active part in the politics of his time, and was a caustic writer on the political questions of the day. In his house the patriots composing the "Boston tea party" assembled on the afternoon of 16 Dec., 1773, and drank punch from a bowl that was subsequently given by Mr. Edes' family to the Massachusetts historical society, afterward disassembling themselves and issuing a handbill as "officers of the office." During the siege of Boston, Mr. Edes escaped to Water- town, where he continued the publication of the "Gazette." After forty-three years of editorship he discontinued it in 1798. Andrew Oliver, writing to England in 1798, says, referring to the "Gazette": "No journal in the United States is more surely learned from that infamous paper"; while Gov. Bernard, in one of his letters to his Earl of Hillsborough, advised the arrest of both Edes and Gill as publishers of sedition. At the beginning of the war Mr. Edes possessed a comfortable fortune, but after- wards he was deprived of it by the revolutionary government. —His son, Peter, b. in Boston, 17 Dec., 1756; d. in Bangor, Me., 30 March, 1840, was educated at the Boston Latin-school. Two days after the battle of Bunker Hill, when in his nineteenth year, he was arrested by Gen. Gage on the charge of "having fire-arms concealed in his house," and confined in Boston jail one hundred and seven days, in the same room with "Master" James Lovell of the Latin-school and "Master" John Leach. Mr. Edes was afterward in business in Boston, and Newport, R. I., but removed in 1796 to Augusta, Me., where in 1797 he published the "Kennebec Intelligencer." He afterward lived in Hallowell, Me., and finally settled in Bangor, Me., where he died. He published an edition of the "Fifth of March Orations," with a preface addressed to the people of Boston, and an addendum on Washington (Hallowell, Me., 1800). His journal, kept during his imprisonment, containing a list of the prisoners taken at Bunker Hill, was published by one of his descendants (Bangor, Me., 1837). An interesting letter from Mr. Edes to a friend in about the Boston tea party appears in the "Proceedings of the Massachusetts Historical Society" (December, 1871).

EDES, Henry Herbert, great-great-grandson of Benjamin's brother Thomas, merchant, b. in Charlestown, Mass., 29 March, 1849. He was educated at Harvard University and at his native town, and in 1865 entered mercantile life in Boston, in which he has since continued. He became assistant treasurer of the "New England historic genealogical society" in 1868, and since 1873 has been a member of its publication committee. He is also a fellow of the Massachusetts antiquarian society. Mr. Edes has been a member of the executive committee of the Boston civil-service reform association since 1881, and of the Massachusetts reform club since 1885; and since 1869 has been arranging the Charlestown archives (1629-1847), which when complete will fill about 120 volumes. He has in manuscript a "Genealogy of the Edes Family," and is the author of "History of the Harvard Church at Charlestown, 1815-79" (Boston, 1879), besides many historical books and pamphlets, including "New England Colonial Documents," a reprint of papers contributed by him to the "New England Historical and Genealogical Register" in 1868-71 (privately printed); "Memorial of Josiah Barker, of Charlestown" (privately printed, Boston, 1871); "Charlestown's Historic Points" (1879); "Introduction to Wyman's "Genealogies and Estates of Charlestown" (1879); and contributed three chapters on Charlestown to "The Memorial History of Boston" (Boston, 1890-71).

EDES, Richard Sullivan, clergyman, b. in Providence, R. I., 26 Aug., 1834; d. in Boston, Mass., 26 Aug., 1877. He was sixth in descent from John Edes. He was graduated at Brown in 1850, and at Harvard divinity-school in 1854, and held various Unitarian pastorate, the last in Bos- ton, Me. He retired from the ministry in a few years. He was active in public affairs, and took special interest in educational matters. Besides numerous discourses and addresses, he published a memoir of Peter Edes in the "New England Historical and Genealogical Register" (1863); "Journal and Letters relative to Two Journeys to the Ohio Country in 1788 and 1789 made by Col. John May," with a biographical sketch (Cincinnati, 1873); and assisted in the preparation of "A Genealogy of the Descendants of John May" (Boston, 1878).—His son, Robert Thaxter, physician, b. in Eastport, Me., in 1839; graduated at Harvard in 1858, and took his degree in medicine there in 1861. In September following he was appointed acting assistant surgeon in the U.S. navy, in January, 1862, assistant surgeon, and in May, 1863, passed assistant surgeon, resigning in the same month. Having taken an extended tour in Europe he then practised his profession at Hingham, Mass., Roxbury, and Boston, where in 1872-3 he was assistant professor of materia medica at Harvard. He held the full professorship from 1875 till 1884, and in 1884 was Jackson professor of clinical medicine in 1886 Dr. Eades moved to Washington, D. C. He was for several years one of the visiting physicians at Boston city hospital. He is a member of various medical societies, was a contributor of many articles to medical journals, and to several American and English medical journals, and has published "Nature and Time in the Cure of Diseases" (Boston, 1868); and "Physiology and Pathology of the Sympathetic Nerve" (New York, 1869), both originally prize essays, and "Therapeutic Hand-Book of U. S. Pharmacopoeia" (1839).

1831, and read law in New York city, but illness interrupted his studies, and, after travelling extensively, he entered mercantile life. He afterward taught in Bahway, N. J., and in 1857-54 was professor of the University grammar-school of the city of New York. He had taken a deep and constant interest in theology, and was licensed as a Presbyterian minister in 1845. After holding a pastorate at Bridgehampton, L. I., he had charge, from 1853 till 1882, of the Reformed church at Easton, Pa., where he held, among his congregation, the Faculty and students of Lafayette college. Dr. Edgar was an eloquent preacher, and an outspoken opponent of slavery during the war. He frequently lectured on educational topics, and in advocacy of temperance. After his death a tablet in his memory was placed on the wall of his church at Easton. He contributed largely to religious and secular magazines, and published numerous orations and sermons, including "Three Lectures on Slavery" (Easton, Pa., 1862); "Four Discourses occasioned by the Death of Lincoln" (1865); "Memorial of Russell S. Chidsey" (1867); "An Exposition of the Last Nine Wars" (1867); "Christianity our Nation's Wiselest Policy" (1872); "A Discourse occasioned by the Death of President Garfield" (1881); and "The Relation of the Pulpit to Politics" (1884). EDGAR, James Benedict, Canadian lawyer, b. in Hackettstown, N. J., 10 Aug., 1841. He was educated by private tuition, and at Lenoxville grammar-school studied law, was admitted to the bar of Upper Canada in 1864, and subsequently practised in Toronto. In 1874 he was sent to British Columbia by the Department of the Interior to arrange terms for the postponement of the construction of the Canada Pacific railway. He was first returned to the Dominion parliament in 1872, and sat for two years, unsuccessfully contested Centre Toronto in 1882, and was elected by acclamation for West Ontario in August, 1884. He has contributed frequently to the daily press and to periodicals, and is the author of some spirited lyrics. He has published "The Insolvent Act of 1864, with Notes and Forms" (Toronto, 1884); "An Act to amend the Insolvent Act of 1884, with Annotations"; "Notes of Debts, Mortgages, etc."; a pamphlet on the "Commercial Independence of Canada" (1883); and "White Stone Canoe," a poem (1885).

EDGAR, John Todd, clergyman, b. in Sussex county, Del., 18 April, 1792; d. in Nashville, Tenn., 18 Nov., 1866. He removed with his parents to Kentucky early in life, and entered Transylvania university, Lexington, but was not graduated. He was graduated at Princeton theological seminary in 1816, and in 1817 ordained as a Presbyterian. He was pastor at Flemingsburg, and Maysville, Ky., in 1827, and Frankfort in 1827-33, where his preaching attracted much attention. Henry Clay said of him: "If you want to hear eloquence, listen to John T. Edgar." He became pastor of the 1st Presbyterian church in Nashville, Tenn., in 1833, and remained there till his death. At one time he edited the American Presbyterian, published at Nashville. He was much beloved in Nashville by people of all denominations, and on the day of his funeral there was a general suspension of business in the city, by proclamation of the mayor.

EDGREN, August Hjalmar, author, b. in Sweden, and in 1840. He was graduated at the University of Upsala, and at the Royal military school of Sweden in 1860, came to the United States, and entered the 99th New York regiment as 2d lieutenant in January, 1862. He was promoted to 1st lieutenant, and in August, 1863, was assigned to the engineer corps. He afterward joined the regular army of Sweden, and served from February, 1864, till August, 1870, having been adjutant from July, 1869. He was a teacher of languages in Riverview academy in 1871-2, instructor in French, German, and Sanskrit in Yale from 1874 till 1880, and lecturer on Sanskrit in the University of Lund, Sweden, from 1880 till 1884, when he became professor of modern languages and Sanskrit in Nebraska university. He is a member of various learned societies, and is the author of numerous papers relating to Sanskrit, Romance, and Germanic philology, and of value to scholars, which have appeared at various times from 1887-88 in Sweden, England, and the United States. Among his numerous publications are a Swedish translation of Longfellow's "Evangelie" (Göteborg, 1875); a "German and English Dictionary," with Prof. W. D. Whitney (New York and London, 1877); a work in Swedish on "The Literature of America" (Göteborg, 1878), and on "The Public Schools and Colleges of the United States" (Uppsala, 1879); "Swedish Literature in America" (Sweden, 1883); and "American Antiquities" (1885).

EDISON, Thomas Alva, inventor, b. in Alva, Ohio, 11 Feb., 1847. His mother, who had been a teacher, gave him the little schooling he received, and at the age of twelve he became a newsboy on the Grand Trunk line running into Detroit. While thus engaged he acquired the habit of reading. He also studied qualitative analysis, and, was a student in chemistry, and conducted chemical experiments on the train till an accident caused the prohibition of further work of the kind. Afterward he obtained the exclusive right of selling newspapers on the road, and, with the aid of four assistants, he set in type and printed the "Grand Trunk Herald," which he sold with his other papers. The operations of the telegraph, which he constantly witnessed in the stations along the road, awakened his interest, and he improvised rude means of transmitting messages between his father's home in Port Huron and the house of a neighbor. Finally a station-master, whose child he had rescued in front of a coming train at the risk of his own life, taught him telegraph operating, and he wandered for several years over the United States and Canada, acquiring great skill in this art, but frequently neglected his practical duties for studies and experiments in electric science. At this time he invented an automatic repeater, means of which a message could be transferred from one wire to another without the aid of an operator, and in 1864 conceived the idea of sending two messages at once over the same wire, which led to his experiments in duplex telegraphy. Later he was called to Boston and placed in charge of the "crack" New York wire. While in that city he continued his experiments, and perfected his duplex telegraph, but it did not succeed till 1872. He came to New York in 1871, and soon afterward became superintendent of the gold and stock company, inventing the printing telegraph for gold and stock quotations. For the manufacture of this appliance he established a large works at New ark, N. J., and continued there till 1876, when he removed to Menlo Park, N. J., and thenceforth devoted his whole attention to inventing. Among his principal inventions are his system of duplex telegraphy, which he developed into quadruplex and sextuplex transmission; the carbon telephone transmitter, now used by nearly all telephones throughout the world, in which the variation in the current is produced by the variable resistance of a solid conductor subjected to pressure, rendering more faithfully than any other telephone the inflections and changes in the intensity of the vocal sounds to be transmitted; the microtachometer, used for the detection, on the same principle, of small variations in temperature, and successfully employed during the total eclipse of 1878 to demonstrate the heat in the sun's corona; the aerophone, which may be used to amplify sound without impairing the distinctness of articulation; and the megaphone, which, when inserted in the ear, so magnifies sounds that faint whispers may be heard at a distance of 1,000 feet. The phonograph and phonometer, invented in such a manner that it may be reproduced at will, and the phonometer and apparatus for measuring the force of sound-waves produced by the human voice, are inventions of this period. His attention then became absorbed in the problem of electric lighting. He believed that the best method of lighting by the voltaic arc, in which great results had already been achieved by Charles F. Brush, would never answer for general illumination, and so devoted himself to the perfection of the incandescent lamp. After careful experiments with a device for a lamp with a platinum burner, he adopted a filament of carbon inclosed in a glass chamber from which the air was almost completely exhausted. He also solved the problem of the commercial subdivision of the light in a system of general distribution of electricity, like gas, and in December, 1879, gave a public exhibition in Menlo Park of a complete system of electric lighting. This was the first instance of subdivision of the electric light, and created great interest throughout the world, especially as scientific experts had testified before a committee of the British House of Commons that in the previous year that such a subdivision was impossible. His system is now in general use, and in 1882 Mr. Edison came to New York for the purpose of supervising its establishment in that city. In 1879 he received the degree of Ph. D. from Union, and during the same year was made a chevalier of the Legion of Honor by the French government.

EDMONDS, Francis W., artist, b. in Hudson, N. Y., Nov. 22, 1806; d. at his country-seat, Brunswick, Westchester co., 7 Feb., 1890. He showed great love for art in his youth, but was a bank examiner in his maturity and is now in New York city till 1855. During this time he studied at the National academy of design, and employed his leisure with his pencil. In 1835 he sent to the academy, under an assumed name, his first picture, "Summy the Tars," which was bought by 1850 till 1860 of the American bank-note company, and his "Barbary Yard," "Sewing-Girl," "Grinding the Sway," and "Mechanic" were engraved on notes printed by that establishment. He was elected an associate of the National academy in 1838, was afterward a trustee and became an Academician in 1840. After this he studied in Europe, and on his return aided in the establishment of the New York gallery of fine arts. Among the better known of his pictures, besides those named above, are "Domi-

EDMONDS, John Worth, jurist, b. in Hudson, N. Y., 13 March, 1799; d. in New York city, 5 April, 1874. He was graduated at Union in 1816, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1819, and began practice in Hudson in 1820. He rose to the rank of colonel of militia, and received from Gov. De Witt Clinton the appointment of state recorder. He was a member of the New York assembly in 1831, and in 1832-3 of the state senate. In 1836-8 he was sent on special missions to the Indians by the government, as interpreter and with several Indian languages. In 1841 he settled in New York city, and resumed law practice. He was appointed one of the state pris-the bill creating that commission. The passage of the Pacific railroad funding act was also largely due to his influence and efforts. He was at the National Republican conventions, held in Chicago in 1880 and 1884, Mr. Edmunds received thirty-four and ninety-three votes respectively for the presidential nomination, each on the first ballot. He was elected president pro tem of the Senate after Mr. Arthur became president of the United States. In the Senate he has served on the committees on commerce, public lands, appropriations, pensions, re- trenchment, private land claims, the library, and the judiciary, and has served as chairman of the last-named committee for several successive Congresses. As a legislator, Senator Edmunds is noted for his legal acumen, his readiness in repartee, and his love of strictly parliamentary procedure. He has been a fearless foe of political jobs and legislative intrigues. He was the author of the act of March 22, 1883, for the suppression of polygamy in Utah and the disfranchisement of those who practice it. This is known as the "Edmunds act," and was upheld by the supreme court in decisions that were rendered on March 22, 1894, in a series of five cases. He was also the chief author of the similar act passed in 1887; and of the act of 1886 prescribing the manner in which electoral votes for president shall be counted. In 1886 he was the leader in the Senate in the attempt to compel President Cleveland to furnish that body with all the documents necessary to show cause for recent removals from office.

EDSON, Josiah, politician, b. about 1710; d. in New York or on Long Island in 1778. He was graduated at Harvard in 1730, and became a noted Tory and estate in British politics. In 1775 he speaks of him in 1771, when he was in the legislature, as one who would ordinarily have had great weight in that body, but who, discouraged by the numbers of the opposition, remained inactive. In 1774 he was one of the "mandamus councillors," and in the same year was driven from his house by a mob, and compelled to take refuge in Boston, under the protection of British troops. At the evacuation of that city in 1776 he went with the army to Halifax, and then to New York. He was a colonel of militia and a deacon of the church. John Trumbull, in his satire "McFingal," alludes to him as "that old simplicity of Edson."

EDSON, Theodore, soldier, b. in Massachusetts in 1888; d. in Rock Island, Ill., 16 Nov., 1870. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1860 and served with honor in the civil war, being chief of ordinance in the department of Virginia and North Carolina in 1864-5. He was brevetted major on 31 Dec., 1862, for services at the battle of Stone River, given his full rank on 3 March, 1863, and commanded various arsenals and ordnance depots, being chief of ordnance in the department of Virginia and North Carolina in 1864-5. He was promoted to major in 1867, and in 1869-70 was instructor in gunnery at West Point.

EDWARDS, Agustin, Chilian capitalist, b. in Serena, Chili, 10 Jan., 1818; d. in Valparaiso, 5 Aug., 1877. He was a Chilian creditor, who, at the National Republican conventions, held in Chicago in 1880 and 1884, Mr. Edmunds received thirty-four and ninety-three votes respectively for the presidential nomination, on the first ballot. He was elected president pro tem of the Senate after Mr. Arthur became president of the United States. In the Senate he has served on the committees on commerce, public lands, appropriations, pensions, re- trenchment, private land claims, the library, and the judiciary, and has served as chairman of the last-named committee for several successive Congresses. As a legislator, Senator Edmunds is noted for his legal acumen, his readiness in repartee, and his love of strictly parliamentary procedure. He has been a fearless foe of political jobs and legislative intrigues. He was the author of the act of March 22, 1883, for the suppression of polygamy in Utah and the disfranchisement of those who practice it. This is known as the "Edmunds act," and was upheld by the supreme court in decisions that were rendered on March 22, 1894, in a series of five cases. He was also the chief author of the similar act passed in 1887; and of the act of 1886 prescribing the manner in which electoral votes for president shall be counted. In 1886 he was the leader in the Senate in the attempt to compel President Cleveland to furnish that body with all the documents necessary to show cause for recent removals from office.

EDWARDS, Bryan, English author, b. in Westbury, Wilts, England, 21 May, 1743; d. in England, 13 July, 1808. He received a fair education at Briston, and emigrated in 1769 to Jamaica to live with a rich uncle, who gave him the means of completing his education, and made him his heir. He became an eminent merchant and prominent member of the colonial assembly, where he attacked the restrictions made by the govern- ment on trade with the United States. He afterward went to Santo Domingo, where he spent several years in collecting materials for his work on that island. He then returned to England, and from 1790 till his death was a member of the house of commons, where he was a zealous defender of the creole planters against Wilberforce's attacks on slavery and the slave-trade. He published "Thoughts on the Trade of the West India Islands with the United States" (1784); "History of the British Colonies in the West Indies" (2 vols., London, 1793; vol. 3, with a supplement, 1795); and two new volumes, 5 vols., 1819; abridgment of the first three vols., 3 vols., 1794). The third volume contains also a "History of Santo Domingo" (first published in 1791; 2d ed., 1797) and an autobiography. Mr. Edwards also published,"Conduct of the Government and Colonial Assembly of Jamaica in regard to Fugitive Slaves" (London, 1796), and printed privately "Proceedings of the Association for promoting the Discovery of the Interior Parts of Africa" (1798), and a volume of poems.

EDWARDS, Charles, lawyer, b. in Norwich, England, 17 March, 1777; d. in New York city, 30 May, 1858. He was graduated at Cambridge, removed to New York, practised law, and was for twenty-five years counsel to the British consulate in that city. He was the author of the "Jurymen's Guide" (1821); "Parties to Bills" (1821); "Plea in Chancery Cases" (1853); "Cases from My Own Writings" (1833); "Receivers in Chancery" (1839-40); "Reports of Chancery Cases, First New York Circuit" (1831-45) (4 vols.); "History and Poetry of Finger-Rings" (1853); "Receivers in Equity" (1847); "Referees" (1857); "References to Mortgages" (1852); "References in Equity" (1855); "References in Bankruptcy" (1856); "References in Cases" (1858); and "Debts in Bankruptcy" (1862) and "Pleas for the Liberty of Courts and Lawyers" (1865). His son, Pierrepont, has been for many years British vice-consul in New York.

Vol. II.—20
EDWARDS, Cyrus, lawyer, b. in Montgomery county, Md., 17 Jan., 1838; d. in Upper Alton, Ill., in September, 1871. In the early history of Alton he was one of its most prominent and useful citizens. He was frequently elected to the legislature, and was especially conspicuous as a friend of education. He was active in originating the State normal school in Alton. From 1870 to 1873 he was the president of the board of trustees of Shurtleff College, to which institution he gave real estate valued at $10,000, besides other generous donations. He received the degree of LL. D.

EDWARDS, Jesse, clergyman, b. in Elmina, N. Y., 21 Feb., 1814; d. in Plover, Wis., 8 Feb., 1866. He was graduated at Princeton theological seminary in 1842, and licensed to preach the same year. Removing to Indiana, he was ordained in 1845, and labored at Delphi, Rock Creek, and Monticello until 1847, when he returned to New York and preached at Batavia and Portageville. In 1850 he went to Wisconsin as a missionary, and engaged in that work at Plover, Portage county, Stevens Point, and Grand Rapids. While thus employed he was (1859) elected professor of Latin and Greek at Carroll college, Waukesha, Wis., which institution he founded in 1861. He returned to Plover. Mr. Edwards was distinguished for his biblical scholarship.

EDWARDS, John, senator, b. in Virginia in 1753; d. in Bourbon county, Ky., in 1837. In 1780 he removed to that portion of Virginia now comprised in the state of Kentucky, and entered 28,000 acres. He was a member of the state legislature from 1781 till 1783, again in 1795, and from 1796 till 1800. He was a delegate in the conventions of 1785-7 and '8, called to set off the state of Kentucky, and he was a member of the convention that ratified the Federal constitution, and to that held in 1792, which framed the constitution of the state. He was a United States senator from Kentucky from 24 Oct., 1793, till 3 March, 1803. About 1800 he retired from public life.

EDWARDS, John, b. 3 Feb., 1819, in Llanuwchyllyn, Wales, 15 April, 1806; d. near Rome, N. Y., 20 Jan., 1887. He was educated in his native place, where he resided until the age of twenty-two, when he settled in Utica, N. Y., near which town he purchased a farm in 1828. In 1834 he removed to the city of New York, where he established a successful law practice, and then returned to his farm in Oneida county. In 1866 he purchased a small farm in the suburbs of Rome, N. Y., where he resided until his death. In his native land, and among the Welsh inhabitants of America, Mr. Edwards was known as Eos Gwan Twrch ("the nightingale of the Twrch"), his birthplace being on the banks of the river Twrch. He began to write at an early age, and soon became a successful competitor for the prizes awarded at the "Eisteddfodau"—the annual gatherings of the Welsh people—for the best songs and prose essays. His name was among the foremost in this connection with these yearly festivals, and he was an adjudicator in many of them. To his influence and labors some of the earliest Welsh periodicals in America are indebted for their successful establishment. He was the author of many of these periodicals, and was a contributor, and one of, "Anseriai," published in Utica, N. Y., he was editor. His published poems include "The Crucifixion" (1853) and "The Omniscience of God" (1839).

EDWARDS, John, lawyer, b. in Jefferson county, Ky., 1841. He received a common school education, studied law, and entered upon the practice of his profession. He was a member of the legislature of Indiana from 1845 till 1849, when he emigrated to California, and was at once made a citizen. He returned to Indiana in 1852, and was in the same year admitted to the bar. He removed subsequently to Iowa, was chosen a member of the State constitutional convention in 1855, and was in the legislature from 1856 till 1860, serving the last two years as speaker of the house. On the outbreak of the war he was appointed lieutenant-colonel and aide-de-camp to the state staff. He organized and commanded state troops until May, 1862, when he became colonel of the 18th Iowa infantry. On 26 Sept., 1864, he was promoted to brigadier-general of volunteers, and was mustered out of the service, 15 Jan., 1865. After the close of the war he settled at Fort Smith, Ark., and was appointed U. S. assessor, 6 Aug., 1866. He was also elected a member of the 42d congress as a liberal Republican, but his election was successfully contested by Thomas Bole, who took his seat, 9 June, 1872.

EDWARDS, John Ellis, clergyman, b. in Guilford county, N. C., 1 Aug., 1814. He was graduated at Randolph-Macon college, Va., which also conferred upon him the degree of D. D. Dr. Edwards entered the Methodist ministry in 1834, and has been one of the preachers of his church since that time, with the exception of the period occupied by a European tour in 1856. He was stationed for twenty-one years at Richmond, Va., and has represented the Virginia conference in the quadrennial sessions of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal church south for thirty years. He also was present as a representative of the same body in the Centennial conference held in Baltimore in December, 1884. Dr. Edwards is the author of "Travels in Europe" (New York, 1857); "Life and Rev. E. J. Childs" (Philadelphia, 1851); "The Confederate Soldier" (1868); and "Log Meeting-House," etc. (Nashville, 1884), and of addresses, tracts, etc.—His son, Landon Bramen, physician, b. in Prince Edward county, Va., 29 Sept., 1845, was educated at Randolph-Macon college. In 1865 he enlisted in the artillery corps of the Confederate army, in which he served until the end of the war. He was graduated at the medical department of the University of the city of New York in March, 1867, and until October of that year served as house physician in the Charity hospital, and as assistant physician to the hospital for nervous diseases at Lake Mohopac, N. Y. In 1868 he began to practice at Lynchburg, Va., and was largely instrumental in founding the Medical society of Virginia in 1870, of which he is recording secretary. In 1872 he was made a member of the State board of health, and the same year removed to Richmond. In April, 1874, he established the "Virginia Medical Monthly," and about the same time he was appointed lecturer on anatomy in the Virginia medical college, in 1875 lecturer in the same college on materia medica and therapeutics, and in 1880 on medicolegal jurisprudence. Dr. Edwards is a member of many professional societies, and has contributed frequently to other medical journals besides his own. Among the subjects he has discussed and reviewed are "Narcotic Poisonings," "A Man's Right to Eat Uter," and "Strychnia in Tremulous Effects of Tobacco-Smoking."—Another son, William Emory, clergyman, b. in Prince Edward county, Va., 10 June, 1842, was graduated at Randolph-Macon college in 1862, and has since been a clergyman of the Methodist Episcopal church on the western territory of the Virginia conference, and has received the degree of D. D. He is the author of "John Newsom; a Tale of College Life" (Nashville, 1889).
EDWARDS, Justin, clergyman, great-grandson of Samuel, b. in Westhampton, Mass., 25 April, 1787; d. at Bath Alum., Va., 28 July, 1833. He was descended from Alexander Edwards, who emigrated from Wales, and resided at Northampton, Mass., in 1635-90, and whose son, Samuel, died in 1749. Justin was graduated at Williams in 1810, and in 1811 began at Andover a theological course, which he did not finish. Being earnestly pressed to become pastor of the "South" parish, comprising nearly 2,000 parishioners without other religious assistance, he reluctantly accepted the call, was ordained 2 Dec., 1812. In 1817 he was elected a member of the executive committee of the New England tract society, and in 1821 was chosen corresponding secretary, by which the labor and responsibility of superintending the press and directly managing the business of the association officially devolved upon him. Early in 1825 he united with the Rev. Dr. Woods and fourteen others in organizing in Boston the "American Society for the Promotion of Temperance." In 1827 he was one of several prominent New York and New England divines who, with Dr. C. J. Cutler, Dr. J. S. G. Millet, Elihu Low, and Dr. Y., to discuss the subject of religious revivals, and the same year was honored with the degree of D. D. by Yale. About this time he applied for and received a release from the pastoral relation, and had entered on his duties as agent of the American temperance society when he declined to accept a call from a new church in Salem street, Boston. Here he labored so zealously, that, by the following summer, his failing health compelled him to resign. Dr. Edwards was now free to return to his temperance work, in which he engaged with unusual zeal and the energy for the next six years (1830-6). During this period he travelled extensively, arousing the public to the importance of the reform, and wrote several papers known as "Permanent Temperance Documents." In 1836 he was elected president of the Andover theological seminary, which office he held for nearly six years. His attention was now directed to the proper observance of the Sabbath, and when the American and foreign Sabbath union was organized in Boston he became its secretary. From 1842 till 1849 he was laboriously engaged in doing for the Sabbath what he had previously done for the cause of temperance, not only travelling extensively and delivering addresses in every part of the country, but writing another set of "Permanent Documents," which probably form the ablest condensed plea for the Sabbath that the language affords. The last four years of his life were chiefly occupied in the preparation of a condensed commentary on the Scriptures at the request of the American tract society. He had completed the work, so far as the New Testament was concerned, and had proceeded with the Old Testament as far as the 50th Psalm. Dr. Edwards published many sermons and addresses, and was the author of the following tracts issued by the American tract society: No. 167, "Well-conditioned Farm" (on temperance); No. 177, "Joy in Heaven over One Sinner," etc.; No. 178, "The Mystery of the SAVED!"; No. 179, "On the Traffic in Ardent Spirits!"; No. 582, "The Uction from the Holy One." Of the first four, 750,000 copies were printed prior to 1857. Of his "Sabbath Manual," 598,544 were called for; of the "Temperance Manual," 198,623; and more than 70,000 of the commentary on the New Testament. A memoir of his life and labors, by Rev. Dr. William Hallock, was published by the Tract society in 1854. - Bela Bates, clergyman, another great-grandson of Samuel, mentioned in the preceding sketch, b. in Southampton, Mass., 4 July, 1802; d. in Athens, Ga., 20 April, 1852. He was graduated at Amherst in 1824, and at Andover in 1830. He was licensed to preach in the latter year, but was never ordained. After serving as tutor at Amherst, he acted as assistant secretary of the American education society in 1830-3. He edited the "American Quarterly Register," 1828-42; the "American Quarterly Observer," which he founded, in 1833-5; the "American Biblical Repository," with which the latter was united, in 1835-8; and the "Bibliotheca Sacra," in 1844-52. He was appointed librarian of Andover theological seminary in 1837, received the degree of D. D. from Dartmouth in 1844, and in 1848 was elected associate professor of sacred literature. During his twenty-four years of editorial labor he issued thirty-one octavo volumes of the periodicals with which he was connected. His work in connection with the "Quarterly Register" was especially valuable. He designed to make it a storehouse of facts for present and future generations, and it contains indispensable materials for the historian. In the pages of the other periodicals named, Dr. Edwards's contributions were particularly rich in criticism, especially biblical literature and disquisitions on the science of education. While occupied with his labors in this field he published several works, among which are the "Ecclesiastes" (1855); "Biography of Self-Taught Men" (1851); "Memoirs of Henry Martyn," with an introductory essay (1851); "Memoirs of E. Cornelius" (1853); a volume on the "Epistle to the Galatians"; and the "Missionary Gazette" (1852). He was also a frequent contributor to the religious press, and wrote various pamphlets and the more important parts of several books in collaboration with Profs. Sears, Felton, and Park. Among the latter are "Selections from German Literature" and "Classical Studies." He was also associated with Samuel H. Taylor in the translation of Kühner's Greek Grammar." In 1845 he was compelled to visit Florida for his health, and on his return sailed for Europe, where he spent a year. In 1851 he was again compelled to go south, and was residing there the following winter, when he died. He was an ideal editor and professor, uniting great erudition and a sound judgment with truth and uniform piety. A selection from his sermons and addresses, with a memoir by Prof. Edwards A. Park, was published in Boston in 1853. courses, he was the author of "Materials toward a History of the Baptists of Pennsylvania" (1772), and "Materials toward a History of the Baptists in Jersey" (1782). He also left a large collection of manuscript records, which have proved of great value to subsequent writers. He received the degree of A.M. from the College of Philadelphia in 1782, and from Rhode Island College in 1788.

EDWARDS, Ninian, senator, b. in Montgomery county, Md., in March, 1778; d. in Belleville, Ill., 20 July, 1833. His education was at one time directed by William Wirt, and was completed at Dickinson college, Pa. At the age of twenty he removed from the Green river district in Kentucky. He studied both medicine and law, but, deciding in favor of the latter, was admitted to the bar in 1798 in Kentucky, and in 1799 in Tennessee. He had previously been elected to the Kentucky legislature before he was twenty-one. He rose rapidly in his profession, and was appointed first clerk, and then judge, of the general court of Kentucky, judge of the circuit court in 1808, of the court of appeals in 1806, and in 1808 chief justice of the state, before he had attained his thirty-second year. In 1809 President Madison appointed him governor of Illinois, as the organization of that territory, and he retained the office till its admission to the Union in 1818. Before congress had adopted any measures on the subject of volunteer regiments, he organized companies, supplied them with arms, built stockade forts, and established a line of posts from the mouth of the Missouri to the Wabash river. He was thus prepared for defense, and during the war of 1812 and the frontier wars with the Indians, his precautionary measures were greatly appreciated. In 1818 he was appointed one of the three commissioners to treat with the Indian tribes. He was one of the first two United States senators from Illinois, having been elected as a Democrat, and serving from 4 Dec., 1818, till 4 March, 1824, when he resigned, to accept the appointment of minister to Mexico. He had reached New Orleans on his way to his post, when he was recalled, in consequence of charges made against him by William H. Crawford, then secretary of the treasury. He was again elected governor of Illinois and served from 1826 to 1830. See "History of Illinois and Life of Ninian Edwards" by Ninian W. Edwards (1878); and "The Edwards Papers," being vol. iii. of the Chicago historical society's collections (Chicago, 1884).

His son, Ninian Wirt, lawyer, b. in Frankfort, Ky., 15 April, 1809, was taken by his father, when an infant, to Kaskaskia, then the capital of Illinois territory. He was graduated at the " kwislymav" university, and at its law department in 1833. Before his graduation he was married to Elizabeth P. Todd, a sister of Mrs. Abraham Lincoln. Mr. Edwards began the practice of law in 1833, and in 1834 was appointed attorney-general of Illinois, but resigned in 1835, and returned to Springfield. In 1836 he was elected to the legislature, and with Abraham Lincoln and others was active in securing the removal of the capital to Springfield. Mr. Edwards remained a member of the legislature continuously till 1852. During this period he was also a member of the convention that framed the State constitution in 1848. In 1854 he was appointed by the governor attorney before the board of commissioners whose duty it was to investigate the claims of canal proprietors against the state, and was succeeded in that office by John Pemberton, who was later appointed the state’s attorney general.

EDWARDS, Oliver, soldier, b. in Springfield, Mass., 30 Jan., 1835. He was graduated at the Springfield high-school in 1852. At the beginning of the civil war Mr. Edwards was commissioned 1st lieutenant and adjutant of the 10th Massachusetts regiment, and in January, 1862, was appointed senior aide-de-camp on the staff of Gen. Darius N. Couch. He was commissioned major of the 37th Massachusetts on 9 Aug., and was promoted colonel on 27 Aug. On 19 Oct., 1864, he was brevetted brigadier-general for gallantry at the battle of Spottsylvania Court-House, and for meritorious services at the battle of the Opequon. He was brevetted major-general, 5 May, 1865, "for conspicuous gallantry in the battle of Sailor's Creek, Va.," and was made a full brigadier-general, 10 Aug., 1865, for his services at the Peninsula campaign of 1862, and those of Fredericksburg and Gettysburg. Gen. Edwards was ordered to New York city in command of a picked provisional brigade, to quell the draft riots in July, 1863, and placed in command of Fort Hamilton and Fort Lafayette. At the end of the enforcement of the draft, Gen. Edwards returned to the Army of the Potomac, and took part in the battle of Rappahannock. During the second day of the battle of the Wilderness, when in command of the 4th brigade, 2d division, 6th army corps, he made a charge at the enemy with his regiment, making twenty-five hundred holes of continuous fighting. He subsequently participated in all the battles of the overland campaign, and accompanied the 6th corps when sent to the defense of Washington against the advance of Early. He afterward went to command the 12th corps in the Shenandoah valley, and took part in the battle of Winchester, of which town he was placed in command by that officer. The latter also offered him the provost-marshal-generalship of the middle military division, but he declined it, and purchased the fine old property, named his former apartment The Pillars of Hercules.

EADINGTON, John, b. in Princeeton, Conn., Aug. 9, 1800; d. in New Jersey, July 7, 1870. His brother, William, b. in the same place, Aug. 8, 1804, d. in New Jersey, Aug. 8, 1852, was a merchant, banker and shipowner, who left a large fortune to his younger brother.

EDWARDS, Timothy, clergyman, b. in Harford, Conn., 14 May, 1689; d. in East Windsor, Conn., 27 Jan., 1756. The Edwards family is of Welsh origin, the earliest known ancestor being the Rev. Richard Edwards, who, it is supposed, left Wales in the time of Queen Elizabeth, and settled in Oxford, or London, as a clergyman of the established church. His son, William, accompanied his mother to this country, she having been left a widow and married again, and took up his residence in New England. His brother, Richard, a successful merchant, son of William, was the father of Timothy. He latter was graduated at Harvard in 1691, receiving both his degree the same day—one in the morning, the other in the afternoon, "an uncommon mark of respect," say the East Windsor records, "paid to his extraordinary proficiency in learning." After pursing the usual theological course, he was licensed to preach, and ordained pastor over the church in East Windsor in 1694, where— with the exception of a few weeks' absence in 1711, when appointed chaplain to the Connecticut troops in a military expedition to Canada—he remained nearly sixty-four years. When he was eighty-six years of age an assistant was given him, at his request.
His wife, a daughter of the Rev. Solomon Stoddard, of Northampton, Mass., a woman of strong intelligence and much cultivation, died in her ninety-ning years, on a fast day, while he was temporary pastor there, and, until he was over seventy, without noting down the heads of his discourse.
He is known to have written out one sermon, that delivered on the occasion of the general election of 1732. He lived until within a few months of his son's death, and the latter often visited him, and was heard in his father's pulpit. Compare the two, it is said to have been customary for the parishioners to remark that, "although Mr.
Edwards was, perhaps, the more learned man, and more animated in his manner, yet 'Mr. Jonathan' was the deeper preacher."—His son, Jonathan, theologian, b. in East Windsor, Conn., 5 Oct., 1703;
d. in Princeton, N. J., 22 March, 1758, was the fifth of eleven children and the only son. At a very early age his uncommon genius began to discover itself.
About the age of fourteen he wrote a pamphlet,
"On the Rule of the Soul.
"The Wondrous Way of the Working of the Spider." He was prepared for college by his father and sister, and in September, 1719, when only twelve years old, entered Yale college, and was graduated in 1720. While in college his "character was marked with sobriety and improvement in learning." The book which at this time "inexpressibly entertained and pleased him" was Locke's "Essay on the Human Understanding." Though he showed proficiency in all the studies of the college course, including natural philosophy, which he cultivated to the end of his life, moral philosophy and divinity were his favorite subjects. Brought up in a household and community that were eminently religious, he had from his childhood "a variety of concerns and exercises about his soul," but found a painful stumble-
block to his spiritual progress in the doctrine of God's "sovereignty," which appeared to him "a horrid doctrine." At length, while in college, how or by what means he could never tell, his dif-
"God's absolute sovereignty and justice with regard to salvation and damnation." This change of condition was attended with "an inward sweet delight in God." His sense of divine things would often suddenly kindle up "a sweet burning in his heart." Having conversed with his father, he became satisfied of his "good state," united with the church, and accepted the Christian ministry as his true calling. With the purpose of his life now frankly plain, he remained at college two years after his graduation as a student of divinity. In Au-

September, 1728, Mr. Edwards was invited by several congregations to become their minister, but he declined all these calls, as well as a request to return to New York, preferring to accept the position of tutor in Yale college, at that time offered him. He continued for two years. In the summer of 1726 he was invited to become the colleague of his grandfather, Solomon Stoddard, in the pasto-rship of the church at Northampton, Mass. He accepted this call, resigned his tutorship in September, 1728, and was ordained to his office in February, 1727, in the twenty-fourth year of his age. On 28 July of the same year he married Sarah Pierrepont, daughter of a minister at New Haven.
In 1728 the senior pastor died, leaving the young minister alone. For about seventeen years his settlement at Northampton was happy and eminently useful. His fame as a preacher grew rapidly and was very great. In July, 1781, he delivered the Thursday lecture in Boston, and his discourse was printed and much approved. He regarded the Arminian doctrines, then very prevalent, as dangerous in their practical tendency, and in 1784 preached a series of sermons of a Calvinistic character, among which was an elaborate discourse on "Faith and Works." He afterwards declared, in a wonderful religious awakening began in his congregation, exceeding anything that had been known in any part of the country. In the year 1740 the Rev. George Whitfield visited Mr. Edwards, spending four days with him, and preaching several sermons. In the year following, the revival extended far and wide through New England, and Mr. Edwards's services were eagerly sought by ministers and people in promoting the work. His preaching was attended with great success, and one sermon in particular, entitled "Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God," delivered at Enfield, was attended with extraordinary impressions. To guard against fanatical excesses he wrote and published about this time "The Distinguishing Marks of a Work of the Spirit of God," "Thoughts concerning the Present Revival of Religion," and his famous "Treatise on Religious Affections." At this moment of general religious prosperity, and when Mr. Edwards was at the height of his fame and usefulness, a great reverse came, entailing the heaviest trial of his life. In 1744 he received information that some young persons, members of his church, had in their possession impure books, which were causing an alarming demoralization. He sought to have the church investigate the matter, with a view to suitable discipline. The church, finding that a great scandal was likely to follow inquiry, refused to co-operate with the pastoral wishes, and let the matter drop. This painful affair weakened his influence, especially as it was connected with a system of organization to which the Northampton church was committed, and to which Mr. Edwards was strongly opposed.
His predecessor had favored what was known as the "half-way covenant," and under his ministry the church had practically, though not formally, adopted it. According to this plan, unconverted persons were admitted to the Lord's supper, and their children to the rite of baptism. This was a distinct departure from the old Congregational rule, which restricted admission to the church and its ordinances to those who professed personal religious convictions and aims. When it was known that Mr. Edwards desired to enforce the old rule, a storm of opposition rose against him, and there was a general cry that he should be dismissed. He proposed to deliver a course of lectures on the subjects in dispute, but his request was refused, and at length, 22 June, 1750, after long and fruitless efforts to avoid this result, he was forced to resign, thus losing a ministry in Northampton of nearly twenty-four years. With a large family and little income aside from his salary, his situation was painful in the extreme. He was not left, however, without substantial tokens of sympathy. His friends in Scotland invited him to establish himself in London, and at once subscribed to a considerable sum of money. Samuel Davies, of Virginia, entreated him to remove to that state, offering to surrender to him his own parish, and not a few of the people of Northampton adhered to him, and would have been glad to maintain him, had he been willing to come forth from his own. He refused to accept an offer, from the London society for propagating the gospel, to become a missionary to the remnant of the Housatonic Indians at Stockbridge, whither he removed in August, 1751.
At the same time the white inhabitants of the town asked him to become their pastor. This exile at Stockbridge was not without its compensations, especially in the fact that he had more leisure than ever before to prosecute the studies that were dear to him. His preaching to the Indians was without notes, aided by an interpreter. His slender health was slightly augmented by the delicate handiwork of his wife and daughters, which was sent to Boston to be sold. While discharging his duties as a mis-ionary with fidelity, he was able in this period of retirement to complete several of those masterpieces on which his fame especially rests. His mind was filled with plans of numerous treatises, when his studies were interrupted by the death of his son-in-law, President Burr, of Princeton college, and an unexpected call to succeed him. With modest reluctance he accepted the call, and was inand benignity. With a feeble constitution, his voice, though clear, was not strong. He used little gesture, and resorted to none of the arts of the orator. Still, his sermons were so scriptural in matter, so strong and lucid in thought, so marked by deep knowledge of human nature, by simplicity and a deep sympathy with suffering, so glowing with the central heat of intense earnestness, that they held the closest attention, and often produced great effects. They are still read with the deepest interest, while those of Whittfeld are forgotten. It is especially on his character as a theologian, that he will remain. A man with restless, he was not by any means a merely "dry and cold thinker," but his highest strength undoubtedly lay in the region of pure thought. He was emphatically an original thinker. He was not widely learned, and with slender opportunities of acquaintance with the works of contemporary writers, it is clear that he drew his materials almost entirely from his own reflections and resources. Though the best impulse to his mind was early given by Locke, he was far from accepting that great man as his intellectual master, and explicitly rejected many of Locke's ideas, and inclined rather to that system which in Europe had found its representatives in Malebranche and Leibnitz. His attachment to the system known as Calvinism was intense, and in the defence of this system he produced his greatest works, his immortal treatise "On the Freedom of the Will" (1734) at a conclusive settlement of the main points in controversy between the Calvinists and Arminians. He here maintains that the law of causality extends to every action. Liberty consists in the power of doing good without a motive. The will always follows the greatest seeming good, and what shall seem to a man the greatest good depends on the state of his soul. Liberty is not in the act but in the man, and, if a depraved nature is to abstain from sin, it can only be done by a change of heart. Whatever may be thought of the conclusions of this treatise, there have never been two opinions as to its extraordinary ability. Edwards's justification of virtue, in his treatise on that subject, as "the love of being," has provoked dissent on the part of many who have perused it, and the whole treatise is a guide. The estimate of Edwards by competent judges puts him in the front rank of great men. Dr. Chalmers says that "on the arena of metaphysicians he stood highest of all his contemporaries." Sir James Mackintosh spoke of him as "a most extraordinary man, who, in a metaphysical age or country, would certainly have been deemed as much the boast of America as his great contemporary, Franklin," and that he gives us a "way of power of subtle argument he was perhaps unmatched, certainly unsurpassed, among men." Dugald Stewart declared "there is, however, one metaphysician of whom America has to boast, who, in logical acuteness and subtlety, does not yield to any disputant before whom he has put his question. He is, I allude to Jonathan Edwards." The influence of Edwards was very great in the spiritual history of England and this country, especially of New England, whose leading minds, in the age following his death, showed his moulding hand. Bellamy and Hopkins were his pupils. Dec penned not only Expositor; Smalley, Emmons, and many others were his followers. Through Hopkins his influence reached Kirkland, and assisted in forming the character of Channing. Edwards sums up the old theology of New England, and is the fountainhead of the new. Besides works mentioned above, Edwards published "Treatise Concerning the Religious Affections" (1746); "Inquiry into the Qualifications for Free Communion in the Church" (1749); "Original Sin" (1757); "True Nature of the Christian Virtue" (1888); "The Great End of the World" (1789); "Thoughts on the Revival of Religion"; "History of the Redemption"; and a "Life of David Brainerd." There have been two editions of his works in England, one in eight volumes, octavo, and one in two volumes. The former are the best editions. They include that edited by Samuel Austin (8 vols., Worcester, Mass., 1809); that by Sereno E. Dwight, with a memoir (10 vols., New York, 1830); and a later one in a more convenient form (4 vols., 1832). There are several lives of Jonathan Edwards; the most interesting is that by Samuel Hopkins, who was his pupil; the fullest is that by Sereno Edwards Dwight, in the edition of his works mentioned above. There is also a memoir by Dr. Samuel Miller in Sparks's "American Biographists," and another by Miss Eminent Literary and Scientific Men of América" (New York, 1850). —Timothy, judge, eldest son of Jonathan, b. in Northampton, Mass., 25 July, 1738; d. in Stockbridge, Mass., 27 Oct., 1813. He was graduated at Princeton in 1757, and began business in the lumber trade. He then moved to Stockbridge about 1770, where he was a leading citizen for forty-three years, and sat as judge of probate for Berkshire county. He had fifteen children. —His son, William, inventor, b. in Elizabethtown, N. J., 11 Nov., 1770; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 1 Dec., 1850. He came, now employed in nearly all American tanneries, by which leather is made in about one fourth of the time required by the old European processes. His first tannery was built at Northampton, Mass., and the first leather made in it was sent to London in 1781. Increased the supply of hemlock-bark in the Connecticut valley, he removed, in 1817, to Hunter, Greene co., N. Y., and erected a model tannery on Schoharie creek. It was in the midst of the hemlock forests of the Catskill mountains, on an estate of twelve hundred acres. In 1822, Mr. Edwards (he was assisted in business by his son), in connection with Jacob Lorillard, purchased the real estate of the company (an act of incorporation having been granted), which had been unsuccessful, greatly enlarged the business, and made many improvements in the machinery. From this establishment about 10,000 sides of sole-leather were sent to the city of New York annually. Mr. Edwards not only invented several machines, but adapted many devices previously used for other purposes to the art of tanning, thus largely substituting water-power for manual labor. His rolling machine was considered especially valuable, is still in use in nearly its original form, and gives to leather the smoothness of surface and solidity of texture peculiar to the hammered article. —Jonathan, Jr., theologian, second son of the father, was born in Northampton, Mass., 26 May, 1745; d. in Schenectady, N. Y., 1 Aug., 1801. When he was six years old the family removed to Stockbridge, at that time almost solely inhabited by Indians. Here he became so proficient in the Indian language as to surpass in the thoroughness of his knowledge than any Americans of that day. As it was his father's wish that he should become a missionary to the aborigines, he was sent, in 1755, to the Rev. Gideon Hawley, who was stationed on the Susquehanna river, to learn the dialect of the Oneidas. In consequence of the breaking out of war between England and France, in which the colonies were involved, young Edwards remained there only six months, and acquired but an imperfect knowledge of the language. The death of his father, soon followed by that of his mother, and their removal to Princeton, N. J., materially changed his plans. Although left with insufficient means to complete his education, he determined to go forward, and, with the aid of friends, entered the grammar-school at Princeton in February, 1760. The following year he matriculated at the College of New Jersey, which institution he was graduated in 1765. He began the study of theology under the Rev. Joseph Bellamy, D. D., and received a licence to preach from the Association of Litchfield county, Conn., in 1766. In 1767 he was appointed tutor at Princeton, where he remained for two years, till he became, in January, 1769, pastor of the society at White Haven, Conn. Several members of his church were advocates of the “half-way covenant,” while he, like his father, definitely opposed it. His pastorate was also disturbed by the reaction among the people and church toward the extravagances that accompanied the “great awakening” of 1740–2, and by the demoralizing influences of the Revolutionary war. The result of these un-toward circumstances was a dismissal from his charge, 10 May, 1785, for the ostensible reason that the society was unable to support a minister. In 1796 he was called to the church in Colebrook, Litchfield co., Conn. Here, in a retired country parish, he found opportunity to pursue his favorite theological and metaphysical inquiries, and would have been willing to spend the remainder of his days there; but he was called, in the summer of 1799, to the presidency of the then recently established college at Schenectady, N. Y. He was warmly welcomed by both students and citizens, and the talent for government that he subsequently displayed surprised even those who knew him best, his discipline being mild and affectionately parental; but he died the second summer after his inauguration. He received the degree of D. D. from the College of New Jersey in 1785. His career resembled that of his distinguished father in so many particulars that the coincidence has attracted universal attention. They bore the same name, and were distinguished scholars and divines. Both were tutors for equal periods in the colleges where they were respectively educated. Both, after being settled in the ministry, were dismissed on account of their doctrinal opinions, and were again settled in retired places, where they had leisure to prepare and publish their works. Both were called from the discharge of these duties to be presidents of colleges, and both died shortly after inauguration, one in the fifty-fifth and the other in the sixty-sixth year of his age. Each was having preached on the first Sabbath of the year from the text, “This year thou shalt die.” Nor was this resemblance confined merely to outward circumstances; intellectually the two men were much alike. Dr. Jonathan's inscription is the same. He said it was the “father who had more reason than the son; yet the son was a better reasoner than the father”; and Dr. Samuel Miller, of Princeton, remarked that “the son greatly resembled his venerable father in metaphysical acuteness, ardent piety, and the purest exhibition of Christian deportment.” Of the younger Edwards devoted a large portion of his life to the study and interpretation of his father's writings. He was thus well fitted to edit the latter's works, and did prepare for the press the "History of the Work of Redemption," two volumes of sermons, and two volumes of "Miscellaneous Observations on Important Theological Subjects." In 1797 Dr. Edwards published "A Dissertation concerning Liberty and Necessity," which is, perhaps, the fairest exposition extant of the father's "theory of the will." He also printed numerous articles in the "New York Theological Magazine," under the signatures "I "O," and many sermons in which his views were carefully elaborated. Among the latter may be mentioned three discourses "On the Necessity of the Atonement and its Consequences," "On the True View of God's Love and of Human Sin," and "On the Power of Prayer." They have been frequently reprinted, and form the basis of what is now known as the "Edwardsian theory of the atonement." Dr. Edwards also ranked high as a philosopher, and his "Observations on the Language and Manners of the Mulattoes of the New Orleans Islands," etc., elicited the enthusiastic praises of Humboldt. Nearly all his published writings were reprinted in two octavo volumes, edited, with a memoir, by Tryon Edwards (Andover, 1842).—Jonathan Walter, lawyer, only son of the second Jonathan, b. in New Haven, Conn., 5 Jan., 1771. He was graduated at Yale in 1799, and was afterward a tutor there. On taking his second degree, he delivered an oration in which he vigorously attacked the then existing state law by which the eldest son received a double portion of his father's property in case the latter died intestate, and the obnoxious statute was repealed in the following year, 1792. He studied law at Litchfield, settled in Hartford, and soon took high rank in his profession. He was gifted with quick perceptive powers, great acuteness in reasoning, and an unerring judgment of language. Unremitting devotion to his legal studies and pursuits finally undermined his health, and led to his early retirement from the more engrossing duties of his profession; his remaining years were mainly devoted to his family and to looking after his large inheritance. Chief Justice Williams has written a sketch of Mr. Edwards, which is contained in an appendix to the "Connecticut Reports."—Jonathan, son of Jonathan Walter, b. in Hartford, Conn., 7 Sept., 1798; d. in New Haven, 28 Aug., 1875, was graduated at Yale in 1819, and was appointed judge of the court of Judge Gould at Litchfield, Conn. He practised for many years in Hartford, where he held the office of judge of probate. About 1840 he removed to Troy, N. Y., of which city he was subsequently chosen mayor. He was also several times elected to the legislature. Tryon, clergyman, another son of Jonathan Walter, b. in Hartford, Conn., 7 Aug., 1809, was graduated at Yale in 1828, studied law in New York, and theology at Princeton, and accepted a pastoral call to Rochester, N. Y., in 1834, whence he removed to New London, Conn., in 1835. He was subsequently a justice of the peace in Hagerstown, Md. (1867), and from there went to Governor, St. Lawrence co., N. Y., in 1860, which charge he was obliged to relinquish in 1888 on account of failing health. While settled at Hagerstown he was largely relied on in the support and organizing Wilson college, of which institution he was chosen the first president. In 1836 a prize tract on Sunday-schools appeared from his pen, and soon afterward "Christianity a Philosophy of Principles." He has since contributed largely to the religious literature, and is the author of numerous pamphlets on theological and book-form. He is the author of "Self-Cultivation" (New York, 1833), and "Light for the Day, or Heavenly Thoughts for Earthly Guidance" (Philadelphia, 1879), partly original and partly selected. In 1842 he edited the works of his grandfather, and in 1850 those of the Rev. Dr. Bellamy (2 vols., Andover). He has prepared for the Sunday-School Society: "Poetry for Children and Youth" (New York, 1851); "Jewels for the Household" (Hartford, 1852); "The World's Laconics" (New York, 1852); "Wonders of the World" (Hartford, 1853); and "Anecdotes for the Family." Several of the foregoing have appeared in rough manuscript and been published in England. He has also edited "Charity and its Fruits" from the manuscripts of the elder President Edwards, and for years had editorial charge of "The Family Christian Almanac."—Pierrepoint, lawyer, youngest son of Jonathan, Sr., b. in Northampton, Mass., 8 April, 1750; d. in Bridgeport, Conn., 5 April, 1826. From the fact that his father was a missionary to the Stockbridge, Mass., Indians, he early became so proficient in their language that he was wont to say that he "thought in Indian." He was graduated at Princeton University, and began the practice of law in New Haven in 1771. He was frequently elected to the legislature, and was appointed administrator of the estate of Benedict Arnold at the time of his treason. He took an early stand in favor of independence, and served in the Revolutionary army for two years, fighting at Bunker Hill. He was a member of the Continental congress of 1787-8, and an able advocate of the constitution of the United States in the convention held to ratify it. He was the founder of the Toleration party in Connecticut, and by his ability and the preservation of himself in the animosity of the Calvinists. At the time of his death he was a judge of the U. S. district court.—Henry Wagaman, senator, son of Pierrepoint, b. in New Haven, Conn., in 1779; d. there, 23 July, 1847, was graduated at Princeton University in 1797, and studied at the Litchfield law-school. He settled in New Haven, and was twice elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 6 Dec., 1819, till 3 March, 1823. He was appointed U. S. senator to fill a vacancy, and subsequently elected for a term, serving from 1 Dec., 1824, till 3 March, 1827. He was afterward elected a member of the state senate (1827), and of the state house of representatives, of which he was chosen speaker in 1880. In 1883 he was elected governor of Connecticut, and again in 1886 and 1888. In 1888 he received the degree of Litt. D. at Harvard. He was in the office as governor he recommended a geological survey of the state, which was accordingly made. —Henry Pierrepoint, lawyer, son of Henry Wagaman, b. in 1809; d. in New York city, 24 Feb., 1855, was judge of the supreme court of New York for over seven years, and sustained a high reputation for independence and legal ability. —Ogden, lawyer, brother of Henry Wagaman, b. in Connecticut in 1781; d. on Staten Island, 1 April, 1862, removed to New York city in the early part of the century, and served for many years as surgeon. He was afterward a member of the legislature, and in 1821 sat in the convention called to revise the constitution of the state. He was subsequently appointed circuit judge of the supreme court, and continued in that office until in 1842 he reached the age when he was no longer eligible. He was once time candidate of the Whig party for governor. —EDWARDS, Weldon Nathaniel, politician, b. in Warren county, N. C., in 1788; d. there, 18 Dec., 1875. He received an academical education, studied law in 1812, and settled at Warrenton, N. C. He was a member of the state house of commons in 1814–15, and was then elected as a democrat to Congress, and re-elected five times, serving from 7 Feb., 1816, to 3 March, 1837. He was elected to the Senate in 1838, successively re-elected until 1844, and again elected in 1860, when he was chosen president of that body. He was a member of the North Carolina constitutional convention in 1855, and president of the State convention that passed the ordinance of secession in 1860. —EDWIN, David, engraver, b. in Bath, England, in December, 1776; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 22 Feb., 1841. He was the son of John Edwin, a comedian. David was apprenticed to Jossi, a Dutch engraver residing in England, who soon returned to Holland, taking his apprentice with him to Amsterdam. Master and boy did not long agree, and the latter left before his term of apprenticeship had expired. Finding himself alone in a foreign land, without either money or friends, he shipped as a sailor on an American vessel bound for Philadelphia, where he eventually reached all the greater part of the country to that time. His copies of the portraits of Gilbert Stuart were especially good. He engraved the pictures of Washington, by Stuart and Peale, and made copies of the portraits of prominent men of the day painted by those artists and by Waldo, Wood, Jarvis, Sully, and Neagle. After twenty years of steady application his eyesight failed, and he was compelled to resort to various methods to obtain a livelihood. He also possessed considerable taste and skill as a musician. A list of Edwin’s original compositions is found in “American Engravers” (Philadelphia, 1875). —EGAN, Maurice Francis, author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 24 May, 1852. He was graduated from La Salle college, and in 1878 became professor of English literature at Georgetown college. On leaving Georgetown he traveled through the western and southern states and Mexico, and engaged in his term of employment in newspapers and magazines articles and letters to the press. On his return he became an editor of the “Catholic Review,” and in 1881 of the “Freeman’s Journal,” of which he is now editor-in-chief (1887). He has published “That Girl of Mine,” and several other anonymous novels (1876); “Preludes,” a collection of his poems that had appeared in various magazines (1880); “Songs and Sonnets” (London, 1885); “The Theatre and Christian Parents” (1885); “Stories of Duty” (1885); “A Garden of Roses” (1886); and “The Life around Us,” a collection of tales, with a strong religious tendency (1886). —EGAN, Michael, R. C. bishop, b. in Ireland; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1814. He was educated in Ireland, where he became a priest of the Franciscan order. He came to the United States in 1802, labored as a missionary at Lancaster, and in 1804 made an unsuccessful attempt to found a province of the Franciscan order in the United States. He was then appointed pastor of St. Mary’s church, Philadelphia. In 1810 he was consecrated bishop of the new diocese of Philadelphia, but was able to exercise the office for only 2 or 3 years, by reason of the death of his predecessor, and the incapacity of the trustees of his cathedral, who insisted on having a voice in the selection of their pastors.

EGAN, Thomas W., soldier, b. in New York city, 1806; d. there, 24 Feb., 1867. He entered the 40th New York regiment at the beginning of the civil war, and was made lieutenant-colonel, 14 June, 1861. In June, 1862, he was promoted colonel, and participated in all the battles of the Army of the Potomac. During Gen. Grant's overland campaign of 1864 he commanded a brigade, receiving his commission 3 Sept., 1864, and was wounded at Petersburg. At the battle of Boydton plank-road he commanded the division, and was brevetted major-general. He was seriously wounded in November, and on recovery was given a division in the Army of the Shenandoah. Gen. Egan was mustered out of the service, 15 Jan., 1866, and subsequently lived in New York.

EGANA, Juan (a-gan'-ya), South American jurist, b. in Lima, Peru, in 1709; d. in Santiago, Chili, 13 April, 1836. He entered the seminary of Sayagiro Toribio in 1725, distinguishing himself as a Latin scholar. At the age of sixteen he was super-numerary professor of philosophy, and in the five subsequent years occupied the chairs of law and theology, and meantime practised at the bar. In 1780 he started for Spain by way of Chili, but was pursued by the Inquisition in the last regent of the supreme court, Francisco A. Moreno, who had been a judge in Lima, and held Egana in great estimation. When, in 1810, Chili threw off the Spanish yoke for the first time, Egana was called by the corporation of Santiago to aid in their work. He was elected a representative to the first congress, where he distinguished himself in debate, and afterward filled several commissions. After the victory of the royalists at Rancagua in October, 1814, Egana was imprisoned in Santiago, and afterward exiled to the island of Juan Fernandez, remaining there until delivered by the victory of San Martin at Chacabuco, 12 Feb., 1817. He then reappeared in active life, with greater prestige for the sufferings he had undergone, and was appointed representative from Santiago to the assembly of plenipotentiaries that fixed on the form of government, and in 1823 presided over congress and the committee in charge of the formation of a constitution, distinguishing himself by his knowledge of history and politics. He was afterward re-elected to congress for several provinces. Egana was the president of a benevolent society in Santiago. He was for several years a senator, and devoted the latter part of his life to literary pursuits, writing numerous historical, geographical, and religious works.—His son, Matarano, Chilian jurist, b. in Santiago, Chili, 18 Sept., 1793; d. there, 24 June, 1844, studied in Spain, and at the age of eighteen was graduated at law. In 1813 he was appointed secretary of the sovereign junta of Chili. After the defeat of the insurgents at Rancagua, Egana was exiled with his father, and on his return to Chili, in 1817, was appointed secretary of the general junta of political and forward prosecutor of the court of appeals. In December of the same year he was given the secretarship of the Economic junta. Egana was elected a member of the municipality of Santiago in 1820, and in 1822 was appointed legal advisor of the city government. In 1830 he was chief clerk of the treasury and of the department of disputed claims. He was afterward appointed secretary of the provisional government, and in April, 1824, was made secretary of the treasury and of foreign relations. At the end of this year he was sent as minister to several European powers, and remained abroad till 1829. In 1830 he was secretary of the interior, and prosecutor for the supreme court of justice. In 1831 he was elected to congress, and was president of the National convention. In 1836 he was sent as minister to Peru, and, after efforts to arrange existing difficulties amicably, declared war by order of his government. He was minister of justice, worship, and public instruction in 1838, and in the following year was again minister to Peru. After his return to Chili he was minister of justice up to 1841, and while in this office he revised the Chilian code of law.

EGEDE, Hans, Danish missionary, b. in Harstadt, Norway, 31 Jan., 1668; d. on the isle of Falster, 5 Nov., 1738. He became pastor in Brethem in 1707, and while there determined on a mission to Greenland for the purpose of converting the natives. After application to the bishops, which proved unsuccessful, as far as pecuniary assistance was concerned, he gave up his benefice at Vaaen in 1719 and returned to Bergen, where he endeavored to found a company to trade with Greenland. This likewise proved unsuccessful, and Egede determined to appeal to Frederick IV., at Copenhagen, under whose auspices a company was subsequently organized. In May, 1721, Egede sailed for Greenland from Copenhagen with six persons, landing in July at Ballaeriver, where they were hospitably received by the natives. For some years the mission had a hard struggle for life, and the colony was sustained only by the provisions sent annually by the king. Finally, in 1753, Egede was sent to Copenhagen to prevent his remaining there with him the remains of his wife, who had died during 1734, and to whose persistent courage and energy much credit is due for such success as the colony had. In 1740 a seminary for the Greenland mission was established on the island of Qeqertaq, and in 1754 he became its superintendent, with the title of bishop. Seven years later he retired to the island of Falster, where he spent the remainder of his days with his daughter, Christina. He published "Relation angaaende den Grønlandske Missions Begyndelse og Forsættelse," a description of his missionary labors (Copenhagen, 1739), and "Den gamle Grønlands nye Plarustion" (1741-4), which was published in English as "A Description of Greenland" (1743). Bishop Egede is generally called the "apostle of Greenland."—His son, Paul, missionary, b. near society in Santiago, Chili, 18 Sept., 1793; d. there, 24 June, 1844, studied in Spain, and at the age of eighteen was graduated at law. In 1813 he was appointed secretary of the sovereign junta of Chili. After the defeat of the insurgents at Rancagua, Egana was exiled with his father, and on his return to Chili, in 1817, was appointed secretary of the general junta of political and forward prosecutor of the court of appeals. In December of the same year he was given the secretarship of the Economic junta. Egana was elected a member of the municipality of Santiago in 1820, and in 1822 was appointed legal advisor of the city government. In 1830 he was chief clerk of the treasury and of the department of disputed claims. He was afterward appointed secretary of the provisional government, and in April, 1824, was made secretary of the treasury and of foreign relations. At the end of this year he was sent as minister to several European powers, and remained abroad till 1829. In 1830 he was secretary of the interior, and prose-age. He was prevented by delicate health from entering college, and his education was mainly self-acquired. In 1856 he spent four months in Minnesota for his health, and then, returning to Indiana, became a Methodist preacher, riding a four-wheels' circuit, and laboring with great persistence. After six months of this work, failing health compelled him to retire. He was now a general agent of the Bible society, and held pastorates at St. Peter's, St. Paul, Stillwater, and Whonma. At times the state of his health forced him to abandon all pastoral work and support his family by various pursuits, which were "always honest, but sometimes very unignitary." In 1866 he removed to Evanston, Ill., and for six months was associate editor of the "Little Corporal," a children's paper, to which he had previously contributed a series of "Round Table Stories." A year later he became editor of the "Sunday-School Teacher" in Chicago; and under his management, increased in three years from 5,000 to 35,000. He also gained a reputation as speaker at Sunday-school conventions, and as a manager of Sunday-school teachers' institutes. During this time he had contributed to the "New York Independent," and in 1870 he removed to New York, and became its literary editor. On the retirement of Theodore Tilton, Mr. Eggleston succeeded him as superintending editor, but resigned in July, 1871, to become the editor of "Heath and Home," which office he continued to hold for over a year. From 1874 till 1879 he held the pastorate of the Church of Christian Endeavor, in Brooklyn, but was again compelled by failing health to retire, and returned to literature, making his home of "Owl's Nest," on Lake Michigan, in the suburban region of Racine, Wisconsin. His early life in southern Indiana, have been widely read. Some of them have been reprinted in England, and translated into various foreign languages. In addition to a "Sunday-School Manual" (1870), and several works of a similar character, he has published "Mr. Jago's 'Wandering'" (Chicago, 1869); "Book of Queer Stories" (1870); "The Hoosier School-master" (New York, 1871); "End of the World" (1872); "Mystery of Metropolisville" (1873); "The Circuit Rider" (1874); "Schoolmaster's Stories for Boys and Girls" (1874); "Christ in the Streets" (1876); "Christ in Art" (1877); "Roxy" (1878); and "The Hoosier School-boy" (1883). In 1878, in connection with his daughter, Mrs. Lillie E. Sodey, he began the publication of a series of biographies of American Indians for young people. It includes "Tecest以防 and the Shawnee Prophet" (New York, 1878); "Pocahontas and Powhatan" (1879); "Brant and Red Jacket" (1879); and "Montezuma and the Conquest of Mexico" (1880). He has finished a novel, not yet published, and has in preparation (1887) a "History of Life in the United States," chapters of which have appeared in the "Century."—His brother, George Cary, b. in Vevay, Ind., 26 Nov., 1839, was educated at Indiana Asbury university and Richmond college, Va. Subsequently he studied law and began its practice in Virginia. After serving till July, 1871, when he became an editorial writer in the Confederate army, he settled in the west, where he had charge of the correspondence of a large business house. In 1876 he became a reporter on the Brooklyn "Union," and soon afterward one of the editorial staff, where he remained till July, 1871, when he became an editorial writer of the "Hearth and Home," and subsequently succeeded his brother as editor-in-chief. In 1874 he became editor of the "American Homes," and in 1875 literary editor of the New York "Evening Post," which appointment he held until 1881. During the ten following years he was engaged in editing books and other literary work. He became literary editor of the "Commercial Advertiser" in March, 1884, and editor-in-chief in January, 1886. His contributions to magazines have been numerous, and have appeared in the "Give to Educate Yourself" (1872); "A Man of Honor" (1873); "A Rebel's Recollections" (Boston, 1874); "How to Make a Living" (New York, 1875); "The Big Brother" (1875); "Captain Sam" (1876); "The Signal Boys" (1877); "Red Eagle and the War with the Creek Indians" (1878); "The Black of the Red-Bird" (1882); "Haydn's Dictionary of Dates" (American edition, 1883); and "Strange Stories from History" (1885).
Smithsonian institution. In 1863 he published a plan for a school of mines, which resulted in the establishment of the present institution connected with Columbia college. Mr. Egleston was joined by Charles F. Chandler and Francis L. Vinton, and the school was developed under their joint supervision. He became professor of mineralogy and metallurgy there in 1854, a post he has since continued to hold that chair. Prof. Egleston was commissioner to make the geological survey of the Union Pacific railroad in 1866, commissioner to examine fortifications in 1869, and mint commissioner in 1870, 1878, and 1885. He has frequently been called in consultation as an expert on metallurgical subjects, and his opinion has been sought extensively throughout the United States as an expert in mining, on important points of furnace construction, the treatment of ores, and similar topics. In 1874 he received the degree of Ph. D. from Princeton university. Prof. Egleston is a member of numerous scientific societies, was vice-president of the New York academy of sciences for many years, and has been president of the American institute of mining engineers. He has taken out various metallurgical patents, and has written a hundred papers on subjects connected with his specialties. He has published "Tables for the Determination of Minerals" (New York, 1867); "Metallurgical Tables on Copper, Lead, Silver, Gold, and other Metals" (1868); "Tables of Weights, Measures, and Coins of the United States and France" (1868); "Metallurgical Tables on Fuels, Iron, and Steel" (1869); "Lectures on Mineralogy" (1871); and "The Metallurgy of Gold, Silver, and Mercury in the United States" (1887).

Eguren, Juan José (ay-gehr-ah-nil). Mexican clergyman and author, b. in the city of Mexico in the latter part of the 17th century; d. there, 29 Jan., 1763. He studied at the college of San Ildefonso, and was afterward canon, professor of theology, and rector of the University of Mexico. The literary tasks made him decline the bishopric of Yucatan, for which he was nominated. He was the author of the first dictionary of biography in South America, which he called "Biblioteca Mexicana," containing the results of much curious research (Mexico, 1746). He also printed the first volume of this work, containing the letters A, B, and C, in his own press, and left in manuscript other volumes, which are in the library of the cathedral of Mexico. Among his other works are "Practicas" (1726-47); "Seleciones de disertaciones Mexicanas ad Scholarum spectantes theologiam" (3 vols., 1749); "La Nuda contrapuesta en las balanzas de Dios al aparente peso de los hombres" (1727); and "Vida del V. P. Pedro ArIdano Sosa, primer Preposito de San Felipe Neri" (1753).

Ernixier, John Whetton, artist, b. in New York city, 22 July, 1827. He was graduated at Columbia in 1847, and in 1848-9 studied art in Thomas Couture's studio in Paris. The subject of his first oil painting, "Peter Stuyvesant" (1850), was taken from Irving's "Knickerbocker's History of New York." He was a member of the American art union. He went abroad again in 1851-2, and visited Dusseldorf and other art centres. Besides drawings in outline, pencil, and India ink, he has produced a series of etchings illustrating Hood's "Bridge of Sighs" (1849); a series on Irving's story of "Don Juan" (1850); and a set of eight illustrations for Longfellow's "Miles Standish" (1858). His best known paintings are "New England Farnyard"; "Yankee Peddler"; "Love me, Love my Horse"; "The Foray"; "The Sword"; "Lady Jane Grey"; "Christ Healing the Sick"; "Death and the Tambour"; "Autumnal Landscape" (1867); "Monk" (1871); "Vintage in the Valtelina" (1877); and "Twilight from the Bridge of Pau" (1878).

Eichberg, Julius, musician, b. in Düsseldorf, Germany, in 1824. At seventeen years of age he entered the conservatory at Brussels as a pupil of De Beriot, and studied composition under Fétis. He was afterward professor of the violin at the conservatory of Geneva. Being advised to take a sea-voyage for his health he came to the United States, and settled in Boston, Mass. While director of the Boston museum, from 1850 till 1866, he became known as the first composer of English-American operas. "The Doctor of Alcantara" was written in 1862, followed by "The Rose of Tyrol," "A Night in Rome," and "The Two Car- dis." In 1867 he became director of the Boston conservatory of music, and the same year was elected superintendent of music in the public schools of Boston, which position he still holds.

Eidlitz, Leopold, architect, b. in Prague, Bohemia, 29 March, 1823. He was educated at the Polytechnic school in Prague, and in Vienna, emigrated to the United States, settled in New York city. Among the buildings designed by him are Christ church, St. Louis; St. George's church, New York city; the Brooklyn academy of music; the Dry-dock bank building, on the Bowery; New York; and the Continental bank building in that city. In 1875, with Frederick Law Olmsted and Henry H. Richardson, he was appointed on a commission to consider the work already accomplished in the building of the capitol at Albany. An elaborate report was made, and preliminary studies for the completion of the building were undertaken by Mr. Eidlitz. Subsequently its continuation was confided to Mr. Richardson, but much of the dignity of the work in its present condition is due to the designs of Mr. Eidlitz. He has published "The Nature and Function of Art" (New York, 1881).—His son, a young architect, is named Warner, architect, b. in New York city, 27 July, 1853, was educated in New York, Geneva, Switzerland, and at the Polytechnic institute in Stuttgart. Among the buildings that he has designed are the new post office at Chicago, the Dearborn station in Chicago (1883), and the Buffalo library, which is represented in the annexed picture (1886).

Eigebrodt, Lewis Ernest Andrew, educator, b. in Lauterbach, Hesse Darmstadt, 22 Sept., 1778; d. Aug., 1828. He was graduated at the University of Giesen in 1793, was master of seven languages, skilled in mathematics, astronomy, and engineering, and had taken a full course in divinity. He came to the United States in 1788; and, after spending four years in private tuition, when was made in 1797 principal of Union Hall academy at Jamaica, N. Y., which his genius, energy, and ability soon made celebrated. Pupils flocked to it from all parts of the United States and from the West India islands, and many men received their early training when were group here when dispersed. Mr. Eigenbrodt received the degree of LL. D. from Union in 1825. He delivered an oration in honor of George Washington on the day of the latter's funeral, 18 Dec., 1799.—His son, David Lambersen, physician, b. in Jamaica, N. Y., 6 Sept., 1810; d. in New York, 3 Jan., 1880, was graduated at Washington (now Trinity) college in 1831, and at the College of physicians and surgeons, New York, in 1835. After useful services in the New York hospital and at Bellevue, where he was in charge of the hospital, he removed to St. Jago de Cuba, where he practised medicine for fifteen years. On his return to New York, he organized in 1858, at the request of Dr. Muhlenberg, both the surgical and medical departments of St. Luke's hospital, then just established, and took charge of the medical division as resident physician, giving his services gratuitously for a year, at the end of which time he retired to private life.—Another son, William Ernest, clergyman, b. in Jamaica, N. Y., 10 June, 1813, was educated at Union Hall academy, and at Columbia, where he was graduated in 1831. He died in the General Protestant Episcopal theological seminary, New York, and entered the ministry of that church. He was engaged in professional duties in Bainbridge and Rochester from 1838 till 1846, in which year he was chosen rector of All Saints' church, Philadelphia. He became associate minister of Calvary church, New York, in 1858, and in 1862 was made professor of pastoral theology in the General theological seminary, where he has since remained. He was secretary of the convention of the church in New York from 1854 till 1883. Columbia gave him the degree of D. D. in 1855.—Another son, Charles S., soldier, b. in Jamaica, N. Y., 20 March, 1825; d. in Virginia, 23 Aug., 1864, was one of the pioneers who went to California in 1849. He settled at Alameda, and there he lived till 1851, when he raised in California a battalion of cavalry, afterward enrolled in the second Massachusetts cavalry. Capt. Eigenbrodt continued at the head of his troops for more than a year, and fell, at their head, in a charge in the Shenandoah valley. An address on the Eigenbrodt family was delivered by the Rev. Bundy K. Belts before the New York genealogical and historical society, 11 March, 1837.

EILERS, Frederic Anton, metallurgist, b. in Laufenseiten, Nassau, Germany, 14 Jan., 1839. He was educated at the mining-school in Clausthal and in the university of Hildesheim. Soon after the completion of his studies he came to the United States, and from 1869 till 1876 held the office of deputy U. S. commissioner of mining statistics. Subsequently he was occupied in building and managing smelting-works for lead and silver in Utah and Colorado. He is at present (1878) general manager of the Colorado smelting company's works at South Pueblo, Colo. Mr. Eilers is considered one of the foremost experts in the United States in his branch of metallurgy, and, while he has never patented any of his own inventions, he has done more than any other person to improve American methods in the treatment of lead and silver. This he has accomplished by making possible the long, continuous running of large shaft furnaces in the smelting of argentiferous lead-ores. The most important of these improvements are the use of water-jackets and the scientific and precise adjustment of charges with reference to their chemical composition and the fusion-point of slags. The "chills" or "salamanders," formerly so frequent in furnaces of this type, and not only necessitating stoppage till the demand of raw lead in small furnaces, have thus been obviated. Some of his improvements are adopted in Europe. He is the author of various professional papers.

EINHORN, David, b. in Dispeck, Bavaria, 10 Nov., 1849; d. in New York city, 2 Nov., 1885. He was educated at the rabbinical school in Freudent and subsequently at the universities of Munich and Wurzburg. Espousing the cause of radical reform in Judaism, he was chosen rabbi at Hopstatter, and afterward chief rabbi of Mecklenburg-Schwerin. He was called to Peest in 1881, where his advanced views met with such opposition that his temple was closed by the Austrian government. In 1855 Dr. Einhorn was invited to assume charge of a Hebrew congregation in Baltimore, Md., and during his incumbency published a prayer-book, which has a wide circle of readers, besides the German translation of the Bible, and also the German magazine, "Sinai," devoted to interests of radical reform. In 1861 he was such a staunch Unionist that his Baltimore pastorate was exchanged for one in Philadelphia. In 1886 Dr. Einhorn removed to New York, where he held a rabbinical position till his death. A collection of his addresses has been issued in German.

EISFELD, Theodore, musician, b. in Wolfenbüttel, Brunswick, Germany, in 1816; d. in Wiesbaden, 18 Sept., 1882. His chief instructor in musical composition was C. G. Reissiger, of Dresden. He came to New York in 1844 and in 1849 was chosen conductor of the Philharmonic society in that city. From 1855 till the season of 1865-6, when he resigned, he conducted the society alternately with Carl Bergmann. On 18 Feb., 1851, he began a series of lectures on music, which had not been given on the date mentioned at Hope chapel. On his return trip from a visit to Europe in 1858, he was one of the few survivors of the burning of the steamer "Austria." He was lashed to a platform and so drifted on the ocean, without food, for nearly five days, and was rescued by the steamship "Caledonia," which took him to New York. During his service in the war he suffered much from his extraordinary prostration. He returned to Germany in 1866, and remained there till his death. He was also the first conductor of the New York harmonic society, which began the custom of giving an annual Christmas performance of the "Messiah." EIXIN, James Adams, soldier, b. in Pittsburg, Pa., 31 Aug., 1819. He was a ship-builder prior to 1861, but at the beginning of the civil war entered the 12th Pennsylvania infantry as 1st lieutenant and regimental quartermaster, and at the expiration of three months was made captain and assistant quartermaster in the volunteer army, being stationed in Pittsburg as acting assistant commissary of subsistence. In October, 1861, he was made assistant quartermaster and stationed in Indianapolis until December, 1863, when he was admitted to the regular army with similar rank, to date from March, 1864, and as assistant to (1871) general of the cavalry bureau in Washington till February, 1864. He was then promoted to lieutenant-colonel and made chief quartermaster of the cavalry corps of the Army of the Potomac, remaining as such until August, when he was made brigadier-general and given charge of the 1st division of the quartermaster-general's office in Washington, where he continued till 1870, holding various appointments in that office. Subsequently he was chief quartermaster of the military district and the department of Texas, and after chief quartermaster of the department of the South, and in similar capacity in Jeffersonville, Ind., and finally disbursing agent of the quartermaster's department in Louisville, Ky., being assistant quartermaster-general of the army since 1872. He was brevetted brigadier-general in the volunteer army, and those of major to brigadier-general in the regular army, for his services during the war. In August, 1888, he was retired, and has since resided in Louisville.

ELBERT, Samuel, soldier, b. Prince William parish, S.C., in 1778, d. at sea, 3 Nov., 1788. He became an orphan at an early age, and went to Savannah, where he engaged in commercial pursuits. In June, 1774, he was elected captain of a grenadier company, and later was a member of the Savannah committee of safety. He entered the Continental army with the rank of lieutenant-colonel under Col. Lachlin McIntosh in February, 1776, and was promoted to colonel in September, 1776. In May of the following year he was given command of an expedition against the British in East Florida, and in April, 1778, captured Fort St. George, in the mouth of the St. John's river. In the same year he was actively engaged in the vicinity of Savannah, and behaved gallantly when the attack was made on that city in December, 1778, by Col. Archibald Campbell. He distinguished himself in the action at Brier creek, where he commanded a brigade under Gen. John Ashe, 3 March, 1780, and was made prisoner. After his exchange he joined the army under Gen. Washington, and was present at the surrender of Lord Cornwallis. He received the brevet of brigadier-general of the Continental army, 1783, and in Savannah, 1783, was appointed governor of Georgia, succeeding John Houston. Subsequently he held the rank of major-general of the state militia. Elbert county, in Georgia, was named in his honor.

ELCANO, Juan Sebastian (el-kah-no'), Spanish navigator, b. in Spain, in 1478; d. at sea, 4 Aug., 1526. In his early life he was captain of a vessel trading to the Levant and Africa. On 15 Aug., 1519, he sailed from San Lucar, in command of the "Victoria," one of the five ships of Magellan's fleet, which had been sent to discover a western passage to the Orient. On 21 Oct., 1520, at the discovery of the strait afterward called by his name. After the death of Magellan, and that of his successor, Caraballo, and the destruction of most of the fleet, Elcano, with the only surviving ship, continued his voyage toward the Moluccas, and, after having established friendly relations with one of the native sovereigns, sailed around the Cape of Good Hope, and returned to San Lucar on 6 Sept., 1522. Elcano was the first seaman who ever made the complete circuit of the globe. Elcano contributed to the establishment of a Spanish factory in the island of Lidor, and explored several other islands. When he returned to Spain, Charles V received him with distinction and gave him a pension, and a coat-of-arms bearing the inscription: "Prímus circumventiae fluminis Tigris, 25 July, 1519, a mare totius ab ore fluminis Galiae, in a second expedition under command of Garcia Loaisa, and, after making some explorations on the eastern coast of South America, passed again through Magellan's strait, 26 May, 1526. Loaisa died on 30 July, and Elcano succeeded him, but not long survived him.

ELDER, George A., educator, b. in Harlins Creek, Ky., in 1764; d. in Bardstown, Ky., in 1838. He was sent to Mount St. Mary's college, Emmettsburg, in 1810, and afterward to the seminary of the Sulpitians, in Baltimore, where he finished his ecclesiastical studies. He was ordained a priest of the Roman Catholic church in 1819, and commissioned by his superiors to found a college in Bardstown, Ky. Between the years 1820 and 1823 he erected the College of St. Joseph, which was at that time one of the finest institutions of learning in the west. He acted as president of this institution till his death. He was also one of the editors of the "Catholic Advocate," published in Bardstown, and author of a work entitled, "Letters to Brother Jonathan.

ELDER, John, clergyman, b. in County Antrim, Ireland, in 1706; d. near Harrisburg, Pa., in 1792. He studied for the ministry with his uncle, a Presbyterian clergyman in Edinburgh, and about 1736 followed his father, who had emigrated in 1730, and settled near Harrisburg. He was installed for the churches of Derry and Derry, 26 Nov., 1738, and remained in that relation till his death. He trained his parishioners for cavalry service against the Indians, and afterward received a colonel's commission from the proprietaries and had charge of the block-houses from Easton to the Susquehanna, and 3d of Ramapo, and pacified the Conestoga Indians against his advice.

ELDER, Joseph Freeman, clergyman, b. in Portland, Me., 10 March, 1839. He was graduated at Portland high school in 1856, and at Waterville college (now Colby university) in 1860. After an interval of teaching he entered the Rochester, N.Y., theological seminary, where he was graduated in 1867. In May of that year he was ordained pastor of the North Orange Baptist church, Orange, N.J., and on 1 Jan., 1870, went to New York city and assumed charge of the church, which was called the Baptist church of the Epiphany (formerly Oliver street Baptist church), of which he is still (1887) the pastor. He was president of the Baptist state convention of 1884-5, and in the latter year became president of the New York Baptist city mission.

ELDER, Susan Blanchard, author, b. in Fort Jessup, La., about 1835. Her childhood was passed at an extensive frontier military post, where her father, Gen. Albert G. Blanchard, then a captain in the army, was stationed. She was educated in St. Michael's convent of the sacred heart, New Orleans, and was a graduate of the college. She married D. Elder, of that city. After the capture of New Orleans she went with her husband to Selma, Ala., where she turned her cottage into a hospital for wounded soldiers. After the war she became professor of natural science in the New Orleans high-school, and editor of the "Morning Star" newspaper of that city. When sixteen years of age she began to write for the press under the name of "hermine." Her writings comprise poems, histories, and several dramas intended for representation in Roman Catholic colleges. She has published "The Loss of the Penelope," "James the Second," "Savonarola," and "Ellen Fitzgerald," a tale, dealing with southern scenes and incidents. She has also contributed extensively to Roman Catholic publications, and her devotional poems are very popular Among her works are the following:

ELDER, William, physician, b. in Somerset, Pa., 23 July, 1806; d. in Washington, D.C., 5 April, 1885. He practised his profession in Philadelphia, and was well known as an abolitionist and as an editor and writer and public speaker in the period preceding the civil war. He was the author of "Pariscopics," a volume of miscellanies (New York, 1854); "The Enchanted Beauty" (1855); "Life of Dr. F. K. Kane" (Philadelphia, ELDER, William, Canadian journalist, b. in Malin, County Donegal, Ireland, 22 July, 1822; d. in St. John, N. B., in 1882. He was educated at Queen's college, Belfast, and at the universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh, studied theology, and was for some time a minister in the Presbyterian church. He afterward came to New Brunswick, and at once attained prominence as a public writer and speaker. He edited the "Colonial Presbyterian" and the "Morning Journal" at St. John for a term of years, and was chief editor and proprietor of the St. John "Daily Telegraph." He was a member of the council of the board of trade. He was an unsuccessful candidate for the Dominion parliament at the general election in 1872, was first returned for the legislature of New Brunswick in 1875, and was re-elected in 1882.

ELDER, William Henry, archbishop, b. in Baltimore, Md., in 1819. He was educated in Mount St. Mary's college, Emmetsburg, and afterward in the college of the Propaganda, Rome. After his ordination, in 1846, he was appointed professor of canon law in Mount St. Mary's, where his ability attracted notice, and he was elected bishop of Natchez in 1857. When the civil war began he devoted all his energies to the care of the sick and wounded. Having refused to obey an order of the post commandant at Natchez, in 1862, he was imprisoned in the city jail for a term of days. In 1867 he was named coadjutor bishop of San Francisco, but declined, giving as his reason that he could not leave his diocese to Vidaalia, La., but the order was subsequently revoked. He labored fearlessly in aid of the yellow-fever sufferers in the epidemic of 1862, and was himself struck down by the disease. In 1879 he was named coadjutor bishop of Cincinnati, which diocese had become involved in great financial difficulties. He did so, still retaining the administration of Natchez. He presided over the fourth provincial council of Cincinnati, held in 1882, and on the death of Archbishop Purcell, in the same year, became archbishop of Cincinnati.

ELDRIDGE, Charles A., politician, b. in Bridport, Vt., 27 Feb., 1821. He removed with his parents to New York, where he studied and began the practice of law, and in 1848 settled in Fond du Lac, Wis. He was an ardent follower of the Whig party, and was elected justice of the peace in 1854. In 1862 he was elected a member of Congress as a democrat, and was five times re-elected, serving from 7 Dec., 1863, to 3 March, 1875. On 1 Feb., 1864, he offered a resolution condemning the draft as contrary to the genius of republican government, so that one of the signatures of the bill was affixed to the document, and among the signatures was that of the president. He was re-elected in 1864.

ELDRIDGE, Edwin, capitalist, b. in 1811; d. in Elmira, N. Y., 16 Dec., 1875. He became a physician; was largely engaged in coal-mining and iron manufacturing, became president of the Elmira iron and steel company, and was long connected with the Erie railroad. Dr. Eldridge gave a public park to Elmira, and contributed materially to the progress of that town.

ELDRIDGE, Hamilton N., soldier, b. in South Williamstown, Berkshire co., Mass., 29 Aug., 1831; d. in Chicago, III., 27 Nov., 1882. He was graduated at Williams in 1856, in the same class with James A. Garfield, and at the Albany law institute in 1857, and began practice in Chicago. In July, 1862, with his partner, Col. P. W. Tourtellotte, he raised the 127th Illinois regiment, and was made its lieutenant-colonel. He commanded the regiment in the operations of Gen. Sherman from Memphis to Grenada and Chickasaw bayou, distinguished himself at Arkansas Post, was promoted colonel, and took part in the siege of Vicksburg, where he bore the colors with his own hand, after several color-bearers had been shot, and led his regiment in advance, to the fortifications of the enemy. After the surrender, he was compelled by sickness to resign, but was brevetted brigadier-general for gallantry. After the re-covery he resumed the practice of law in Chicago.

ELGIN, James Bruce, eighth earl of Elgin, and twelfth of Kincardine, British statesman, b. in London, 20 July, 1811; d. in Dharmsala, India, 20 Nov., 1893. He was educated at Eton, and at Christ church college, Oxford, where he was graduated in 1833. He began his public life in 1841, as a member of parliament for Southampton, and before the end of the session of the year succeeded to the title and estates of his father. He was appointed governor of Jamaica in 1843, but found the legislature of that island determined to disregard the rights of the colonists, and for several weeks he repeatedly emancipated slaves, and in 1846 was recalled at his own request. He was then appointed governor-general of Canada, and arrived there early in 1847. Soon after his arrival he signed a bill providing for compensation to loyalists in Lower Canada for losses sustained in the rebellion of 1837. This bill had been bitterly opposed, and, when it became known that the governor-general had signed it, a meeting was held in Montreal at which violent speeches were made. After the meeting a mob dispersed the parliament, then in session in that city, and burned the parliament buildings and their contents. The assembly next met in Moncklands, his residence, to the government house, to receive the address, and was assaulted on the way by the mob with volleys of stones. His country residence was threatened, and had to be guarded for one evening upon the president to furnish the names of all persons that had been arrested for political cause. make use of the troops, saying, "I am prepared to bear any amount of obloquy that may be cast upon me, but, if I can possibly prevent it, no stain of blood shall rest upon my name." He thought it right, however, to offer his resignation to the home government, but it was not accepted. The minority in Canada then made an unsuccessful appeal to the British government, and the obloquy and recusation. Toward the end of September of the same year the arrest of some persons charged with being implicated in burning the parliament building produced a second outbreak, during which a young man was killed, and the efforts were made for a riotous demonstration. The magistrates of Montreal requested Lord Elgin to proclaim martial law, but he still refused, and the malcontents were finally quieted by a proclamation from the mayor. During the autumn, to disprove the statement that he required protection, Lord Elgin visited western Canada, without military escort, and was received with enthusiasm, except in a few of the large cities, where his opponents were able to cause disturbances. Lord Elgin's policy of conciliation was regarded by some of his well-informed and liberal friends in Great Britain, but he was not unwise, and, after the passion consequent upon these events had subsided, it was clearly perceived that it required greater courage to submit patiently than to crush opposition by a display of force. But a new trouble soon followed the proclamation of the union with Canada. In 1848, during a period of commercial depression, a manifesto appeared urging annexation with the United States, which was signed by many prominent men throughout Canada. This remedy had often been offered for the same evil, and to put an end to such suggestions, the government issued a free navigation and a reciprocity treaty with the United States, at the same time assenting to the dismissal of all officials who had signed the annexation manifesto. In June, 1849, the abolishing of the imperial navigation laws increased greatly stimulating Canadian trade, and, after several years of fruitless diplomacy, Lord Elgin went, in 1854, to Washington, where he negotiated a treaty with Sec. Marcy, which was ratified by the senate, and continued in force till it was terminated in 1864 by President Lincoln. Other important measures of Lord Elgin's administration were the repeal of the imperial act relating to the clergy reserves in 1853, the devotion of those reserves to education and other public purposes in 1854, and the abolition of seignorial tenure in Lower Canada in the same year. Lord Elgin never opposed the popular voice, as expressed by the majority in parliament. His principle was "to let the colony have its own way in everything that was not contrary to public morality or to some imperial interest." The constitution of the legislative council early attracted his attention, and, in a letter to Earl Grey in 1850, he expressed himself as favoring its being made elective, but the proposition met, strangely enough, with a most determined opposition from such reformers as Robert Baldwin, George Brown, and others. He remained in office himself the noblest ideal of free colonial government, and of having largely realized it in practice. He surrendered the government to his successor in December, 1854, and on his return to England declined the chancellorship of the duchy of Lancaster. In 1857 he was appointed high commissioner to China during the trouble with that country, and, after penetrating with British troops to Pekin in June, 1858, concluded the treaty of Tientsin with the Chinese government. He became post-master-general, and in 1861 accepted the governor-generalship of India. He left England, to assume his new duties, in January, 1862, and during the period that elapsed before his death was successful in his administration of the government.

ELIAS, Domingo (ay-leeiosk), Peruvian statesman, b. in Ica, Peru, in 1863; d. in Lima in 1897. He was educated in Lima, and went to Peru in 1825, and from the beginning took great interest in the new republic. He was the first in Peru to turn his attention to the planting of coton on a large scale, and to the elaboration of wines, and the first to publish there Chinese laborers. He founded in Lima the College of Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe. When Gen. Vivanco headed the revolution of Arequipa, Elias was the first to lend him a helping hand. Elias was then temporarily in charge of the government at Lima, and he was asked to exert his influence with the opposing armies, in order to avoid war, and to appeal to the country for a decision. But Vivanco and Castilla preferred to settle the matter by arms, and Vivanco was defeated at the battle of Carmen Alto in 1844. Elias surrendered the command to the victor, and on the one designated for him. Castilla was chosen 1 April, 1845. Elias was then appointed councillor of state and elected to congress. At the expiration of his term of office, he was a popular candidate for the presidency, and it was the first time that serious efforts were made to elect a candidate from civil life; but the military candidate, Gen. Echenique, was proclaimed constitutional president in 1851. In 1854 Elias proclaimed a revolution at Ica, and at his own expense organized a division, with which he offered battle to the government forces at Sarama, and was defeated. He then marched southward, to confer with Gen. Castilla, who had proclaimed a revolution at Arequipa. Castilla advanced upon Cuzco to organize his army, and Elias remained in the department of Moquegua, as chief commander of the south. Elias suddenly made a proposal to the Indians of Arequipa, 1 Dec., 1854, and the government forces were defeated. A few days afterward the liberating army approached the capital, and Gen. Castilla won the victory of Palma, 5 Jan., 1855. This revolution was of great benefit to Peru, as it freed the slaves, and abolished the Indian tribute. Castilla, as provisional president, organized his cabinet, and appointed Elias secretary of the treasury, who soon afterward was sent to France as minister. In 1856 he was nominated for president of the republic, but was not elected.

ELIOT, Andrew, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., 28 Dec., 1718; d. there, 18 Sept., 1778. His great-grandfather, Andrew Elliott, of Somersetshire, settled in Beverly, Mass., about 1683. He was graduated at Harvard in 1737, and in 1742 was ordained as colleague pastor with Mr. Webb, of the New north church in Boston, where he remained until his death, being sole pastor after 1750. The University of Edinburgh gave him the degree of D. D. in 1767, and in 1785 he was chosen to the corporation of Harvard, afterward declining an election to the presidency. During the British occupation of Boston, Dr. Eliot did much to alleviate the sufferings of the people, but, notwithstanding his devotion to the patriot cause, his moderation won him the respect of the royalists. When Gov. Hutchinson's house was plundered by a mob, Dr. Eliot saved and gave back to the owner the valuable manuscripts, including the second volume of the "History of Massachusetts Bay." He was much interested in the conversion of the Indians, and labored for the passage of an act, which was afterward vetoed by the governor, to establish in Massachusetts a society for propagating the gospel among the Indians. He also took an active part in upholding the Congregational system against the Episcopalians, and published occasional discourses and a volume of sermons (1774). He also sent to a friend in England, in 1769, an account of the effects of the dispute between the colonies and the mother country, which was praised for its candor and moderation. — His son, John, clergyman.
b. in Boston, Mass., 31 May, 1754; d. there, 14 Feb., 1813, was graduated at Harvard in 1772, began to preach in England, in 1786, and was for a short time chaplain of a Boston regiment. On 3 Nov., 1779, he was ordained as his father's successor in the pastorate of the New north church, where he remained until his death. He received the degree of D. D. from Edinburgh university in 1797, and was chosen member of the Harvard corporation in 1804. Dr. Eliot was intimately associated with Jeremy Belknap in the formation of the Massachusetts historical society, and was a principal contributor to its collections and to its library of rare books. Besides numerous articles in the Historical Collections, he also contributed numerous sermons, and published a "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Characters in New England" (Salem and Boston, 1809). — Another son, Ephraim, was graduated at Harvard in 1780, and became a druggist in Boston. He published "Historical Notices of the English Society that in America Anecdotes of Rev. Andrew Eliot and John Eliot" (1822).

ELIOT, Charles, author, b. in Boston in 1711; d. in 1813. He was graduated at Harvard in 1789, and studied divinity, but gave up preaching on account of failing health. His first, a short poem appeared in the "Harvard Repository," a Boston periodical, and he was specially interested in the preparation of Scheussner's "Lexicon." His "Miscellaneous Writings" were edited by Andrews Anton (Cambridge, 1814). — Charles's nephew, Samuel, author, b. in Boston, Mass., 22 Dec., 1821, was graduated at Harvard in 1838, spent two years in a Boston counting-house, and four years in foreign travel and study. On his return he took private pupils, organized a charity-school for vagrant children, and instructed classes of young workingmen. He was professor of history and political science in Trinity college, Hartford, Conn., in 1855-64, its president in 1860-4, and lecturer on constitutional law and political science in 1864-74. He also lectured at Harvard in 1870-3, was head master of the girls' high-school in Boston in 1872-6, and superintendent of Boston public schools in 1876-80. He was an overseer of Harvard in 1860-72, and in 1868-72 was president of the American social science association, by which the first movement in favor of civil service reform was organized in 1868. He became a member of the Boston School committee in 1886, and is president of various charitable and educational institutions. Columbia gave him the degree of L.L. D. in 1863, and Harvard in 1880. He has published "Passages from the History of Liberty" (Boston, 1881), "The Papal Ages" (2 vols., 1853). The plan of the work embraces five parts, of which the three remaining are to treat of the "Papal Ages," the "Monarchical Ages," and the "American Nation." Dr. Eliot has also published a "Manual of United States History between the Years 1792 and 1850" (Boston, 1856; revised ed., 1873); three volumes of selections for public schools, entitled "Poetry for Children" (1879); "Stories from the Arabian Nights" (1879); and "Selections from American Authors" (New York, 1879); and many reviews, essays, and addresses, issued in pamphlet form.

ELIOT, John, first styled "the Indian apostle" by Thomas Thwaites, in 1800, a designation so appropriate that it has secured universal and perpetual acceptance, b. probably in Wiford, Hertfordshire, England, as there is a record of his baptism in that parish on 5 Aug., 1604; d. in Roxbury, Mass., 21 May, 1690. His father, Bennet, a yeoman, was a landholder in the parishes of Ware, Wiford, Hunsdon and Foxeweke, in the county of Hertford, and elsewhere, and he bequeathed in his will, made 5 Nov., 1621, the profits of these lands, to the amount of £8 annually, to "Trusty and well-beloved friends," for the maintenance of his son John in the University of Cambridge, "where he is a scholar." He had matriculated as a "pensioner" (i. e., one who pays his own expenses) at Jesus college, 20 March, 1619, in the degree of A. B., was conferred upon him in 1622. The only record of his life during the next nine years is that he was employed as a teacher in a grammar-school at Little Budlow, near Chelsford, England, established by the Rev. Thomas Hooker, the illustrious pastor of the church that, first established at Cambridge, Mass., was removed to Hartford, Conn. In Anderson's "History of the Colonial Church" (London, 1856) is the following statement respecting Mr. Eliot: "That he had entered into holy orders in the Church of England before he left home is evident from the insertion of his name in the list given by Neal of the emigrant clergy." The Church of England was then dealing rigorously with those who did not conform to her doctrines and ordinances. Imprisonment awaited those who were bold in their opposition, and many hastened to the New World as a refuge from persecution. John Eliot landed at Boston, Mass., 4 Nov., 1631. Three brothers and three sisters accompanied him, or came a few years later. In his record he writes, "he adjoined to the church at Boston, and there exercised, as the absent pastor of that church, who was gone back to England." His labors gave the greatest satisfaction, as is evident from a passage in his record: "The next summer Mr. Wilson returned, and by yt time the church at Boston was intended to call him to his office." But, in 1635, he was "foreordained" to friends who had crossed the ocean and settled at Roxbury. The record of Gov. Winthrop is: "Though Boston laboured all they could, both with the congregation of Roxbury and with Mr. Eliot himself, alleging their want of him and the covenant between them, etc., yet he could not for their request from accepting the call of Roxbury." Here he became the "teacher" of the church, with which he retained a life-long connection, having Mr. Weld, Mr. Danforth, and Mr. Walter as colleagues, and at long intervals being without clerical assistance. A document of great importance in the keeping of the New England historic-geological society, Boston, contains the record of his church work, vast and interesting. It has been printed by the city of Boston as "A Report of the Record Concerning the Town of Dedham," between 1808 and 1809; and, in his notes, in the New England "Historical and Genealogical Record" (vols. 33 and 34). His active and aggressive spirit twice brought him into unpleasant relations with the civil authorities in 1694, for criticizing the method of making a treaty with the Pequots, and again in 1699, when one of his publications, written several years previously, "The Christian Commonwealth," was "condemned, and by order of the general court suppressed." Explanations and acknowledgments led to a speedy and satisfactory settlement. Several petitions in his handwriting, signed by himself and others, to the general court, attest the interest that he took in the secular affairs of the commonwealth. In 1637 he took part in the examination of Mrs. Ann Hutchinson for her religious opinions, which were repulsive to him, and for which she was banished from the land. A fragment of her papers may be found in Thomas Hutchinson's "History of the Province of Massachusetts Bay from 1628 to 1749." Eliot's fame depends mainly upon his labors in Christianizing the Indians. The translations of the Bible, and several other books into their language, are his imperishable monument. As far north as the Merrimac river, as far east as Cape Cod, to the towns in the southern part of Massachusetts, to Brookfield, sixty miles west of Roxbury, to northeastern Connecticut, and to the vicinity of Hartford, all marvels of his labors may be found. Eliot, proclaiming the gospel to the red man with an enthusiasm that brought thousands under its influence. A pamphlet of twenty-five pages, entitled "The Day-breaking, if not the Sun-rising, of the Gospel with the Indians in New England" (London, 1644), gives a true relation of these beginnings with the Indians. At Nunnaticum, in the northeast corner of Newton, on the south side of Charles river, about five miles from Roxbury, on 28 Oct., 1646, "four of us went to the wigwam of Waabon, and there met a company of Indians, men, women, and children, gathered together from all quarters round about." After a prayer in English, Mr. Eliot preached to them in their own tongue for an hour and a quarter. When asked if they understood all that he had said, many voices replied in the affirmative. Questions followed, curious, wonderful, and interesting. The meeting lasted three hours, and the Indians said they were not weary, but their instructors resolved to leave them "with an appetite." An appointment for another meeting was made, and apples were given to the children, and tobacco to the men. The Indians desired more ground to build a town, and it was promised that the government should be petitioned in their behalf for this purpose. The second meeting differed from the first in this: it was closed with a prayer "in their own language for above a quarter of an hour." The pamphlet describes also a third and a fourth meeting. The Indians showed great willingness to receive the gospel, requesting that their children might find homes with their white friends in order that they might be trained in the right way, and some adults sought employment with the settlers, that they might receive instruction in the truths of Christianity. It was then believed by many that these Indians were the descendants of the lost tribes of Israel, and this opinion was an additional incentive for efforts to convert them. Mr. Eliot was convinced that the Indians must give up their roving habits and become members of settled communities before they could make much progress in the Christian life. Natick, southwest of Boston, was a place "somewhat remote from the English," was selected as a very advantageous place for a town, and thither the Indians at Nunnaticum, and other "praying Indians," as the converts were called, removed in 1651. A civil government was established, and, after many delays and much hesitation, a church was formed in 1660, an ecclesiastical organization that continued until the death of their last pastor, Daniel Takawompanit, an Indian, in 1716. The work, although it sometimes encountered fierce opposition on the part of the Indians and ungenerous depreciation on the whites, prospered until King Philip's war in 1675. Town after town was organized, and worshipping assemblies gathered, in several instances presided over by Indian preachers, until within the jurisdiction of Massachusetts there were seven old and seven new "praying towns," embracing not few hundred souls yielding obedience to the gospel." Those in Plymouth colony and in the isles of the ocean much exceeded this number. In the war the praying Indians suffered dreadfully, both from their own countrymen, by whom they were hated, and by a great majority of the English, who suspected them of the most atrocious intentions. It is now generally believed that the latter were saved from extinction by the aid received from the friendly Indians. But to them the war was ruin. The number of Indian towns and their inhabitants were greatly diminished, and after the death of Mr. Eliot, a few years later, their extinction was rapid and irresistible. When the infirmities of age made him too feeble for the exertions of an active life, he proposed that negro servants should be sent to the woods for religious instruction; and a boy, made blind by falling into the fire, was taught by him to repeat many chapters of the Bible. One of his last recorded acts was to give by deed, in 1689, about seventy-five acres of land for "the maintenance, support, and encouragement of a school and schoolmaster at that part of Roxbury commonly called Jamaica, or the Pond Plain, for the teaching and instructing the children of that end of the town (together with such Indians and negroes as shall or may come to the said school)," etc. His remains were placed in the parish tomb in the old burying-ground at Roxbury. No authentic likeness of him exists. The accompanying picture is known as the Whiting portrait of the "apostle," but there is no authority for the statement that it is a representation of John Eliot. His name is inscribed, with those of his successors in the ministry at Roxbury, upon a monument that structure that covers the tomb. There is a monument to his memory in the Indian burying ground at South Natick, a granite watering-trough at Canton, Mass., and a memorial structure at Newton, on or near the site of Fort William, the first preaching to the Indians. See the accompanying illustration. His life and labors have been the subject of numerous biographies, the first by Cotton Mather in 1691, and the best by C. Converse Francis in 1836 (vol. 5, Sparks's "American Biography"). Mr. Eliot's manner must have been particularly attractive, judging from the accounts of his contemporaries and of several strangers who visited him. Drinkers & Sluyter, agents for the Labadist community, in the record of their visit made in 1690, speak of him as "a very old man, named John Eliot, as the best of the ministers who we have yet heard," "in Boston and its vicinity. John Dunton, a bookseller in London, describes him in 1688 as "the glory of Roxbury, as well as of all New England;" and the narrative in French of the Jesuit Father Gabriel Druillettes, a missionary from Canada, who spent the winter with the New Testament church and the apostle's house, justifies the statement of the historian, Mr. Parkman, that "there was great sympathy between the two missionaries, and Eliot prayed his guest to spend the winter with him." Before leaving England, Mr. Eliot had made a matrimonial engagement, and, on his arrival in New England, the marriage followed his arrival. The first entry on the record of "marriages of the inhabitants of Roxbury" is that of Mr. John Eliot and Hanna Mumford, 4 Sept., 1632. To use his own words, spoken at her funeral three years before his own death, she was a "dear, faithful, pious, prudent, prayerful wife." Unusual honors were paid to her memory. Six children—a daughter and five sons—were born to them. Of the sons, but one survived their parents, the Rev. Joseph, who, as a "burning and shining light," ministered to the people of Guilford, Conn., from 1699 to 1710. He endowed all the posterity of the apostle bearing his surname. A genealogy of the descendants of John Eliot was published in 1854: Fitz-Greene Halleck; the Rev. Jared Eliot, of Killingworth (now Clinton), Conn., eminent as a missionary, physician, and sculptor in our colonial history; Prof. Elisha Mitchell, of the University of North Carolina, whose remains are at rest upon the highest peak of land in the United States east of Mississippi river, named Mt. Mitchell, in his honor; Charles Wyllys Eliot; and Ethelinda Eliot Beers, who wrote the poem "All Quiet along the Potomac"—are the most distinguished of his posterity. With his colleague, the Rev. Thomas Weld, and his neighbor, the Rev. Richard Mather, of Dorchester, Mr. Eliot translated into the Indian language the Psalms of David, and they were, the "Bible cami-Sock," was the first book printed in this country (Cambridge, Mass., 1840). It was reprinted and extensively used in England and Scotland, and a small edition was reprinted in Cambridge in 1863 as a curiosity. So rare has this book become that a copy has been purchased for the Lenox library, New York. In the tracts entitled "The Clear Sunshine of the Gospel," "The Glorious Progress of the Gospel," "The Light appearing more and more toward the Perfect Day," "Strength out of Weakness," "Tears of Repentance," "A Late and Further Manifestation of the Progress of the Gospel," "A Brief Narrative," and in other communications, published mostly in London from 1647 till 1671, the methods employed, and the progress made in the conversion of the Indians, are set forth in a way that much interested Mr. Eliot and others. The principal part of the expense of these and other publications, as well as the salaries of those engaged in labors among the Indians, was defrayed by "A Corporation for the Promoting and Propagating the Gospel of Jesus Christ in New England," established in London in 1649. In 1653 or 1654 Mr. Eliot's Catechism, probably the first book in the Indian language, was printed at Cambridge. No copy can be found. Another edition was printed in 1662. Genesis and Matthew, in Indian, were printed in 1665; but no copy is known. Before the close of 1668 he published a translation of a few psalms in metre. The New Testament in Indian was printed at Cambridge in 1661. A few copies remain, one of which was sold a few years ago for $700. The libraries of the University of Edinburgh and the Congregational library in Boston, Mass., contain the only known copies (not alike) of "A Christian Covenanting Confession," in Indian and English, which are thought to have been printed in 1660. In 1663 the Old Testament was printed. This, bound with the book that is the New Testament, the apostle's house, and with a single leaf containing what has been called a Catechism, is known as the first edition of the Indian Bible—the first Bible printed in America. A copy of this edition was sold at auction a few years ago for $1,250. The second edition of the Old Testament was published at Cambridge in 1660, and this, bound with the Old Testament (1685), the Psalms in metre, and the Catechism, complete the second edition of the Indian Bible. These editions can not be regarded as very rare, since between fifty and sixty copies (many of them imperfect) are owned in this country. The finest collection of them is in the Lenox library, New York. There are copies that show signs of much use, and some have autographs and other manuscript of Indian owners. The Psalter, as well as the New Testament, of the first edition, was bound separately. Of the tracts of Baxter, "Call to the Unconverted" (1664), no copy has been found; but of the second edition (1668) there are copies at Harvard college and in other libraries. An abridgment of Bishop Bayly's "Practice of Piety," translated into Indian, was printed in 1665, and again in 1658. Yale college owns a copy. Of "The Indian Grammar Begun" (Cambridge, 1666), copies are in the John Carter Brown library at Providence, R. I., and in the Lenox library, New York. "The Indian Primer," of which the only copy known is in the library of the University of Edinburgh, was printed at Cambridge in 1669. It has been reprinted. The last of Mr. Eliot's translations printed in his life-time, "The Sincere Convert," by the Rev. Thomas Shepard, was published in 1696. Mr. Eliot's published books in the English language are: The Christ (London, 1669). This book is extremely rare, having been suppressed by the government because it was "full of seditious principles and notions in relation to all established governments in the Christian world, especially against the government established here in New England." The author was induced to make public acknowledgment that he had "offended" in his opinions, "The Communion of Churches" (Cambridge, 1665). This book has been described as the first privately printed book in America. A copy is in the Lenox library. - "Indian Dialogues" (Cambridge, 1671). in the Lenox library. "Indian Logick Primer" (Cambridge, 1672), in the library of the British museum. "The Harmony of the Gospels" (Boston, 1679), in the Lenox library. "Brief Answer to a Book by John Norcot against Infant Baptism" (Boston, 1679). The copy in the Lenox library is the only one known. "Dying Speeches of Several Indians" (Cambridge, about 1680). But one copy is known, which is in the Lenox library. Many of these have been reprinted separately, in the collections of the Massachusetts historical society and elsewhere.—His grandson, Jared, b. in Guilford, Conn., 7 Nov., 1685; d. in Killingworth (now Clinton), Conn., 22 April, 1763, was the son of Rev. Joseph Eliot, who was graduated at Harvard in 1658. Immediately after his graduation at Yale in 1700, Jared was appointed school-master of his native town, and numbered among his pupils Samuel Johnson, first president of Kings (now Columbia) college. In March, 1707, he accepted a call from the church at Killingworth, to become the successor of Rector Abraham Pierson, whose favorite pupil he had been while at Yale. He retained this charge till his death, and while discharging in full measure the duties of his office he found time to make himself eminently useful and famous as a physician, an agriculturist, a scientific investigator, and an author. In 1747 he wrote in the preface to his "Essays upon Field Husbandry": "Having spent more than Thirty years in a Business that required a great deal of Travel, altho' it for did not much hinder Reading and Study, it gave me an opportunity to see much of the Country, of making many Observations, and of being acquainted with very many Persons of Worth and Ingenuity, both Farmers and Others." This manner of life brought him into intimate relations with Benjamin Franklin, and others who at that early day took delight in scientific pursuits. Franklin writes to him in 1755: "I remember with Pleasure the cheerful hours I enjoyed last winter in your Company, and would with all my heart give any ten of the thick old Folios that stand on the shelves before me for a little book of the stories you then told with so much propriety and humor." In Sparks's edition of Franklin's works are eleven letters to Mr. Eliot. His high standing as a clergyman is attested by the fact that he was several times moderator at the meetings of the General association of Connecticut. As a physician, his ability gave him the highest rank. Not only in his own but in neighboring colonies, his skill was frequently in demand, some of his medical pupils afterward becoming distinguished physicians. He received the degree of A.M. from Harvard in 1709; he was elected a trustee of Yale in 1730, in which capacity he rendered valuable services to that college during life, besides making himself in his will the first contributor to its library fund, and in 1750 or 1751 was unanimously chosen a fellow of the Royal society, London. His publications include sermons entitled "The Right Hand of Fellowship" (Boston, 1730); "Religion Supported by Reason and Divine Revelation" (New London, 1760); "Give Caesar his Due" (New London, 1708); "The Blessings Bestowed on Them that Fear God" (New London, 1759); "God’s Marvelous Kindness," preached on the occasion of a general thanksgiving to commemorate the capture of the city of Louisbourg (New London, 1749); "Repeated Devotions Considered and Improved" (New London, 1749); and "A Discourse on the Death of Rev. William Worthington" (New Haven, 1757); "An Essay upon Field Husbandry in New-England" (Boston, 1760); and an Essay on the Invention or Art of Making Very Good, if not the Best, Iron from Black Sea-Sand" (New York, 1702). The accompanying illustration is a copy of a medal awarded to the Rev. Jared Eliot in 1782, by the London Institute, "for producing malleable iron from the American black sand."

ELIOT, Samuel Atkins, mayor of Boston, b. in Boston, Mass., 3 March, 1738; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 29 Jan., 1862. He was graduated at Harvard in 1817, became a merchant in Boston, served several terms in the state legislature, and was mayor of the city in 1857–9. During his administration a riot took place, caused by a collision between a volunteer fire company and an Irish funeral procession. The disturbance was suppressed by the promptness of Mayor Eliot, who was on the ground at the first alarm, and immediately took measures for calling out the militia. The result of this affair was the establishment of a paid fire department and a day police. Mayor Eliot was elected to congress as a Whig, to fill the vacancy caused by the appointment of Robert C. Winthrop to the U.S. Senate, and served from 22 Aug., 1890, till 3 March, 1891. He was treasurer of Harvard college in 1842–53. He published a "Sketch of the History of Harvard College and of its Present State" (Boston, 1844), and edited selections from the sermons of Dr. Francis W. P. Greenwood, with a memoir (2 vols., Boston, 1844).—His son, Charles William, educator, b. in Boston, Mass., 20 March, 1844, was fitted for college Latin school, and was graduated at Harvard in 1863. In the following year he was appointed tutor in mathematics, and studied chemistry with Prof. Josiah P. Cooke. In 1868 he was made assistant professor of mathematics and chemistry, but in 1861 he was relieved of his work in the mathematical department, and taught chemistry in Lawrence scientific school. In 1863 he went to Europe and spent two years in the study of chemistry and in the examination of the systems of optical instruction in France, Germany, and England; and on his return in 1865 was appointed professor of analytical chemistry in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. In that year an important revolution occurred in the government of Harvard university. The board of overseers had hitherto consisted of the governor, lieutenant-governor, president of the state senate, speaker of the house, secretary of the state, and a number chosen by the university, together with thirty other persons, and these other persons were elected by joint ballot of the two houses of the state legislature. An opinion had long been gaining ground that it would be better for the community and the institution, as well as for the university, if the power to elect the overseers were transferred from the legislature to the graduates of the college. This change was made in 1863, and at the same time the governor and other state officers ceased to form part of the board. The effect of this change was greatly to strengthen the interest of the alumni in the management of the university, and thus to prepare the way for extensive and thorough reforms. Shortly afterward Dr. Thomas Hill resigned the presidency, and after a considerable interregnum Mr. Eliot succeeded him in 1869. During his administration the elective system has completely supplanted the old-fashioned prescribed curriculum, and Harvard has come to resemble in its methods the great European universities, while it has doubled in number of students and professors, and many of the changes that have been made in the program of study. He received the degree of LL. D. from Williams and from Princeton in 1869, and from Yale in 1870. He is a fellow of the American academy of arts and sciences, and of the American philosophical society, and a member of other literary and scientific bodies. President Eliot, in his capacity as overseer of Harvard university, has been an active member of committees charged with the task of improving the library and purchasing books for it, and in his capacity as a member of the board of managers of the American Museum of Natural History in New York, he has been a strong advocate of the purchase of the Galvez collection of Mexican art. He has contributed numerous papers to scientific journals, and has written a number of books on the American northwest, and his name is associated with many important scientific institutions. He was a member of the committee that selected the site for the new library building of Harvard university.

Charles William Eliot, president of Harvard. He was graduated at Columbia college, Washington, D. C., in 1861, and at Harvard divinity school in 1864. In the fall of 1861 he was elected president of the Church of the Messiah (Unitarian) in St. Louis, Mo., a place which he held until 1872. During all this time he was energetically employed in improving the condition and advancing the interests of the public schools of St. Louis. He was one of the many men and women interested in the West Virginia system of railroads, and has lately resided in New York. Mr. Eliot was a member of the board of resolute men who assisted Gens. Nathaniel Lyon and Francis P. Blair in preserving Missouri to the Union; and during the war he was active in the western sanitary commission. In 1872 he was chosen to succeed Mr. Chauvenet as chancellor of Washington university in St. Louis, and held the office until his death. He has published a Manual of Prayer" (Boston, 1851); "Discourses on the Doctrines of Christianity" (Boston, 1852; 2d ed., 1865); "Lectures to Young Men" (1853; 11th ed., 1865); "Lectures to Young Women" (1853; 4th ed., enlarged, with the title "Home Life and Influence," St. Louis, 1869); "The Unity of God" (Boston, 1854); "Early Religious Education" (1855); "The Discipline of Sorrow" (1856); "The Story of Archer Alexander, from Slavery to Freedom" (Boston, 1858). He has been a contributor of pamphlets, tracts, and periodicals, and has written many articles on various subjects.

ELIZAGA, Mariano (ay-lee-ah-This man was an accomplished musician. He was the teacher of Catalina de Huarte, wife of the Emperor Iturbide, who appointed him master of the imperial chapel. After the fall of Iturbide he spent his life in teaching. His compositions include "El Misserre del Miercoles Sanza," "Lamentaciones," "Romances," and "Rimas." was a member of the National Republican committee from 1872 till 1884. He took an active part in the Chicago convention of 1864 that nominated James G. Blaine for the presidency, and earnestly supported him in the canvass.

ELLERY, William, signer of the Declaration of Independence, b. in Newport, R. I., 22 Dec., 1727; d. there, 15 Feb., 1820. His father, of the same name, was graduated at Harvard in 1722, became a successful merchant in Newport, served successively as judge, senator, and lieutenant-governor of the colony, and died in 1764. The younger William received his early education mostly from his father, and was graduated at Harvard in 1747. He married in 1750, engaged in business in Newport, and was for some time naval officer of Rhode Island. He began the practice of law in Newport in 1770, having served for two years previous as clerk of one of the courts. He was an active patriot, and in May, 1776, was chosen the colleague of Stephen Hopkins, as delegate to the Continental congress, and took his seat on the 14th of that month. He became an influential member of that body, serving on the committee to consider the ways and means of establishing express between the continental posts, on those of the coast, and on the treasury and on marine affairs, and on the special committee for purchasing clothing for the army. During this session he signed the Declaration of independence, and he was accustomed in later years to relate with great vivacity the incidents connected with that event. "I was determined," he said, "to see how they all looked as they signed what might be their death-warrant. I placed myself beside the secretary, Charles Thomson, and eyed him closely as he affixed his name to the document. Undaunted resolution was displayed in every countenance." Mr. Ellery continued a member of the congress till 1786, with the exception of the years 1789 and 1792, and, overcoming his natural diffidence, became a ready debater. He was a member of important committees, but did especially good service on the board of admiralty, where he had much influence, and probably originated the plan of fitting out fire-ships at Newport. During the British occupation of Rhode Island, Mr. Ellery's house was burned and much of his property injured. In 1779 he was a member of a committee to arrange some diplomatic difficulties among the American commissioners to Europe, and was chairman of a committee to consider means of relieving the distress brought upon the Rhode Islanders by the British occupation. In 1782 he was presented to congress a plan for organizing a department of foreign affairs. In 1785 he actively supported Rufus King in his effort to abolish slavery throughout the country, seconding King's resolution to that effect. He was appointed commissioner of the continental loan-office for Rhode Island in 1786, was for a short period chief justice of the Rhode Island superior court, and from 1790 till his death was collector of Newport, being retained in the office in spite of frequent and frank reprovals of political differences in administrations. Mr. Ellery was of moderate stature, with a large head and impressive features. He was fond of study and literature, and was highly esteemed for his social qualities, being intimate with all that were conspicuous of his time. He retained the full use of his faculties to the close of his long life, and died holding in his hand a copy of Cicero's "De Officis," which he had been reading. See a biography of Ellery by his grandson, Edward T. Channing, in Spur's "American Biography," vol. vi., and Goodrich's "Lives of the Signers to the Declaration of Independence."—His nephew, Christopher, senator, b. in Newport, R. I., 1 Nov., 1768; d. there, 2 Dec., 1840, was graduated at Yale in 1787, studied law, and began to practise in his native city. He was elected to the U. S. senate as a Democrat, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Ray Green, and served from 7 Dec., 1801, till 3 March, 1803. President Jefferson appointed him commissioner of loans at Providence in 1806, and from 1820 till 1864, when the failure of his health caused him to resign. On the treasury.—Christopher's son, Frank, naval officer, b. in Newport, R. I., 23 July, 1794; d. in Castleton, Vt., 24 March, 1871, entered the navy as a midshipman on 1 Jan., 1812, and served in the frigate "President" on all her cruises, being wounded in the action of 7 March by the shot of the gun at which he was stationed. He received a sword and the thanks of congress for his services on Lake Champlain, was in the "Constellation" in the Mediterranean in 1815, at the capture of an Algerine frigate and a Turkish flag-ship, and assisted in expelling McGregor's band of adventurers from Amelia island, Fla., in 1817, capturing one of their privateers with her prize. He became lieutenant, 28 March, 1820, commanded the "Cyane," of the Brazil squadron, in 1827, and was on duty at the Boston bar during the war in 1838-39. He commanded the steamer "Enterprise" in 1840, was put on the reserved list, 13 Sept., 1855, commanded the Boston rendezvous again in 1861, and was commissioned commodore on the retired list, 4 April, 1867.

ELLET, Jacob, b. in Penn's Manor, Bucks co., Pa., 1 Jan., 1810; d. in Cairo, Ill., 21 June, 1862. He was destined by his father for the life of a farmer, but his inclinations led him to mathematical and engineering pursuits. First as a roofer, then as a volunteer, and subsequently as a paid assistant on the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, he soon acquired means to visit Europe, and completed his education in the École polytechnique in Paris. He became an engineer on the Utica and Schenectady railroad, then on the Erie, and subsequently chief engineer of the James and Kanawha canal. In 1848 he engaged in a large suspension bridge in this country, across the Schuykill river at Philadelphia. He designed and built the railroad suspension bridge across the Niagara river below the falls in 1847, and afterward built a suspension bridge at Wheeling, Va. He then engaged in many important engineering works, constructed a remarkable temporary track across the Blue Ridge, improved the navigation of the Kanawha river, and aided in laying out the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, and in 1848-7 he was president of the New York and Wheeling navigation company. He was among the first to advocate the use of steam rams, and suggested a plan to the ELLET, William Henry, chemist, b. in New York city, 1 Nov., 1806; d. there, 28 Jan., 1859. He was graduated at Columbia in 1824, and subsequently, while studying medicine, gained a gold medal for a dissertation on the organization of nitrogen. In 1830 he became lecturer on elementary chemistry in Columbia college, and two years later was promoted to the chair of that name, but in 1835 was made professor of chemistry, mineralogy, and agriculture in South Carolina college. In 1840 he discovered a new and cheap method of preparing gun-cotton; the legislature of South Carolina presented him with a service of silver-plate. In 1848 he returned to New York, and in 1854 became consulting chemist of the Manhattan gas company, which office he held until his death. His wife, Elizabeth Fries, author, b. in Sodus Point, N. Y., in 1818; d. 3 June, 1877, was the daughter of Dr. William Nixion Lummis. She was educated at the Aurora, N. Y., female seminary, and after her marriage with Dr. Ellet, about 1855, began to write for periodicals. She has contributed largely to magazines and reviews, and has published a translation of Silvio Pellico's "Euphemia di Messina" (1834); "Teresa Contarini," a tragedy, which was represented in New York (1835); "Poems, Original and Selected" (Philadelphia, 1839); "Scenes in the Life of a Italian Girl" (Boston, 1840); "Characters of Schiller" (1842); "Family Pictures from the Bible" (New York, 1849); "Evenings at Woodlawn" (1850); "Domestic History of the American Revolution" (1850); "Watching Spirits" (1851); "Walden or the Compounds of Cynogen" (1851); "Pioneer Women of the West" (1852); "Novellétes of the Musicians" (1852); "Summer Rambles in the West" (1853); "The Practical Housekeeper, a Cyclopedia of Domestic Economy" (1857); "Women Artists in all Ages and Countries" (1861); "Queens of American Society" (1867); and "Court Circles of the Republic," with Mrs. R. E. Mack (Ithartford, 1869).

ELLICOTT, Andrew, civil engineer, b. in Bucks county, Pa., 24 Jan., 1754; d. in West Point, N. Y., 29 Aug., 1859. His father and uncle, who were Quakers, owned the large tract of land on the Patapsco river in 1770, and in 1774 founded the town of Ellicott's Mills, now Ellicott City, where Andrew passed his youth in the study of science and practical mechanics. His scientific attainments soon attracted attention, and he enjoyed the friendship and confidence of Washington, Franklin, and Rittenhouse. He was appointed commissioner at various times for marking the boundaries of Virginia, Pennsylvania, and New York, and about 1785 removed to Baltimore, where he was elected to the legislature. He was selected by Washington in 1789 to survey the land lying between Pennsylvania and Lake Erie, and during that year he made the first accurate measurement of the Niagara river from lake to lake, with the height of the falls and the descent of the rapids. In 1790 he was employed by the state to survey and lay out the city of Washington, and in 1792 was made surveyor-general of the United States. He superintended the construction of Fort Erie, at Presque Isle, now Erie, Pa., in 1795, and was employed in laying out the towns of Erie, Warren, and Jamestown. Andrew Ellicott accompanied Washington in 1796 as U. S. commissioner under the treaty of San Lorenzo el Real, to determine the boundary separating the United States from the Spanish possessions on the south. The results of this service, which embraced a period of nearly five years, appear in his "Journal" (Philadelphia, 1809). Upon its completion he was appointed by...

Gov. McKean, of Pennsylvania, secretary of the state land-office, but resigned in 1808, and in 1812 became professor of mathematics at West Point, where he remained until 1823. He went to Montreal in 1817, by order of the government, to make astronomical observations for carrying into effect some of the articles of the treaty of Ghent. He was an active member of the American philosophical society, contributed to its transactions, and corresponded with many of the learned societies of Europe. With the exception of his "Journal" and a few other writings, his works are still in manuscript.—His brother, Joseph, engineer, b. in Bucks county, Pa., 1 Nov., 1760; d. in Batavia, N. Y., 19 Aug., 1826, received a common-school education, and subsequently studied surveying and engineering. He was engaged as an assistant to his brother Andrew in the survey and plotting of the city of Washington, and in running the boundary-line between New York and Pennsylvania. In 1797 Mr. Eliott was employed by the Holland land company to survey the tract in western New York known as the "Holland purchase," and, on the completion of the survey in 1800, was appointed local agent of the company, with headquarters at Batavia, N. Y., which he had located, and toward whose early development he contributed largely. Mr. Eliott has justly been called the "founder of Buffalo." He surveyed and laid out the city on its original plan. He was a zealous advocate of the projected Erie canal, and corresponded with Gov. De Witt Clinton concerning the subject. He opposed Clinton's plan of sending to England for engineers, insisting that there was abundant home talent for the work, and succeeded in convincing the governor that he was right. He served for some time as canal commissioner, but held no office in public life after the Holland land company twenty years, during which time most of the vast tract of land owned by it in western New York was disposed of to actual settlers, Mr. Eliott retired from active pursuits.

ELLIOIT, Benjamin, jurist, b. in Charleston, S. C., 1786; d. in 1866. He was graduated at Princeton in 1806, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1810, and began to practise in South Carolina. He was the author of numerous literary, historical, and political productions. Among his works is a "Refutation of the Calumnies circulated against the Southern and Western States respecting the Institution and Existence of Slavery" (1822). He also prepared and published "The Militia System of South Carolina," which was adopted as the military code for the state.

ELLIOIT, Charles, governor of Bermuda, b. in England in 1796; d. in 1856. He entered the British navy in 1816, took part in the battle of Algiers, and subsequently served in India, on the coast of Africa, and in the West Indies, rising to the rank of admiral. In 1853 he was appointed permanent member of the British admiralty at £90. From 1842 till 1845 he served as charge d'affaires in Texas. He was governor of Bermuda in 1847-52, of Trinidad from 1853 till 1856, and of St. Helena from 1861 till 1869, when he retired from the service. He was made a K. C. B. in 1856.

When Sir Henry Clinton made his last effort to save André in 1780, Mr. Elliott was one of the three persons who were sent to confer with Washington. He remained in New York till its evacuation in 1783, when he sailed in the “Nonesuch” with his family for Boston.

ELLIOTT, Anna, patriot of the Revolution. She was a daughter of Thomas Ferguson, a patriot who was exiled after the British capture of Charleston. Her husband was Charles Elliott, of that place. American prisoners that were brought into Charleston were sold and relieved by her cestisrous ministrations.

ELLIOTT, Charles, clergyman, b. in Greenconway, County Donegal, Ireland, 16 May, 1792; d. in Mount Pleasant, Iowa, 6 Jan., 1889. He united with the Wesleyan church and applied for admission to the University of Dublin, but was refused because he could not take the prescribed test oath. By the aid of some eminent scholars, he succeeded in following a course of study equivalent to that of the university. He emigrated to the United States about 1815, and was received into the travelling connection of the Ohio conference in 1818. In 1822 he was appointed superintendent of the mission among the Wyandot Indians at Upper Sandusky, Ohio. He was presiding elder of the Ohio district for four years, and professor of languages in Madison college, Uniontown, Pa., for four years.

In 1831 he was stationed in Pittsburg, and was subsequently presiding elder of that district, editor of the “Pittsburg Conference Journal,” and afterward of the “Western Christian Advocate,” which he conducted until 1848, and again from 1852 till 1856. He then became professor of biblical literature in Iowa Wesleyan university and its president, but resigned in 1860. He was afterward appointed editor of the “Central Christian Advocate” at St. Louis, Mo., and during the civil war strongly supported the Union cause. After the close of the war he was again connected with Iowa Wesleyan university until 1866. His chief works are a “Treatise on Baptism” (1834); “Delegation of Roman Catholicism” (3 vols., New York, 1831); “Life of Bishop Roberts” (1833); “History of the Great Schism” from the Methodist Episcopal Church” (1855); “Political Romanism” (1859); “Reminiscences of the Wyandotte Mission”; “Southwestern Methodism”; and two works against slavery.

ELLIOTT, Charles Loring, artist, b. in Scipio, N. Y., in December, 1812; d. in Albany, N. Y., 25 Sept., 1888. In early life he was a clerk in a store in Syracuse, but devoted his leisure to drawing and painting. He came to New York about 1834, and became a pupil of Trumbull and afterward of Quidor. At first his portraits were unsuccessful, but he executed some oil paintings illustrating Irving’s and Paulding’s works, which attracted attention. After painting portraits for several years in the western part of the state, he returned to New York city, where he opened a studio. He was elected associate of the National academy in 1845, and academician in 1846. He is said to have painted more than 700 portraits of eminent men, among them likenesses of Fitz-Greene Halleck, in the presence of the publishers of his works; Charles F. Bulkley, belonging to the National academy; Matthew Vassar, in Vassar college; Louis Gaylord Clark; W. W. Corcoran; Fletcher Harper; Fenimore Cooper (see engraving in vol. i.); Gove. Seymour and H. T. Ingersoll, in the library; and Ernestus Corning, in the state library, Albany. Several of his works were at the National academy in 1888, including “Don Quixote,” “Faust,” “Andrew Van Corlear, the Trumpeter,” his own portrait, and “The Head of Skaneateles Lake.”

ELLIOTT, Charles Wyllis, author, b. in Guilford, Conn., 27 May, 1817; d. 23 Aug., 1888. He was a lineal descendant in the fifth generation of Eliot the “Indian Apostle.” After some years spent in mercantile life in the city of New York, he studied horticulture and landscape gardening with A. J. Downing, at Newburg, in 1838-9, and from 1840 till 1848 practised those pursuits at Cincinnati. He then returned to New York and engaged with his brother Henry in the iron business, devoting his attention also to literary and philanthropic labors. He was one of the organizers of the Movement and trustees of the Children’s aid society in 1853. In 1857 he was appointed one of the commissioners for laying out Central park in the city of New York. He resided for some time in Cambridge, Mass., and became manager of the Household art company of Boston, and afterward in his native place. He has published “Cottages and Cottage Life” (New York, 1849); “Mysteries, or Glimpses of the Supernatural” (1852); “St. Domingo, its Revolution and its Hero, Toussaint l’Ouverture” (1853); “The New England and History, from the Discovery of the Continent by the Northmen, A. D. 986, to 1776” (1857); “Remarkable Characters and Places in the Holy Land” (Hartford, 1867); “Wind and Whirlwind,” a novel, by “Mr. Thom Whyte” (New York, 1888); “The Book of Americans” (Boston, 1886); “A New Interior in New England,” with heliotype illustrations (Boston, 1876); and “Pottery and Porcelain, from Early Times to the Philadelphia Exhibition,” giving the marks and monograms (New York, 1877). He was also a frequent contributor to periodicals, and was the author of several novels published anonymously.

ELLIOTT, David, educator, b. in Sherman’s Valley, Perry co., Pa., 6 Feb., 1787; d. in Allegheny City, Pa., 18 March, 1874. He was of Scotch-Irish parentage. He entered Dickinson college in the junior class, and was graduated in 1803, studied theology for three years, was a home missionary for one year, and was then settled as pastor of the Presbyterian church at what is now Mercerburg, Pa., where he remained for eighteen years. Then he was called to Washington, Pa., as pastor, and was also for nearly two years acting president of the Washington college and professor of philosophy. He did more than any one else to revive the college when threatened with extinction, but declined the presidency of the institution, consenting, however, to act in that capacity in connection with his pastoral duties until in 1852 a permanent resident was selected. He went over to the professorship of ecclesiastical history and church government in the Western theological seminary, at Allegheny, Pa. He declined, but the following year, at the solicitation of the directors, he accepted the chair of polemic and historic theology. He held this for nearly thirty-five years, and retired in 1870 as professor emeritus. In 1878 he was mod-ister of the Presbyterian Church, which he divided that year; but he lived to see the reunion of 1870-1, and took part in its exercises.

ELLIOTT, Ezekiel Brown, statistician, b. in Sweden, Monroe co., N. Y., 18 July, 1823. He was graduated at Hamilton in 1844, and after teaching for two years, went to New York, where he engaged in the development of telegraphy. Later he became actuary of a life-insurance company in Boston, and in 1861 was called to fill a similar office to the U. S. sanitary commission. He became secretary of the commission for revising the U. S. revenue laws in 1863, and in 1871 compiled the "civil service reform act." At present (1887) he holds the office of government actuary in the U. S. treasury department. In 1863 he was a member of the International statistical congress, held in Berlin, and in 1868 was vice-president of the American association for the advancement of science, presiding over the section of economic science and statistics. Mr.
Elliott is also a member of numerous scientific societies at home and abroad. He has published various papers on mathematical physics, but has achieved his greatest reputation in connection with the statistical studies in connection with coinage, weights and measures, and similar topics, that he has prepared for the government. Several of these "have appeared in the volumes of the U. S. census, especially in that on "Vital Statistics."

ELLIOTT, Franklin Reuben, horticulturist, b. in Columbus, Con., 27 April, 1817; d. in Cleveland, Ohio, 10 Jan., 1878. He settled in Cleveland in 1844. He was the author of "The Western Fruit Book, or American Fruit-Grower's Guide" (New York, 1854; enlarged ed., 1867); "Popular Luncheon and Entertaining Cookery" (Cleveland, 1866); "Handbook for Fruit-Growers." (Rochester, N. Y., 1870); and "Handbook of Practical Landscape Gardening." (1877). He also contributed frequent articles on fruit-culture to periodicals. He was a member of the society of fruit-growers of Cleveland, and has been employed for many years by the Smithsonian institution, Washington, as an artist.
He edited the Cleveland "Daily Herald" in 1879, and then went to Alaska as a special agent of the treasury department. He has published, besides many other works, "Mollisland," "Woolly Worm," and "Our Arctic Province, Alaska, and the Seal Islands" (New York, 1886).

ELLIOTT, Gilbert Molleison, soldier, b. in Thompson, Windham co., Conn., 7 Oct., 1840; d. on pointed to the command of the Philadelphia navy-yard. He was a man of kind feelings, but a rigid disciplinarian. A biographical notice of him was published by "A Citizen of New York" (Philadelphia, 1863). His son, Washington Lafayette, soldi- ered for the United States with distinction in the Mexican War, in 1851, accompanied his father in cruises in the West Indies in 1872-2, and on board the "Constitution" on a cruise in the Mediterranean. He studied at Dickinson college, and in 1841 entered the U. S. military academy. In 1853 he was commissioned as 2d lieutenant of mounted rifles. He served with his regiment in Mexico till the sur- render of Vera Cruz, was promoted 1st lieutenant on 20 July, 1847, and after the war was stationed at Fort Laramie and in Texas and New Mexico, becoming a captain in July, 1854. In September, 1858, he distinguished himself in conflicts with the Navajoe in New Mexico. In the beginning of the civil war he took part in the actions at Spring- field and Wilson's Creek, Mo., was appointed colon- el of the 2d Iowa cavalry in September, 1861, and on 5 Nov., 1861, was promoted major in the regu- lar army. He afterward commanded a brigade of cavalry in the Army of the Tennessee, was engaged at the capture of Madrid, brevetted for gallantry at the capture of Island No. 10, and again for ser- vices at the siege of Corinth, and in a raid on the Missouri line of railroad in July, 1862. He was promoted to brigadier-general of volunteers in June, 1862, became chief of cavalry in the Army of Virginia in August, 1863, and was wounded at the second battle of Bull Run. He commanded the Department of the Northwest in the beginning of 1864, was placed in command of a division in the Army of the Potomac in the summer of that year, then in the Army of the Cumberland, and was engaged in re-enforcing Gen. Burnside, and com- manding in the action of Mossey Creek, Tenn. He was subsequently chief of cavalry in the Army of the Cumberland, and took part in the Atlanta campaign and in the pursuit of Gen. Hood. In 1865 he commanded a division of the 4th corps, and was in the battles around Nashville. For ser- vices at Nashville he received the brevets of major- general of volunteers and brigadier-general in the regular army. He was a member of the committee on military affairs, U. S. army, for gallant and meritorious ser- vices during the war. He became lieutenant-colonel in August, 1866, colonel in April, 1868, and on 20 March, 1879, was retired at his own request.

ELLIOTT, John, clergyman, b. in Clinton, Conn., 24 Aug., 1768; d. in Madison, Conn., 17 Dec., 1834. He was graduated at Yale in 1786, and received the degree of D. D. there in 1822. He was pastor of the Congregational church in Madison, Conn., from 1791 till his death, and from 1812 till his death was a fellow of Yale. Eleven of his discourses, one of them an "election sermon," were printed, and he was also, with Samuel Johnson, Jr., of Guilford, Conn., author of the first American dictionary of the English language, which is now a great rarity (Suffield, Conn., 1800). Mr. John- son in 1813, published a small "School Dictionary." the previous year.

ELLIOTT, Jonathan, publicist, b. near Carlisle, England, in 1784; d. in Washington, D. C., 12 March, 1846. He emigrated to New York about 1802 and became a printer, but in 1810 volun- teered for the army to defend the independecne of New Granada, and was in several en- engagements under Bolivar, in one of which he was severely wounded. He was taken prisoner at the surrender of Gen. Miranda in 1813, and suffered many hardships, but returned to the United States in 1818 and served in the U. S. army in the war of 1812-5. In 1814 he made his home in Washington, and edited with ability, during thirteen years, the "Washington Gazette." He published "American Diplomatic Code" (Washington, 1827; new ed., 2 vols., 1842 Apr., in Abby); "History, "Constitution" (1827-30); "Funding System of the United States"; "Statistics of the United States"; "The Comparative Tariffs"; and "Sketches of the District of Columbia" (1830). He also edited the "Madison Papers." He was commissioned as 2d lieutenant of mounted rifles. He served with his regiment in Mexico till the surrender of Vera Cruz, was promoted 1st lieutenant on 20 July, 1847, and after the war was stationed at Fort Laramie and in Texas and New Mexico, becoming a captain in July, 1854. ELLIOTT, Robert Brown, lawyer, b. in Bos- ton, Mass., 11 Aug., 1842; d. in New Orleans, La., in 1884. He was of African descent. After studying in private schools, he entered High Holborn academy, London, England, in 1853, and subsequently studied at Eton college, where he was graduated in 1858. He then devoted law and practised, afterward settling in South Carolina. He was a member of the State constitutional convention in 1868, and from July of that year till Octo- ber, 1870, was a member of the legislature. In 1869 he was made assistant adjutant-general, which office he held till he was elected to congress as a republican, serving from 1871 to 1874, when he resigned, having been elected sheriff of his county. In 1875 he was again elected to the legislature, and was speaker of the lower house. He removed to New Orleans and was appointed commissioner of the treasury department, and then resumed law prac- tice. He delivered various lectures and addresses.

ELLIOTT, Samuel Mackenzie, occultist, b. in Inverness, Scotland, 9 April, 1811; d. in New Brighton, Staten Island, N. Y., 1 May, 1873. He was graduated at the College of science, Glasgow in 1828, pursued original investigations into the anatomy of the eye and the effects of climate on that organ, and in 1833 emigrated to the United States, and continued his medical studies in Cin- cinnati and Philadelphia. In 1835 he opened an office in New York city, and devoted himself to the cure of eye diseases. He gained a high reputation in this specialty, but the medical profession considered him an irregular practitioner, and accused him either of charlatanism or of unprofessional conduct in keeping his medical discoveries a secret. He accordingly submitted to a public examination in the New York medical college, and in a course of lectures explained his methods of prac- tice. He exhibited eccentricities, but his scientific attainments and professional skill obtained recognition, and his amiable characteristics and generous charities gained him many friends. At the begin- ning of the civil war he was lieutenant-colonel of the 79th regiment of New York volunteers. During the first battle of Bull Run his horse was shot and fell upon him, so injuring his spine as to incapac- itate him for further active service. He afterward raised the Highland brigade, and at the close of the war was mustered out as brigadier-general. He continued to practise his profession until 1874, when he retired to his residence on Staten Island.

ELLIOTT, Stephen, naturalist, b. in Beaufort, S. C., 11 Nov., 1771; d. in Beaufort, S. C., 23 March, 1830. His father settled in Beaufort, where he purchased land, and married a granddaughter of John Barnwell. He was graduated at Yale in 1791, devoted himself to the cultivation of his estate and to literary and scientific studies, and in 1793 was elected to the assembly of South Caro- lina, of which he continued to be a member till the establishment of the Bank of the state in 1812, of which he was chosen president. He retained this office till his death. His leisure was devoted to literature and science, and he cultivated the stady of botany with enthusiasm. In 1813 he was instrumental in founding the Literary and philosophical society of South Carolina, of which he was president. He lectured gratuitously on his favorite science, and was for some time editor of the "Southern Review." In 1835 he aided in establishing the Medical college of the state, and was elected to the board of directors. He published himself, in the preparation of which he was assisted by Dr. James Byrde, and left several works in manuscript.
His collection in natural history was one of the most extensive in the country. He was a member of the state legislature, but resigned upon being instructed by his constituents to vote to nullify the tariff law, not believing in the right of nullification, though unalterably opposed to protection. He afterward devoted himself to agriculture and rural sports, and occasionally published essays on rural economy, controversial articles on political science and economics, sports, sketchs, signed "Venator" and "Piscator," and poems, and delivered many addresses before agricultural societies. His letters against secession, signed "Agricola," and published in 1851, were among the last expressions of opinion upon political subjects. He contributed largely to the periodical press of the south, especially the "Southern Review." His published works include an "Address before the St. Paul's Agricultural Society" (Charleston, 1850), and "Carolina Sports by land and water" (1843). He was also the author of "Flieson," a tragedy (1850).

Elliott, Susannah, patriot, b. in South Carolina about 1750. Her maiden name was Smith. She was descended from one of the oldest families of the colony, left an orphan at an early age, was educated by Rebecca Brewton Motte, and married Barnard Elliott, a colonel in the Revolutionary army. On 24 June, 1776, after the battle of Fort Moultrie, she presented to Col. Moultrie's regiment two standards, embroidered by her own hands, saying that the soldiers by their gallant behavior entitled them to the highest honors, and that she had no doubt they would stand by the colors as long as they should wave in the air of liberty. At her plantation she had a secret apartment in which two American officers were hidden safely from the British, who searched the house; and found neither the patriots nor the family silver, which was buried in a marsh and disinterred after the war.
